^b Horeb is a mountain in Arabia Petraea, at so small a distance from Mount Sinai, that they seem to be no more than two tops belonging to the same mountain. Sinai lies to the east, and Horeb to the west; but we find them frequently in Scripture used promiscuously. For, whereas the author of the Hebrews several times asserts, that God gave his law to the Israelites at Horeb, though other places expressly say, that it was at Sinai, this is easily agreed, by observing, that they both made but as it were one mountain with two tops, whereof that of Sinai is much the higher, though that of Horeb exceeds it in fruitfulness and pleasure. It is not for that reason, however, no nor yet for its vast height, that it obtained the title of the mount of God. Josephus indeed tells us, (b. 2. c. 12.) that the people of the country had a tradition, that God, in a more particular manner, dwelt there; and that therefore, in reverence to the place, they always declined feeding their flocks upon it: but the true reason of its being so called is, that, in after ages, it became famous for sundry events, and at this time received its name by way of anticipation. For here it was, 1. That God appeared to Moses in the bush; 2. That he manifested his glory at the delivery of the law; 3. That Moses, with his rod, brought water out of the rock; 4. That by lifting up his hands, he made Joshua prevail against the Amalekites; 5. That here he fasted twice forty days and forty nights; 6. That from hence he brought the two tables of the law; and, 7. That here Elijah was vouchsafed a noble vision; with some others of the like nature.—Calmet's Dictionary, Universal History, b. 1. c. 7, and Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

^c Exod. iii. 2. 'And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire.' The traditional notion of a miraculous light or fire being the token of a divine presence, prevailed among the Greeks in the time of Homer; for after relating that the goddess Minerva attended on Ulysses with her golden lamp, or rather torch, and afforded him a resplendent light, he makes Telemachus cry out to his father in rapture,

What miracle thus dazzles with surprise?
Distinct in rows the radiant columns rise.
The walls, where'er my wondering sight I turn,
And roofs, amidst a blaze of glory burn:
Some visitant of pure ethereal race
With his bright presence deigns the dome to grace.—Ed.

^d In the text it is said, that 'the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire, out of the midst of the bush,' Exod. iii. 2. But whether it was a created angel, speaking in the person of God, or God himself, or, as the most received opinion is, Christ the Son of God, has been matter of some controversy among the learned. Those who suppose it no more than an angel, seem to imply, that it would be a diminution of the majesty of God to appear upon every occasion, especially when he has such a number of celestial ministers, who may do the business as well. But considering that God is present everywhere, the notification of his presence, by some outward sign, in one determinate place, which is all we mean by his appearance, is, in our conception, less laborious (if any thing laborious could be conceived of God) than a delegation of angels, upon every turn, from heaven, and seems in the main to illustrate, rather than debase, the glory of his nature and existence. But however this be, it is plain, that the angel here spoken of was no created being, from the whole context, and especially from his saying, 'I am the Lord God, the Jehovah,' &c., since this is not the language of angels, who are always known to express themselves in such humble terms as these, 'I am sent from God, I am thy fellow servant,' &c. It is a vain pretence to say, that an angel, as God's ambassador, may speak in God's name and person; for what ambassador of any prince ever yet said, 'I am the king?' Since therefore no angel, without the guilt of blasphemy, could assume these titles, and since neither God the Father, nor the Holy Ghost, are ever called by the name of an angel, that is, a messenger, or person sent, whereas God the Son is called by the prophet Malachi, chap. iii. 1, 'the angel of the covenant,' it hence seems to follow, that this angel of the Lord was God the Son, who might very properly be called an angel: because, in the fulness of time, he was sent into the world in our flesh, as a messenger from God, and might therefore make his temporary apparitions, presages, and forerunners, as it were, of his more solemn mission.—Pool's Annotations.

^e Justin Martyr, in his second apology, is of opinion, that the custom of putting off the shoes, both among the Jews and Gentiles, before they began to officiate in holy things, took its rise from this precept given to Moses; but our learned Mr Mede seems to be of a different opinion, namely, that Moses did not give the first occasion to this rite, but that it was derived from the patriarchs before him, and transmitted to future ages from that ancient general tradition. It is certain that Pythagoras, who took his institutes chiefly from the Egyptians, delivers it as a rule in his Rubric, "he who sacrifices, should put off his shoes, and so approach to the holy ordinance;" and therefore God, in compliance to an ancient custom, then in practice among the Egyptians, might speak to Moses, who was a person well acquainted with their ceremonies, to deacalceate, as very well knowing, that it would be a means to create in him a greater because the ground whereon he stood was holy. Moses obeyed; and while the voice went on to declare itself the God, who had all along been kind to his ancestors, and had now with compassion seen the afflictions of his brethren, and was come down to deliver them from their oppressors, he fell down upon the ground, and covered his face with his garment, as being unable to sustain the refulgency of the divine presence.

Moses, by this time, had entirely laid aside all thoughts of rescuing his brethren, the Israelites, from their thralldom; nor had he any opinion of his own abilities, if he should make the attempt, to succeed in so difficult an undertaking; and therefore, when God proposed the thing to him, and opened the whole manner and method in which he would have it executed, he began to excuse himself, by urging his meanness and insufficiency to take upon him the character of a divine ambassador. This difficulty God endeavoured to remove, by assuring him that he would be with him, and assist him in every step he took; that he would enable him to accomplish the thing, though never so perplexed and arduous; and for a token of his veracity herein, that within a small compass of time, he should see that very people, who now were in slavery, set free, and worshipping him on that very mountain.

Moses, still unwilling to undertake the thing, desired to know what he was to say to the people, and by what name he was to call the person who sent him upon this message. To which request God was pleased to reply,—That he who sent him was an eternal, independent, self-existent being, ^a the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, by which name he gloried to be called; and therefore he required him, first to assemble the elders of Israel together, and acquaint them with his design, and then to go directly to the king, and demand of him a dismissal of the Israelites, at least for three days' journey into the wilderness, in order to sacrifice to their God; which, though at the first he knew he would be far from granting, yet in the end, would be glad to consent to, when he should see the divine power exerted upon sundry occasions, and so many miracles wrought before his eyes as would compel him to let them go.

Such a solemn assurance as this from the mouth of God himself, was enough, one would think, to have gained a ready compliance; but Moses still demurs to the thing, and makes it an objection, that the people, when he came to them, might possibly question his credentials; and therefore, to obviate this, God promises to enable him to work miracles for their conviction. And for a specimen of this, when he bade him throw the rod that was in his hand upon the ground, it instantly became a serpent terrible to behold; but when he ordered him to take it up, it resumed its former shape; when he put his hand into his bosom, ^b upon pulling it out, it was all over leprous, but upon putting it in, and pulling it out again, it became as clean as before; and, as if this were not enough, to gain him a further credit among the people, he gave him a standing power to convert water into blood, whenever there was occasion.

But the promise of all this miraculous power could not prevail with Moses to accept of this office. He alleged in excuse, his want of eloquence, and ^c the natural impediment he had in his speech. But this reverence to the divine presence, and a more awful attention to what he was going to say.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^a A God no doubt was the God of Noah, and of all the holy patriarchs, who lived before these three were born; but for a peculiar reason is he called their God, because of his covenant, and the promise made to each of them, that the blessed seed should spring from their loins, in opposition to the pretensions of other neighbouring people, who, as the learned Dr. Alix observes, were their rivals in that hope. And so the word will denote, as much as if he had said, the God of Abraham, and not of Lot, as the Ammonites and Moabites pretended; the God of Isaac, and not of Ishmael, as his posterity pretended; and the God of Jacob, and not of Esau, as the Edomites boasted.—Patrick's Commentary.

rod that was in his hand upon the ground, it instantly became a serpent terrible to behold; but when he ordered him to take it up, it resumed its former shape; when he put his hand into his bosom, ^b upon pulling it out, it was all over leprous, but upon putting it in, and pulling it out again, it became as clean as before; and, as if this were not enough, to gain him a further credit among the people, he gave him a standing power to convert water into blood, whenever there was occasion.

^b It is no improbable conjecture, that as God commanded Moses to work all his wonders before Pharaoh, this miracle of the leprosy gave occasion to the fabulous story, which was invented in after ages, namely, That Moses was a leper, and the Israelites a scabby race, whom the Egyptians were forced to drive out of their country, for fear of the infection. This defamation is first met with in Manetho's Egyptian History; from Manetho it descended to Apion, the Greek historian; and from him Justin and Tacitus, two noted Roman authors, undoubtedly took it. But as Manetho might not at first maliciously devise it out of his own head, so those writers from whom he compiled his history, might derive it from this passage of Moses' appearing with a leprous hand before Pharaoh, which was presently noised about the country, without the other part of his being immediately cured. For, according to the argument of Josephus, "there needs no other proof of his being no leper, than what arises from his own words, namely, that no lepers should be admitted into any towns or villages, but live apart in a distinct habit by themselves; that whoever touched a leper, or lodged under the same roof with him, should be reputed unclean; and that whoever should come to be cured of that disease, should pass through certain purifications, wash himself with fountain water, shave off all his hair, and offer such and such sacrifices, before he should be received into the holy city." Now if Moses," says he, "had been afflicted with this distemper himself, it is incongruous to think, that he would ever have been so severe upon others for it." The leprosy indeed was a distemper in a manner peculiar to the Egyptians. "The leprosy is a disease which arises by the banks of the Nile in Middle Egypt, and no where else," as both Lucretius (l. 6.) and Plutarch tell us; and if it was so in Moses' time, he may be presumed to have made laws more strict against it, with an intention to excite the people's carefulness to avoid a distemper which they had already seen so much of, but had now, together with the other calamities of their bondage, happily escaped. For that the people, at this time, were in good health, is evident from the long journey they undertook, and which on all hands is agreed, they did perform; and that they were not expelled by the Egyptians, but went away from them sore against their will, their pursuit of them to the Red Sea, and losing all their lives with a purpose of retaking them, facts that are attested by several heathen authors, are an abundant demonstration.—Joseph. contra Apionem, Plutarch's Quest. Nat., Bibliotheca Biblica, vol. 2. Essay 4. and Patrick's Commentary.

^c Moses here tells us of himself, that he was slow of speech, which most interpret to be a stammerer, or stutterer; and yet St. Stephen (Acts vii. 22) declares of him, that 'he was mighty in words as well as deeds;' but this admits of an easy reconciliation, if we do but suppose, that the sense of what he spoke was great and weighty, though his pronunciation was not answerable to it. As God, however, tells him, (Exod. iv. 11.) that he it was who made the mouth, and could consequently give to any man what faculties he thought convenient, or remove any impediment he might have, it seems not improbable, that either by use and exercise, or else by God's immediate cure of his defect, Moses had acquired a better facility in delivering his mind. Since we find him making several speeches to the people, especially that excellent discourse before his death, in the beginning of Deuteronomy; as he has likewise, where his song occurs towards the latter end, given an ample demonstration, that he wanted not eloquent words when he pleased to employ them.—Patrick's Commentary.

defect likewise God promises to supply in an extraordinary manner; and as he was the great author of human nature, to give him all the faculties that were necessary for the business he put him upon. So that, driven from all his subterfuges, Moses was at last compelled to declare downright, that he had no inclination to the office; and therefore desired of God to let him alone, and find out some other that was fitter for his purpose.

So blunt a refusal was not so pleasing to God, and might have been resented with indignation; but instead of that, he resumed the objection, and told Moses, that as to his defect of utterance, this his brother Aaron, who would be fond of the office, and was already set out from home to meet him, would be sufficiently capable of supplying. To him, therefore, he bid him impart the whole affair, and to make use of him as his orator, but to reserve the chief conduct of it to himself, and not to forget a to take along with him his rod, wherewith he would enable him to work all miracles.

By these persuasions, and demonstrations of a miraculous power to assist him, Moses, at last, was prevailed on to accept the commission, and accordingly went to his father-in-law, and, b without telling him the occasion, requested leave to go and visit his brethren who were in Egypt. His father-in-law readily consented to it; so that, taking his wife and children along with him, he was proceeding on his journey, when, to his great surprise, a Wonderful are the stories which the Hebrew doctors tell us of this rod, namely, that it originally grew in paradise, was brought away by Adam, from him passed to Noah, and so through a succession of patriarchs, till it came to be transplanted into Jethro's garden, and there took root again, God knows how; that it was called Zaphir, whence Ziphorah his daughter had her name, and had the Tetragrammaton written upon it; that when Ziphorah fell in love with Moses, her father consented that she should have him, if he could pluck up this Zaphir-rod, at the same time published a proclamation, that whoever did it first should marry his daughter; that hereupon several lusty young men came, and tried their strength in vain; but that Moses, by being acquainted with the true pronunciation of the name of God, in virtue thereof, did it with ease, and so not only obtained his daughter, but this rod into the bargain, with which he wrought afterwards all his wonders in Egypt. But how fictitious soever all this may be, it is certain that in Exod. iv. 20. this staff is called 'the rod of God;' and that partly because it was appropriated to God's special service, to be the instrument of all his glorious works, and partly to show that whatever was done by that rod, was not done by any virtue in it, or in the hand of Moses, but merely by the power of God, who was pleased, for the greater confusion of his enemies, to use so mean an instrument. Nor is it an improbable conjecture, that the wands which great ministers are wont to carry in their hands, in token of their power and office, were originally derived from this of Moses.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7. and Poole's Annotations.

b He was, both in justice and decency, obliged to acquaint his father-in-law with his intention to leave Midian, and go into Egypt, because he had bound himself by an oath to live with him, and was resolved now to take his wife and children, as being well assured of a speedy return. But he thought fit to conceal from him the errand upon which God sent him, lest he should endeavour to hinder or discourage him from so difficult and dangerous an enterprise. So that Moses, in this instance, has given us a rare example of piety and prudence, in that he took care to avoid all occasions and temptations to disobedience to the divine commands; as well as of a singular modesty and humility, in that such glorious and familiar converse with God, and the high commission with which he had honoured him, made him neither forget the civility and duty which he owed to his father, nor break out into any public and vainglorious ostentation of such a privilege.—Poole's Annotations.

an angel appeared to him in the inn where he lodged, and, with a stern countenance, and flaming sword in his hand, threatened to kill him, because, by the persuasions of his wife, or his own indulgence, he had neglected to circumcise his younger son; which when his wife perceived, she immediately took a knife, made of a sharp flint, and therewith circumcising the child, pronounced over him the usual form of admission into the pale of the church;^d which when she had done, the angry vision disappeared, and gave signs that God was appeared.

While Moses was on his way to Egypt, Aaron, by a divine revelation, was informed thereof, and ordered to go and meet him in the wilderness. Not far from the mount of Horeb they met; and, after mutual embraces and endearments, Moses began to open unto him the purport of his commission, the instructions he had received from God, and the miraculous works he was empowered to show: and thus proceeding to Egypt, the two brothers called an assembly of the chief elders of the people, wherein Aaron declared unto them the message which God had sent by Moses, while Moses, to confirm the truth of his divine mission, wrought the several miracles which God had appointed him, before their eyes; insomuch that they were all fully convinced that he was a true prophet, come from the God of their fathers, who had at length commiserated their afflictions, and sent now to deliver them from their bondage: and with this persuasion, they kneeled down upon their knees, and worshipped God.

Not many days after, Moses and Aaron went to court, and having obtained admission to the king, requested of him that he would give the Israelites leave to go three days' journey into the wilderness, in order to perform a solemn service to the Lord their God. But Pharaoh was so far from complying with their request, that, know-

c Whether it was required that the instrument made use of in the circumcision of children, was to be of stone or flint, and whether the Hebrews never used any other, is a question very learnedly discussed by Pererius, in his disputation on this place. That the heathens performed such sort of abscisions with sharp flints or stones, is evident from several authors; and though Pererius determines against the constant use of the flint among the Hebrews in circumcision, and against its being prescribed or enjoined in the institution, yet there is great reason to presume, that this operation was never done with any other kind of instrument, before that of Joshua's circumcising the Israelites in the wilderness.—Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

d Exod. iv. 25. 'A bloody husband art thou to me.' The learned Joseph Mede, (Dissertation xiv. p. 52.) has given to these words of Ziphorah the following singular interpretation. He says that it was a custom among the Jews to name the child that was circumcised, by a Hebrew word, signifying a husband. He builds his opinion upon the testimony of some rabbins. He apprehends that she applied to the child, and not to Moses, as most interpreters think, the words above mentioned. Chaton, which is the term in the original, is never used to denote the relation between husband and wife, but that which is between a man and the father or mother of the person to whom he is married: it signifies a son-in-law, and not a husband. A person thus related is a son initiated into a family by alliance. It is in this view of initiated, that Ziphorah says to her son, 'a bloody husband art thou to me;' that is to say, it is I who have initiated thee into the church by the bloody sacrament of circumcision. He endeavours to justify his criticism upon the word chaton, by the idea which the Arabians affix to the verb from whence this noun is derived. The Chaldee Paraphrast also annexes the same notion to the words of Ziphorah. Saurin, (Dissertation on Old Test. vol. 1. p. 371.) does not seem altogether satisfied with this interpretation of the passage; whether it be just or not, must be left to the decision of the learned reader.—Ed.

ing no being superior to himself, he profanely questioned the existence of their God; or if there was such a thing, he could not see why they might not serve him in Egypt, as well as elsewhere; and therefore he positively refused to let them go.

The truth is, he suspected that they had a design of revolting from his service, and had been laying schemes to get out of his dominions. This to him was an argument that they had too much leisure; and an effectual way to check their indulging themselves in such contrivances, was to take care to leave them fewer vacant hours; and therefore he ordered greater tasks, and more work to be laid upon them. ^a He reprimanded Moses and Aaron for going among the people, and interrupting them in their employments. He gave their taskmasters charge, not to allow them any more ^b straw, and yet to

^a The words of Pharaoh are, 'Why do ye, Moses and Aaron, let the people from their works? Get ye to your burdens.' Which words seem to be directed, not so much to the elders of Israel, who might possibly go along with them, as to Moses and Aaron themselves; and so the sense of the reproof will be:—"So far am I from granting the liberty which you desire for the people, that, as a just punishment upon you for your seditious attempt, I command you also to go with the rest, to take your share in their burdens, and to perform the task which shall be required of you." And that so cruel a tyrant did not proceed farther against them, must be ascribed to the mighty power of God, who governs the spirits, and restrains the hands of the greatest kings, when he pleases. This seems to be a better account than what some of the Jewish fictions give us of it, namely, that when Moses and Aaron came into Pharaoh's presence, they were raised to a taller stature than they had before; had a splendour in their countenances, like that of the sun; and appeared with such majesty, as quite struck him with terror and astonishment.—Pool's Annotations, and Patrick's Commentary.

^b What the use of straw was in making bricks, is variously conjectured. Some think it was of no other use than to heat the kilns wherein they were burnt; others, who will have it that they were never burnt at all, imagine that it served only to cover them from the too intense heat of the sun, and that they might be baked gradually; but as it is evident that they were burnt in kilns, the most probable opinion is, that straw was mixed with the clay, to make them more solid. For, according to a passage in Lucilius, mentioned by Nonius Marcellus, straw was anciently employed to this purpose. "For what forms the side is made up of nothing more than common clay, mixed with straw, and mud mixed with chaff."

On this subject take the following accounts of modern travellers:—"The use of the chopt straw and stubble in making bricks," (Exod. v.) "was not as fuel to burn or bake them with, for which purpose surely neither of these is proper, but to mix with the clay, in order to make the bricks, which were dried, or baked in the sun, cohere." So Philo, who was himself of Alexandria in Egypt, expressly informs us, in Vit. Moysis. And from Dr Shaw, (Travels, p. 156.) we learn, that "some of the Egyptian pyramids are made of bricks, the composition whereof is only a mixture of clay, mud, and straw, slightly blended and kneaded together, and afterwards baked in the sun. The straw which keeps these bricks together, and still preserves its original colour, seems to be a proof that these bricks were never burnt or made in kilns." And as to the Egyptian manner of building in modern times, Mr Baumgarten, in his Travels, c. 18, speaking of Cairo in Egypt, says, "The houses for the most part are of brick that are only hardened by the heat of the sun, and mixed with straw to make them firm." (Collection of Voyages and Travels, 4 vols. folio, vol. 1, p. 443. See also, Complete System of Geography, vol. 2, p. 177, col. 1; Hasseltius's Travels, p. 100.) It is said that the unburnt bricks of Egypt formerly used, and still are, made of clay mixed with straw. The Egyptian pyramid of unburnt bricks, Dr Pococke (Observations on Egypt, p. 53.) says, seems to be made of the earth brought by the Nile, being a sandy black earth, with some pebbles and shells in it; it is mixed up with chopped straw, in order to bind the exact the same tale of bricks from them without abatement.

This charge the taskmasters, who were Egyptians, communicated to their under officers, who were Hebrews. And when the people, being forced, for want of straw, to wander all the country over to pick up stubble, had not time to make as many bricks as were exacted, these Hebrew officers were called to an account, and beaten. They, however, not well knowing from whence this unreasonable severity proceeded, whether from the royal edict, or the rigour of the taskmasters, addressed the king himself, and laid their grievances before him in the most humble manner. But so far were they from receiving any redress, that the answer returned them was, "That the king would have his edict executed, be it never so severe; and would exact from them their full number of bricks, though he was resolved to allow them no straw."

This answer was enough to run them to the utmost despair: and therefore, as they returned from the king, meeting Moses and Aaron, they discharged their grief and anger, though very unjustly, upon them; telling them, "That they had taken care to infuse an odium into the king against them, and given him a plausible handle to destroy them, which they wished in God might fall upon their own heads." These bitter expressions afflicted Moses to that degree, that he expostulated the matter with God, for suffering Pharaoh to be so exasperated against his people, and for having not in the least mitigated their afflictions, since the time that he first went to him.

His concern for the oppression of his brethren made him certainly forget the promise which God had given him, and the perverseness of Pharaoh, which he had foretold him: but, notwithstanding this, God was pleased to give him fresh assurances, that now the time was come, wherein he would manifest his almighty power, and exert the full force of the ^c name which he had taken clay together. The Chinese have great occasion for straw in making bricks, as they put thin layers of straw between them, without which they would, as they dried, run or adhere together.—Macartney's Emb., p. 269.—Ed.

^c The words of God upon this occasion are,—"I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of EL-SHADDAI, the Almighty God; but by my name JEHOVAH I was not known to them;" (Exod. vi. 3.) "But how can this be, when long before Moses' time, God is so frequently called by that name? For did not the sons of Seth call themselves by the name of Jehovah? Gen. iv. 26? Did not Abraham swear, and lift up his hands to Jehovah? Gen. xiv. 22? Did not he call the place where he went to offer Isaac, 'Jehovah-jireh?' Gen. xxii. 14? Did not the Lord say unto him, 'I am the God Jehovah, that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees?' Gen. xv. 7, 2? And when, in a vision, Jacob saw him stand before him, did not he say, 'I am Jehovah, the God of Abraham, thy father, and the God of Isaac?' Gen. xxxviii. 13? These passages make it impossible for God not to be known to the patriarchs under that name; and therefore several learned writers upon this text have deprehended a fault in our translation, and would have the latter part of the verse to be taken interrogatively, thus, 'By my name Jehovah was I not known unto them?' If we take the sentence interrogatively, say they, every one will see, that it plainly intimates, that the Lord had revealed himself unto them by this name, which is agreeable to the scripture account of the patriarchs' knowledge and worship of him; but to take the words without the interrogation, and suppose them to intend, that the Lord who appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, was not known to them by his name Jehovah, cannot be reconciled to some very express passages in the book of Genesis; unless we can suppose, upon himself, in the deliverance of his people from their bondage, and in the performance of the promises made to their forefathers, by giving them the land, the rich and plentiful land of Canaan in possession. With this God appointed Moses to acquaint the children of Israel, and to promise them, moreover, that he would make them his peculiar people, and take them under his immediate protection; so that in the event they should plainly see, that their deliverance and admission to the inheritance he had spoken of, was effected by that God who is always faithful to his promises. But though Moses failed not to carry these tidings to the people, yet such was their affliction of mind, upon the increase of their servitude, that they gave little or no attention to him.

A. M. 2433. A. C. 1571; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3763. A. C. 1648. EXOD. CH. i.—xiii.

God, however, pursuing the ends of his providence, commanded Moses to go again to the king, and demand the release of his people; and when he endeavoured to decline the office, upon pretence of the a impediment in that as Genesis was not written when God revealed this his name to Moses, Moses makes use of it by way of anticipation, because at the time when he wrote, the Jews commonly used it, though in the days when the patriarchs, whose lives he was giving some account of, lived, it was a thing utterly unknown. There is another way, however, of expounding these words, if, by the name Jehovah, we understand not the letters or syllables, but what is properly the import of it, namely, not only God's eternal existence, but his omnipotent power likewise, and unchangeable truth, which give being, as we may say, to his promises by the actual performance of them. That this is the sense of the word Jehovah, is apparent from several passages in this very book of Exodus. Thus, chap. vii. 5, 17, 'And the Egyptians shall know that I am Jehovah: for behold, I will strike with the rod, that is in thine hand, upon the rivers, and they shall be turned into blood:' so that the meaning of the whole passage will fairly be,—'That though God gave Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, such demonstrations of his power as could not but convince them that he would certainly perform his promises; yet they did not live to see the accomplishment of them, which he was now going to set before the Israelites. They believed in these things, but they did not experimentally know them. They had dreams and visions indeed, but Moses was the first that wrought miracles and prodigies. By these he made the name of the Lord known unto the world.' And therefore Maimonides well concludes from this place, that the prophetic spirit of Moses was more excellent than that which had been upon any before his time. (Pool's Annotations, Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries, and More Neuch. part 2. c. 35.)—See an elaborate dissertation on this subject, by Mr Bell, in his edition of Rollin, vol. 2. p. 521, et seq.—Ed.

a The phrase in the text is, 'uncircumcised in lips;' for as among the Jews, circumcision of any part denoted its perfection, so uncircumcision was set to signify its defectiveness, or ineptitude to the purposes for which it was designed. Thus the prophet says of the Jews, that 'their ear was uncircumcised,' and adds an explanation of it, because 'they cannot hearken,' Jer. vi. 10. Again he tells us, that 'the house of Israel were uncircumcised in the heart,' that is, would not understand and learn their duty, Jer. ix. 26. And in like manner here, 'uncircumcised lips' must mean a person that was a bad speaker, and wanted eloquence; and what might possibly induce Moses to make use of this metaphor, rather than any other, might be the consideration of his having so lately neglected to circumcise his son. Some are of opinion, that the word circumcision carries in it an idea of something superfluous in the part, and that therefore Moses' tongue might be either too long, or too big for his mouth, and that this might occasion either an inelegance or hesitation in his speech; but the more probable opinion is, that he was what we call tongue-tied, which his parents, either in their fright might not perceive, or in the general hurry and destruction of the children, might not dare to send for a proper person to remedy, until it was too late. However this be, it is certain, that as circumcision was the first and greatest sacrament among the Jews, so uncircumcision was esteemed by them the greatest scandal and disgrace; and therefore Moses perhaps thought it some disparage-

ment to him, that he was not able himself to deliver his mind in an handsome manner to Pharaoh; and therefore made mention of this again, to engage the divine majesty to circumcise his lips, as they term it, to remove this impediment in his speech, as we have some reason to believe that he did.—Percerius, Patrick's, and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

his speech, which he might possibly think was the reason why his own countrymen did not hearken unto him, and how then could he expect that Pharaoh should do it, in a matter so much to his loss? God, to remove this objection, told him,—b That there was no occasion for himself to speak unto Pharaoh, seeing he had constituted Aaron to be his interpreter; that he must not be discouraged at some few repulses; that Pharaoh, he knew, was a man of so obstinate a temper, that the more he was punished, the less he would relent, but that the less he relented, the more would his wonders be shown on him and his people; that to this purpose, he had invested him with the power of working miracles, which would make him justly terrible; and that therefore, when they came into Pharaoh's presence, and he demanded a proof of the truth of his mission, he should direct Aaron to cast his rod upon the ground, and it should immediately become a serpent.

With these instructions, Moses and Aaron came again to the king, and repeated the demand of his dismissing the Israelites; whereupon, when the king desired them to show him some miracle, thereby to induce him to believe, that the God whom they spake so much of, had really sent them, Aaron threw down his rod, which was instantly changed into a serpent; but, to confront this miracle, the king sent for the magicians and sorcerers of Egypt, and ordered them to try, if by their magical arts, they could cause the like transmutation. They attempted, and succeeded; they changed their rods into serpents, as the other had done, but with this remarkable difference, that Aaron's rod swallowed up all the rods of the magicians, which was enough to have convinced the proud monarch of the superior power of the God of Israel, had not his heart been so averse to the thoughts of parting with the Hebrews, that he did not let this circumstance make any due impression upon his mind.

Some time after this, Moses and Aaron put themselves

ment to him, that he was not able himself to deliver his mind in an handsome manner to Pharaoh; and therefore made mention of this again, to engage the divine majesty to circumcise his lips, as they term it, to remove this impediment in his speech, as we have some reason to believe that he did.—Percerius, Patrick's, and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

b God, to silence the objection which Moses had more than once made of his defectiveness in speech, tells him, 'I have made thee a god to Pharaoh, and Aaron shall be thy prophet,' Exod. vii. 1; by which he does not only mean, that he had invested him with an authority to require of Pharaoh an obedience to his commands, and upon his refusal, to inflict such punishments on him, as none but God could inflict; but that in executing the commission he was putting him upon, there was no occasion for him to speak to Pharaoh himself. That he had appointed Aaron to do; and therefore he might keep himself upon the reserve, and Pharaoh at an awful distance, just as God delivers his oracles to the people by the mediation of his prophets. Only there is one objection against the passage itself, which some imagine cannot be genuine, because Moses makes use of the word nabi, for a prophet, which in his days, must have been expressed by another; for so in 1 Sam. ix. 9, it is said that he who was now called nabi, a prophet, was before that time called roeh, a seer; which seems to imply, that nabi was not a word in use till Samuel's days. But this is very far from Samuel's meaning, whose plain sense is this,—That he who for told things to come, or discovered secrets, was anciently called a seer, not a prophet; for a prophet heretofore signified only, an interpreter of the divine will; but that now, in Samuel's days, they began to apply the word nabi, or prophet, to those who could reveal any secret, or foresee things to come.—Pool's Annotations, Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentary.

in the way of Pharaoh, as he was walking out to the ^a river Nile, and urging again the demand they had made for the departure of their brethren, as a farther sign that God had really sent them, upon Aaron's stretching out his hand, and touching the waters of the river with his rod, all the waters of the land of Egypt were turned into blood, and continued so for seven days; so that ^b the fish died, and the inhabitants had no water to drink, but were forced to dig in new places for some to allay their thirst. But Pharaoh, finding that his magicians did turn

^a The river Nile has its fountain-head in Upper Ethiopia, and flows through Nubia and Egypt. Below Cairo, where it is 1000 yards wide, it divides into two main branches, which again separate into several arms, the extreme eastern and western of which give to the lower part of Egypt the form of a delta. There were anciently reckoned seven principal mouths by which its waters were poured into the Mediterranean; only those of Damietta and Rosetta are at present navigable; the others have been choked up. The name Nile, according to Spineto (Lectures on Hieroglyphics), is Greek; the Egyptians calling it merely Iaro, which means river. The true Nile is formed by the confluence of the Bahr-el-Abiad (white river) and the Bahr-el-Azrek (blue river), in lat. 15° 40' N. The former, rising in Abyssinia, to the south-west of lake Dembea, comes from the south-east, and was considered by Bruce as the Nile. The latter, however, which comes from the south-west, and is supposed to rise in the Mountains of the Moon, brings down the greatest mass of water, and is considered by Cailliaud as the true Nile. This is a mere dispute about words. In lat. 17° 40', it receives the Tazaze from the east, enters Egypt in 24°, following nearly a northern course, and below Cairo (30° 15' N.) divides into the two main arms above-mentioned, the Damietta, or the eastern, and the Rosetta, or western branch. The distance from the confluence of its two head branches to the sea is about 1500 miles; from its highest sources, probably not far from 2500 miles. The cataracts so much celebrated by the ancients, modern discoveries have shown to be insignificant; they appear to be hardly any thing more than what, in America, are called rapids. In Upper Egypt, it is confined between two ranges of mountains, which leave only a narrow strip each side of the river. Near Cairo, the river valley widens, and the level nature of the country below allows it to spread itself over a wide plain. In Upper and Middle Egypt, there are great numbers of canals on the left bank of the river, which serve to irrigate the country: the principal, called the canal of Joseph, communicates with lake Morris. This is the only river in Egypt, and contains all the water the inhabitants have to drink, which made the turning it into blood an heavy judgment upon the people. The overflowing of the river, which most impute to the great rains which fall, and melt the snow in the mountains of Ethiopia, is the cause of all the plenty and fruitfulness of the whole country; and therefore Plutarch and several others tell us, that nothing was had in so much veneration among the Egyptians; that they adored and invoked it as the greatest of gods, not only under the name of Osiris, but of Orus and Jupiter likewise, and instituted in its honour the most solemn of their feasts; and therefore their conjecture, who think that Pharaoh went to pay his morning devotions to the river Nile, is much more plausible, than that of the Chaldee Paraphrast, namely, that he went to observe divination upon the water as a magician, when in all probability his business was no more than to bathe himself, as the custom among the Egyptians was to do almost every day.—Calmel's Dictionary, Wells's and Mull's Geographies, and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 3. c. 1.

^b Diodorus Siculus, in his description of Egypt, (b. 1. p. 32.) informs us, that the river Nile abounded with all manner of fish, though later travellers tell us, that there are not at present many in it, whether this be attributed to the muddiness of its water, or to the havoc which the crocodiles and other monsters of this river may be supposed to make in it. But whether ancient or modern geographers are right in this particular, it is certain, that this putrefaction of the water, and slaying the fish, was a heavy judgment upon the Egyptians, who abstained from the eating of most animals, whose liquor was generally water, and whose constant food was the fruits of the earth, and the fish of this river.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

water into blood likewise, and supposing the thing on both sides to be equally performed by magical skill, was not convinced by the miracle, and so refused to let the Israelites depart.

When the seven days were expired, Moses and Aaron came again unto him, requiring the dismissal of the people, and withal assuring him, that if he did not grant their request, they should bring a plague of ^c frogs upon all the land; and when the king seemed to set them at defiance, Moses ordered Aaron to stretch his rod again over the waters; upon doing of which there came up abundance of frogs, so as to cover the whole land of Egypt, and to swarm in their houses, their chambers, their beds, and the very places where their victuals were dressed; but here it also happened, that the magicians likewise performed the same, so that Pharaoh was not much influenced by this miracle. Only, as his magicians could not remove the frogs, he was forced to apply himself to Moses for relief, who, upon his address to God, had them all destroyed the next day, according to the time that he had prefixed; but when they were gathered into heaps, their number was so great, that before they could well be disposed of, they infected the air, and made the whole land stink.

There were several other miracles wrought by Moses and Aaron in the like manner. The swarms of ^d lice which the magicians could not imitate; the murrain, or mortality among their cattle, wherein the Israelites were exempted; ^e the plague of flies; the boils inflicted upon

^c The river Nile naturally produces frogs; but so great an abundance appearing on a sudden, filling the country, and leaving the rivers and fields, to go into the cities and houses, was really miraculous. How they got into the cities and houses is not so hard a matter to conceive; for if expert generals, according to both ancient and modern history, have sometimes surprised an enemy by entering cities through the common sewers, with much less difficulty might the frogs, these armies of the divine vengeance, find a conveyance into the cities, which stood all upon the banks of the river, by aqueducts and subterraneous communications; and being got into the cities, they might find apertures in the walls of the houses, in which the inhabitants never perceived before.—Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

^d Some would have the word cinnim, which we render lice, to signify gnats. The Septuagint calls them Κνίσις; but what kind of creatures these are, is not so certainly known. Others would have them to be a new species of animals, called analogically by an old name; or if they were lice, that they were such as had wings, and cruelly stung and ulcerated the Egyptians. But upon the supposition that they were no worse than common lice, this was plague enough to the Egyptians, who affected neatness to such a degree, that they bathed themselves every day, and some of them frequently shaved their bodies all over, for fear of such vermin. Those who pretend that these lice were a new species, make this a reason why the magicians could not counterfeit this miracle, because, though they could easily provide the serpents, the blood, and the frogs, yet this sort of animal was now nowhere to be had; and therefore, as the organs of sight are more liable to be imposed upon than those of feeling, the magicians might impose upon the king, and the other spectators, with fantastical blood and frogs, but visionary lice could not vex and torment the body; so that now it was time for the enchanters to desert, and to own their inability to mimic Moses any farther. But supposing, that what the magicians did, in the three former miracles, was not illusion and imposition upon the senses, but reality, the true reason why they could proceed no farther was, that God Almighty had laid his restraint and prohibition upon the evil spirits, who had hitherto been subservient to them, that they might not assist them any longer.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Bibliotheca Biblica in locum.

^e The word arab, which we render fly in general, is by the Septuagint called Ερυσια, that is, σνι, fly, from its biting; for it the magicians themselves; ^a the terrible thunder and lightning, ^b rain and hail, which destroyed the fruits of the earth; the plague of the ^c locusts, or grasshoppers, which devoured what escaped from the hail; and that of thick ^d darkness, which covered all Egypt for three days, fastens its teeth so deep in the flesh, and sticks so very close, that it oftentimes makes cattle run mad; and the congruity of this plague seems to be greater, because one of the Egyptian deities, which they call Anubis, bore the head of a dog. The Psalmist indeed tells us, that 'God sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured them,' Ps. lxxviii. 45. So that, according to him, it was not one particular kind, but all sorts of flies mingled together in one prodigious swarm or conflux. Some translate it, a mixture of beasts, which they suppose went into Egypt to infest and destroy the country; but this is not so probable a construction, because the punishments hitherto inflicted were nauseous and trouble-some, rather than mortal; though this plague of infinite numbers of small tormentors, is so great a one, that God calls it 'his army,' Joel ii. 25; and the Greeks thought fit (as P'hy, h. 20. c. 28, tells us) to have a god to deliver them from it, under the style of Myiagos, or Myiodes, even as Beelzebub signifies the lord or god of flies.—Bochart, Hier. part 2.

^a The Hebrew word shechin properly signifies an inflammation, which first makes a tumour or boil, as we translate it, and thence turns a grievous ulcer. Dr Lightfoot indeed observes, that in the book of Job, chap. ii. 7, 8, where the same word occurs, it signifies only a burning itch, or an inflamed scab; an intolerable dry itch, which Job could not scratch off with his nails, and was therefore forced to make use of a potsherd; but then he confesses that this shechin here spoken of, was more rancorous than that, having blains and ulcers that broke out with it, which Job's had not. So that the Egyptians, according to this, must have been vexed with a triple punishment at once, a punishment fitly calculated for the mortification of a delicate and voluptuous people, aching boils, nauseous ulcers, and a burning itch; and to this that commination of Moses to the people, in case they proved disobedient, does, without all peradventure, allude, 'The Lord will smite thee with the botch of Egypt, and with the emerods, and with the scab, and with the itch, whereof thou canst not be healed,' Deut. xxxiii. 27.

Exod. ix. 8. 'And the Lord said unto Moses and unto Aaron, take to you handfuls of ashes of the furnace, and let Moses sprinkle it toward the heaven, in the sight of Pharaoh. And it shall become small dust in all the land of Egypt, and shall be a boil breaking forth with blains upon man, and upon beast, throughout all the land of Egypt.' 'It is said, that when this evil was to be brought upon the Egyptians, Aaron and Moses were ordered to take ashes of the furnace, and Moses was to scatter them up towards heaven, that they might be wafted over the face of the country. This mandate was very determinate, and to the last degree significant. The ashes were to be taken from that fiery furnace, which in the scriptures was used as a type of the Israelites' slavery, and of all the cruelty which they experienced in Egypt. The process was still a farther allusion to an idolatrous and cruel rite, which was common among the Egyptians, and to which it is opposed as a contrast. They had several cities styled Typhonium, such as Heliopolis, Idithyia, Abari, and Busiris; in these, at particular seasons, they sacrificed men. The objects thus destined were persons of bright hair, and a particular complexion, such as were seldom to be found amongst the native Egyptians. Hence we may infer that they were foreigners; and it is probable, that while the Israelites resided in Egypt, they were chosen from their body. They were burnt alive upon an high altar, and thus sacrificed for the good of the people. At the close of the sacrifice, the priests gathered together the ashes of their victims, and scattered them upwards in the air, I presume with this view, that where any atom of this dust was wafted, a blessing might be entailed. The like was done by Moses with the ashes of the fiery furnace, but with a different intention; they were scattered abroad, that where any the smallest portion alighted, it might prove a plague and a curse to this ungrateful, cruel, and infatuated people. Thus, there was a designed contrast in these workings of providence—an apparent opposition to the superstition of the times.'—Bryant on the Plagues of Egypt, p. 116. Magee on Atonement and Sacrifices, Diss. 5.—Ed.

^b This infliction was the more terrible in Egypt, because, according to the account of Herodotus, (b. 3. c. 10.) a very rare thing it was to see any rain, and much more, any hail, in that climate; and accordingly he mentions it as a kind of prodigy, that in the reign of Psammenitus, there happened to be a shower in Thebes, which was never known before in the memory of man, nor ever after, to the age wherein our author wrote. The psalmist has given us a very poetic description of this judgment: 'he destroyed the vines with hail, and the sycamore trees with frost; he gave up the cattle also to the hail, and their flocks to hot thunderbolts,' Ps. lxxviii. 47, 48. And from the plain account of Moses, where he mixes thunder, hail, and fire together, (Exod. ix. 23,) the observation is obvious, that here were no less than three of the elements in confederacy against Pharaoh's obstinacy; the air in the thunder; the water in the hail; and the fire in the lightning, all jointly demonstrating and proclaiming, that the God of Israel was the God of nature.

^c This is the creature which we properly call the grasshopper; and wonderful is the account which several authors give of them. Thevenot, in his Travels, tells us, "That in that part of Scythia which the Cossacks now inhabit, there are infinite numbers of them, especially in dry seasons, which the north-east wind brings over from Tartary, Circassia, and Mingrelia, which are seldom or never free from them; that they fly in the air all compact together, like a vast cloud, sometimes 15 or 18 miles long, and about 10 or 12 miles broad; so that they quite darken the sky, and make the brightest day obscure; and that wherever they light, they devour all the corn in less than two hours' time, and frequently make a famine in the country. 'These insects,' says he, "live not above six months; and when they are dead, the stench of them so corrupts and infects the air, that it very often breeds dreadful pestilences." God, as we hinted before, calls the locust, 'the canker-worm, and the caterpillar, and the palmer-worm, his great army,' which he sends amongst a wicked and rebellious people, (Joel ii. 25.) And how proper the expression is, in relation to the locust in particular, will appear from the account which Aldrovandus and Pinzelius give us of these animals, namely, "that in the year of our Lord 852, an infinite number of them was seen to fly over twenty miles in Germany in one day, in the manner of a formed army, divided in several squadrons, and having their quarters apart when they rested; that the captains marched a day's journey before the rest, and chose the most opportune places for their camp; that they never removed until sunrising, at which time they went away in as much order as an army of men could do: that at last, having done great mischief wherever they passed, after prayers made to God, they were driven by a violent wind into the Belgic ocean, and there drowned; but that, being cast by the sea upon the shore, they covered 140 acres of land, and caused a great pestilence in the country;" which is enough to show how dreadful a punishment this was, especially considering, that these locusts were such as were never known before.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^d The Septuagint, and most translations, render it, 'a darkness which might be felt,' that is, consisting of black vapours and exhalations, so condensed, that they might be perceived by the organs of touch. But some commentators think, that this is carrying the sense too far, since, in such a medium as this, mankind could not live an hour, much less for the space of three days, as the Egyptians are said to have done; and therefore they imagine, that instead of a darkness that may be felt, the Hebrew phrase may signify a darkness wherein men were groping and feeling about for every thing they wanted. And in this sense the author of the life of Moses certainly takes it. "For in this darkness," says he, "they who were in bed durst not get up; and such as their natural occasions compelled to get up, went feeling about by the walls, or any other thing they could lay hold on, as if they had been blind." What it was that occasioned this darkness, whether it was in the air, or in their eyes; whether it was a suspension of light from the sun in that country, or a black and thick vapour, which totally intercepted it; there is reason to think, that the description which the author of the book of Wisdom gives us of their inward terrors and consternation is not altogether conjectural, namely, 'That they were not only prisoners of darkness, and fettered with the bonds of a long night, but were horribly astonished likewise, and troubled with strange apparitions: for while over them was spread an heavy night, they while the land of Goshen, where the Israelites lived, was enlightened as usual. All these miracles, performed by the word of Moses, did not a little perplex the king. He found that all the power and learning of the magicians could not equal them. Upon attempting one of them, they themselves confessed that it was done by the finger of God; and in the case of another, they were equally sufferers in the common calamity: so that the king's heart was several times almost overcome. He offered the Israelites leave to perform their religious offices to their God, provided they would do it in Egypt; but their religion, as Moses told him, was so very different from the Egyptian, that were they to do what God required of them in Egypt, the inhabitants would rise up against them, and stone them. The king, after this, offered that they might go out of the kingdom, provided adult persons only would go, and leave their children behind, as pledges for their return; but to this Moses peremptorily replied, that none should be left behind, the young and the old should go together; which enraged Pharaoh so, that with some severe menaces, he ordered him to depart from his presence. However, as he found the plagues increase upon him, he came to a farther concession, and was willing that the people should go, but only that their flocks and their herds should be stayed, as rightly supposing, that this might be a means to accelerate their return: but Moses positively insisted, that all their substance should be taken with them, and not one hoof be left behind; whereupon Pharaoh grew so exceedingly angry, that he charged him to be gone from his presence, and never attempt to see him more, for that, if he did, he would certainly put him to death.

Moses, however, by the divine command, went once more to Pharaoh, with the severest message he had ever brought him, and represented to him, that at midnight God would strike dead the first-born of every family throughout all the land of Egypt, and that thereupon there should be such a dread, and terror among the Egyptians, that they would come to him in the most submissive manner, and beg of him to lead the people out of the land; and after that, said he, I shall go: which put Pharaoh into such a rage, that Moses, having no intention to incense and provoke him farther, turned away, and left him.

Four days before this, God had instructed Moses and Aaron to direct the people to prepare the passover, which was to be a feast in commemoration of their departure out of Egypt; because the night before they left it, the destroying angel, who slew the first-born of the Egyptians, passed over the houses of the Israelites, without doing them any harm, they being marked with a The words in the text are, 'Lo, shall we sacrifice the abominations of the Egyptians before their eyes, and shall they not stone us?' Exod. viii. 26. Where the interrogation, having in it the full force of an affirmation, makes the sense of the words to be this: "If we should offer those creatures which the Egyptians worship for gods, as the ox and the sheep, they doubtless will be affronted to see us sacrifice their gods to our God." For that the Egyptians did look upon several animals with a sacred veneration, is evident from that known passage in the satirist:—"The fleece-bearing animals are served up on no table; and it is a crime to butcher their young."—Javen. sat. 15.

the blood of the lamb, which was killed the evening before. And the injunction which Moses gave the people, was to this effect:—That ^b every family of Israel, or if the family was too little, two neighbouring families joining together, should on the tenth day of the month, take a lamb or a kid, ^c and shut it up until the fourteenth day, and then kill it; that the lamb was to be a male, not above a year old, and without any manner of blemish; that when they killed it, they should catch its blood in a vessel, and with a bunch of hyssop dipped in it, sprinkle the lintel and side posts of the outer door, and so not stir out of the house until next morning; that in the mean time, they were to eat the lamb or kid, dressed whole, and without breaking a bone of it, neither raw nor sodden, but roasted with unleavened bread, and bitter herbs; that if there was more than they could dispense with, no stranger was to eat of it, and therefore they were to burn it; and, lastly, that the posture in which they were to eat it, was to be in a hurry, with their clothes on, and their staves in their hands, as if they were just upon the point of going. ^a

^b Some learned men are of opinion, that God, in the institution of the passover, had respect to these impious rites, which either then did prevail, or in a short time were to prevail, among the Egyptians, and other nations where the Israelites were to dwell. Thus they tell us, "That God appointed a lamb to be slain, and eaten, and the month Nisan or March to be the particular time of eating it, in contempt of the Egyptians, who at that time, when the sun first entered into Aries, began their solemn worship and adoration of this creature, and that celestial sign; that he forbade the people to eat the flesh of the paschal lamb raw, or sodden, to break its bones, or leave any fragment of it, because, in the profane feasts of Babelus, it was a custom to eat the raw flesh of the victims, which they offered to that god, and to break all their bones; and in the adoration of the Isis, whom the Egyptians, and from them the Athenians, reputed goddesses, they boiled all their sacrifices, and carried constantly some part of them home, as a good preservative against misfortunes." But there is no need, one would think, for such elaborate explanations, when, considering the situation the Israelites were in, sorely oppressed by the Egyptians, and shortly to be released, and sent away with all speed, the nature and quality of the paschal sacrifice, as well as the manner of dressing and manner of eating it, may perfectly be accounted for. Thus, it was to be a male, because a more excellent species than the female; 'without blemish,' to render it acceptable to God; 'under a year old,' otherwise it could not properly be called 'a lamb,' and 'set apart from the rest of the flock,' that it might be in readiness when the people came in haste to offer it. 'Roasted it was to be, and not boiled,' because roasting was the speedier way of dressing it; but 'roasted thoroughly,' because the whole was to be eaten; and 'the whole was to be eaten,' that none might be left for the Egyptians to profane. It was to be eaten 'standing, and in haste,' and with other circumstances of men every moment expecting to begin their journey; 'with bitter herbs,' to put them in mind of their cruel servitude; and 'unleavened bread,' in memory of their deliverance from it, so suddenly, that they had not even time to leaven their bread for their journey; which is all that the Israelites understood, and all perhaps that God at that time intended they should understand by the directions which he gave them concerning this remarkable ordinance.—Spencer de Rit. Heb. Tom. 1. b. 2. c. 4.

^c Exod. xii. 3. 'In the tenth day of this month, they shall take to themselves every man a lamb,' ver. 6. 'and ye shall keep it up until the fourteenth day of the same month.' From hence it appears that the lamb was to be taken from the flock four days before it was killed. For this the rabbis assign the following reasons: that the providing of it might not, through a hurry of business, especially at the time of their departure from Egypt, be neglected till it was too late; that by having it before their eyes so considerable a time, they might be more effectually reminded of the mercy of their deliverance out of Egypt; and likewise to prepare them for so great a solemnity as the approaching feast. On these accounts, some of the rabbis inform us, it was customary to have the lamb tied these four days to their bed posts; a rite which they make to be necessary and essential to the passover in all ages.—Jennings' Jewish Ant. vol. 2. p. 187.—Ed.

When every thing was thus in readiness for their departure, God, in the middle of the night, by his destroying angel, ^b slew the first-born of every house in

^a Exod. xii. 15. 'Seven days shall ye eat unleavened bread.' As by the law of Moses, no leaven of any kind was to be kept in the houses of the Israelites for seven or eight days, it might have been productive of great inconvenience, had they not been able by other means to supply the want of it. The MS. Chardin informs us, that they use no kind of leaven whatever in the east, but dough kept till it is grown sour, which they preserve from one day to another. In wine countries, they use the lees of wine as we do yeast. If, therefore, there should be no leaven in all the country for several days, yet in twenty-four hours, some would be produced, and they would return to their preceding state. (Harmer, vol. 1. p. 253.)—'The first day ye shall put away leaven out of your houses.' Concerning this matter the modern Jews are superstitiously exact and scrupulous. The master of the family makes a diligent search into every hole and crevice throughout the house, lest any crumb of unleavened bread should remain in it; and that not by the light of the sun or moon, but of a candle. And in order that this exactness may not appear altogether superfluous and ridiculous, care is taken to conceal some scraps of unleavened bread in some corner or other, the discovery of which occasions mighty joy. This search, nevertheless, strict as it is, does not give him entire satisfaction. After all, he beseeches God, that all the unleavened bread that is in the house, as well as what he has found, may become like the dust of the earth, and be reduced to nothing. They are also very exact and scrupulous in making their bread for the feast, lest there should be anything like leaven mixed with it. The corn, of which it is made, must not be carried to the mill on the horse's bare back, lest the heat of the sun should make it ferment. The sack in which it is put, must be carefully examined, lest there should be any remainder of old meal in it; the dough must be made in a place not exposed to the sun, and must be put into the oven immediately after it is made, lest it should ferment itself.—Jennings's Jewish Ant. vol. 2. p. 211.—Ed.

^b The word Tekor, signifies sometimes a person of some eminence or excellence, as well as the first-born; and therefore it may not be an unreasonable supposition, that where a family had no first-born, the principal or most eminent person was smitten with death; which is certainly better than to imagine, with some, both Jewish and Christian interpreters, that the words of Moses are only applicable to an house that had a first-born, or with St. Austin, that Providence did so order it at this time, that every house had a first-born. Since this, however, is the concluding judgment which God sent upon the Egyptians, it may not be improper here to inquire a little how long Moses was in working all these miracles. According to Archbishop Usher, then, who has included them all within the space of one month, we may suppose, that about the 18th of the sixth month, was sent the plague of the 'waters turned into blood,' which ended seven days after. On the 25th came the second plague of frogs, which was removed the day following, and on the 27th, that of the lice. About the 28th, Moses threatened the fourth plague of flies, and inflicted them on the 29th. On the 1st of the next month, which was afterwards made the first month of the year, he foretold the plague of the murrain, and inflicted it the next; and on the 3d, the sixth plague of boils, which fell upon the magicians themselves. About the 4th day, he foretold the seventh plague of thunder and hail, and on the 5th inflicted it. On the 7th, he threatened the eighth plague of locusts, and having sent them the day following, removed them on the 9th. On the 10th, he instituted the feast of the passover, and brought upon Egypt the ninth plague of darkness, which lasted for three days; and on the 11th he foretold the tenth, namely, the destruction of all their first-born, which came to pass the night following. This seems to be a reasonable period of time; and the gradual increase of these judgments are somewhat remarkable. The four first plagues were loathsome, rather than fatal to the Egyptians; but after that of the flies, came the murrain, which chiefly spent its rage upon the cattle; the boils and blains reached both man and beast, though there was still a reserve for life. The hail and locusts extended, in a great measure, even to life itself; the first by an immediate stroke, and both consequently by destroying the fruits of the earth. That of darkness added consternation to their minds, and lashes to their consciences; and when all this would not reclaim, at length came the decisive blow; first the excision of the first-born, and then the drowning of the incorrigible tyrant and all his host: 'Great and marvellous are thy works, O Lord God Almighty! just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints!'—Rev. xv. 3.

observe, that in the fifth year of Concharis, (whom Josephus, from Manetho, calls Timeus, and who, according to Syncellus, was the twenty-fifth king of the land of Tanis, or Lower Egypt,) there came a numerous army of unknown people, and invaded Egypt on a sudden. They overran both the Upper and Lower Egypt; burned the cities, killed the inhabitants, and, having in a little time subdued all before them, made one of their leaders, whose name was Salatis, their king; who, as soon as he was settled on a throne, laid the land under tribute, made its ancient inhabitants his slaves; and gave the possession of their estates to his own people. Who this Salatis and his followers, who called themselves pastors or shepherds, were, is not so easy a matter to discover. The most probable conjecture is, that they were some of the Horites, whom the children of Esau drove out of Seir, a country which lay to the east and south of the Dead Sea, because the Horites were a people who lived by pasture, and happened to be expelled their own country much about this time. Egypt indeed was a very flourishing kingdom, but so far from being famous for war, that we read of none of their exploits of this kind from the time of their first establishment to this very day. They consumed their time in ease and wealth, and luxury; and therefore the Horites, if they were the Horites, might easily conquer them, and gain themselves a settlement in their kingdom, even as the Arcadians did in Thrace, and the Pelasgi, and afterwards the Trojans, in Italy.

However this be, the government of Egypt being by this means subverted, the protection and happiness which the Israelites enjoyed perished with it. This new king, as the Scripture calls him, knew nothing of Joseph, nor did he regard any establishment which he had made. He had forced his way into Egypt with his sword, and settled his people by conquest, in such a manner and upon such terms as he thought fit: only as the Hebrews were a great and increasing people, inhabiting those parts which he most suspected, and fearing lest, if any invasion should happen from the east, or any insurrection among the ancient inhabitants, they possibly might join with them, and so endanger his new acquisition, he thought it a point of good policy to use all proper means to keep them effectually under.

One of the great mysteries in the dispensations of providence is, God's making choice of the children of Israel for his peculiar people, when it is so manifest, as Moses roundly tells them, that they were a stiff-necked nation, and ¹ 'had been rebellious from the very first day that he knew them.' ² 'God will be gracious to whom he will be gracious, and will shew mercy to whom he will shew mercy;' but upon supposition that the children of Israel did not behave so well during their abode in Egypt, that they neglected the worship of the true God, and complied too much with the idolatrous customs of the country, this will afford us reason enough, why God might suffer their sorrows to be multiplied, and their enemies to ride over their backs.' ³ 'He does not,' indeed, 'afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men;' and therefore we may presume, that this severe chastisement of his rod was to make them smart for some great and national defection; was to remind them of their sad degeneracy from the virtue of their ancestors; and so, in the phrase of the prophet, ⁴ 'to look unto the rock whence they were hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence they were digged; to look unto Abraham their father, and unto Sarah that bore them.'

But even putting the case that they had not been thus culpable; yet, since ⁵ 'whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth,' who can say, but that God might justly permit such calamities to befall a people whom he had adopted for his own, the more to exercise their virtue and patience, and resignation to the divine will; ⁶ the more to keep up a distinction between them and the Egyptians, which a friendly usage might have destroyed; the more to prepare and make them willing to leave Egypt, whenever God should send them an order to depart: and the more to heighten the relish of their future deliverance, and to make them more thankful, more obedient to him, and his injunctions, upon every remembrance of that house of bondage, wherein they had suffered so much, and been so long detained?

Of all the writers of the histories of their own times, there is none to be compared to Moses in this regard, that he reveals his own faults and blemishes, which he might have easily concealed, and conceals many things recorded in other authors, which might have redounded to his own immortal honour. He might have concealed the near consanguinity between his father and mother, which, in after ages, made marriages unlawful, though then perhaps it might be dispensed with. He might have concealed his murder of the Egyptian, and, for fear of apprehension, his escape into Midian. He might have concealed his aversion to the office of rescuing his brethren from their bondage; the many frivolous excuses he made, and the flat denial he gave God at last, till God was in a manner forced to obtrude it upon him. He might have concealed his neglect in not circumcising his son, which drew God's angry resentment against him, so that he met him and would have slain him. He might have concealed some peevish remonstrances he made to God when Pharaoh proved obstinate, and refused to comply. Above all, he might have concealed the whole story of the magicians, their working three miracles equally with him, and every other circumstance that seemed to eclipse his glory: but instead of this, we may observe, that as he makes a large chasm in his life, from his childhood to his being forty years old, and from forty to fourscore; so he has left us nothing of the incomparable beauty and comeliness of his person; nothing of the excellency of his natural parts, and politeness of his education; nothing of his Ethiopian expedition, the conquests he made there, and the posts of honour which he held in the Egyptian court; nothing indeed of all his transactions of the preceding part of his life, but what the author to the Hebrews has taken care to transmit, namely, ⁷ 'that when he came to years, he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season.' So that here we have a signal evidence of the truth and honesty of our historian, that in the passages of his own life, he conceals such as an impostor, would be found to emblazon, and discovers others which any man of art and design would be glad to conceal; though even some of these passages, which at first sight may seem to deserve some blame, upon a farther inquiry, may be found to be excusable at least, if not to be justified.

Whoever was the author of the book of Job, it is certain, that he was a writer of great antiquity, and yet he makes it a part of the character of that righteous man, that he ¹ ‘delivered the poor, when he cried, and the fatherless, and him that had no helper;’ that ‘he brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth.’ If this may be thought to relate to Job, as a public magistrate only, there is a direction in the Proverbs of Solomon, which seems to be of a more general concernment; ² ‘If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain; if thou sayest, Behold, we knew it not; doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? And he that keepeth thy soul, doth not he know it? And shall not he render to every man according to his works?’ If this be thought again not to affect Moses at all, as being at this time an inhabitant of Egypt; there was in Egypt likewise a law, ³ which perhaps at this time was in force, and obligatory upon all, namely, ‘That whoever saw his fellow creature either killed by another, or violently assaulted, and did not either apprehend the murderer, or rescue the oppressed if he could: or if he could not, made not an information thereof to the magistrate, himself should be put to death.’ Now the history tells us, that ⁴ ‘when Moses went out into his brethren, he looked on their burdens, and spied an Egyptian smiting an Hebrew.’ So that it is but supposing, that this Egyptian was one of the taskmasters, as the burdens here mentioned seem to denote, who so barbarously treated the Hebrews, and was now going to beat one of them to death; and according to the law of the land, which seems indeed to be the law of all nations, then in being, he was obliged to interpose; and if, upon his interposition, the Egyptian turned upon him, and assaulted him briskly, which is no hard matter to imagine, he was obliged, in his own defence, to slay him.

⁵ To complain to the magistrate in this case, and implore the assistance of the law, was to no manner of purpose. The whole civil power was lodged in such hands as had secret instructions from court to vex and ill treat the Israelites; and when matters were come to this crisis, that oppression ruled, and the government was turned into a mere latrocinny, private force upon any proper occasion, must be deemed lawful in all, but in Moses much more so, since he was either moved and animated thereunto by a divine impulse, or invested before it happened, (as ⁶ St Stephen’s comment upon the place gives us reason to think he was so invested,) with the title and office of deliverer of the people of God.

That the names both of persons and things were of the greatest importance to be rightly understood, in order to attain the truest knowledge that could be had of their natures, was the opinion both of Jews and heathens; and some of the earliest writers of the Christian church have speculated upon this subject, with so much philosophical subtlety, as to build thereon many foolish fancies and ridiculous errors. It cannot be denied, indeed, but that God, in giving some names that are recorded in Scripture, had respect to the nature and circumstances of the persons to whom they belonged; and that, in imitation of him, men endeavoured, even from the beginning, to give names as expressive of the properties of the things named, as human wisdom could direct them; and therefore, without troubling ourselves with what the ancients have offered concerning the science of names, we may from hence deduce the true reason why Moses desired to be informed, at this time more especially, what the name of God was.

If we consider the small advances which philosophy had made, we cannot imagine that men at this time had a sufficient knowledge of the works of the creation, to be able thereby to demonstrate the attributes of God; nor could they by speculation form proper and just notions of his nature. Some of them, indeed, the philosophers of that age, thought themselves wise enough to attempt these subjects; but what was the success? ⁷ ‘professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God.’ After they had speculated never so long on any element, the fire, air, or water, the convex of the firmament, the circle of the stars, or the lights of heaven, not forming true notions of their natures, they were either delighted with their beauty, or astonished with their power, and so framing very high, but false estimates of them, they lost the knowledge of the work-master, and took the parts of his workmanship to be God.

Moses, indeed, might be a man of excellent parts; but we carry our compliment too far, if we think him not liable to have fallen into these, or perhaps more dangerous errors, had he endeavoured to form his notions of God, either from the Egyptian, or any other learning that was then extant in the world. Faith, or a belief of what God had revealed, was the only principle upon which he could hope rightly to know God; and this was the principle which Moses here desires to go upon. For as the revelation which God had hitherto made of himself was but short and imperfect; so Moses, by desiring to know God’s name, desired that he might have some revelation of his nature and attributes vouchsafed him; for that the name of God does frequently signify the divine nature and attributes, is evident from several passages in Scripture.

When Moses desired to see God’s glory, he obtained, that the name of the Lord should be proclaimed before him, and the proclamation was, ⁸ ‘The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin.’ And in like manner, Isaiah, prophesying what the Messiah should be, declares his name to be, ⁹ ‘Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace.’ In both these places, and many more that might be produced to the same purpose, the name denotes the nature of God; and therefore the design of Moses, in asking God’s name, was to obtain an information of the divine attributes, in order to carry a report of them to his brethren. And indeed, considering that Moses was the first that ever carried a message from God to man, it was natural for the Israelites to ask him by what name or peculiar attribute, he had made himself known unto him, so as to authorize him to speak to them in such a manner as no man before had ever done; which question he could not pretend to answer, unless God by revelation thought fit to enable him; and therefore he desired to be confirmed, as far as the divine goodness would be pleased to discover, what name he would be called by, as knowing very well, that, by obtaining this, he might form proper notions of his nature and perfections.

And accordingly we may observe, that this great appellation which God is here pleased to give of himself, expresses his incomprehensible nature in such open and proper character, that St Hilary, as he tells us of himself, lighting on these words before he was a Christian, and as he was musing about God and religion, was struck with admiration, because he could think of nothing so proper and essential to God, as to be. God himself, however, chooses to express the word in the future tense, on purpose, as some imagine, to show that he is the only being that can truly say, "I shall, or will be, what I am;" forasmuch as all other beings derive their existence from him, and may be deprived of that existence whenever he pleases.

What knowledge the wisest of the heathen world might have of this incommunicable name of God, without the help of revelation, is a matter of great uncertainty. It is more than probable that Plato's definition of a God, namely, "a being that is always, and had no beginning," was borrowed from these words of Moses: but there is a passage in Plutarch, which mentions an inscription in the temple of Delphos, consisting of these letters EI, a contraction, as some imagine, of EIMI, I am, which (according to the opinion of ¹ a great judge in those days) was one of the most perfect names and titles of the Deity, seeing it imported, that "though our being is uncertain, precarious, temporary, and subject to change, so that no man can say of himself, in a strict and absolute sense, I am; yet we may with great propriety give the Deity this appellation, because God is independent, immutable, eternal, always and everywhere the same:" for, ² "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, the first and the last, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty."

But all this would not work upon Moses to undertake the office to which God called him; and yet when we come to consider his case, we cannot altogether accuse him of perverseness or obstinacy. About forty years before, he had felt some extraordinary motion in himself, and as he was then in the fervour of his youth, he took it for a certain indication that God intended to make use of him as an instrument for his people's deliverance; but then he was a far greater man than now. The princess (if alive) who had adopted him for her son, supported his interest at court; or if dead, had in all probability left him a fortune sufficient to procure himself one. But now age had made him cool and considerate. The loss of his patroness had quashed all aspiring thoughts. A long habitude had perfectly reconciled him to an obscure course of life: and therefore, as one loath to be roused from his solitude, ³ "Who am I," says he, "that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt?"

He had already experimentally known the ingratitude and disingenuity of the Hebrews: ⁴ "When he supposed they would have understood, that God, by his hand, would have delivered them," he voluntarily offered his service; but their rejection of him, when in the height of his power, upon so great an alteration in his circumstances, took away all hopes of success in so difficult an enterprise. So that the principal error which Moses incurred upon this occasion, was no more than a distemper incident to the generality of mankind, namely, the measuring of God by himself, and judging of events from the probabilities or improbabilities of second causes.

But there is another reason not to be dissembled, which might possibly deter Moses from returning into Egypt, and that was the blood of the man for which he had fled into Midian, and his certain knowledge of the laws of that land, namely, ⁵ that "whoever killed another, whether he was bond or free, was not to escape with his own life." Just before God appeared to him in the bush, and had this discourse with him, we read, that ⁶ the king of Egypt died, that king, to wit, in whose reign he had slain the Egyptian, and who sought to apprehend him, that he might put him to death. But as Moses kept no manner of correspondence with Egypt, the news of this king's death might not have reached his ears, or if it had, he might reasonably think, that some surviving relation of the slain man might enter a process against him for the murder. So that here he fell into a passion, which is hardly separable from human nature, namely, the love of life and dread of punishment; and which in him was the more excusable, because God as yet had not cleared his mind from the fear and suspicion it lay under.

It must not be denied then, but that there were some tokens of human frailty in Moses' last refusal of the commission which was offered him; but then there is this to say in excuse, that the most excellent persons are the least forward to embrace the offers of great preferment. For if no authority (according ⁷ to Plato) is designed for the benefit of him that governs, but of those that are governed, no wise and considerate man will voluntarily take upon him the government of a people, but must either be hired or compelled to it; and therefore Moses, considering the great weight of the employment, out of a due sense of his own infirmities, declined it as long as he could. And though mention is made in the Scripture of the ⁸ "Lord's being angry with him," yet this anger could amount to no more than such a displeasure as a father conceives at his child, when, notwithstanding all that can be said and done to create in him a just confidence, he still continues bashful and diffident of himself.

It may be thought perhaps by some a further excuse for Moses' backwardness, or at least no great encouragement to his undertaking, that God makes the sign wherewith he would seem to ratify his promise, of a date subsequent to his commission: ⁹ "I will certainly be with thee, and this shall be a token unto thee, that I have sent thee: when thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain.' For how can a future event serve for a sign of the accomplishments of a present promise? The common solution of this difficulty is,—That God designed this for a token to Moses, in order to root out of his heart all remains of infidelity, which might perhaps be found in him, even after he had delivered the Israelites out of bondage; but this is a sense by no means allowable. For how can we suppose, that after God had brought out his people with an high hand, and a stretched out arm, by making himself justly terrible to Pharaoh and all his court; by turning rivers of water into blood; by changing the day into night; by slaying all the first-born in Egypt; and by causing the king and his whole army to be swallowed up in the same waves of the sea, which 'were a wall on the right hand and on the left,' and opened a way for his own people to pass; how can we suppose, I say, that this faithful servant of his should have the least doubt whether this mighty deliverance was to be ascribed to providence or chance? Or, if there was any further occasion for tokens, why should a smaller than any of the foregoing be proposed? Or, when proposed, why should it be presumed sufficient to produce an effect which others, much more considerable, were found incompetent to do?

To evade these questions, some of the Jewish doctors have devised a new partition of the words; and when God says to Moses, 'This shall be a token unto thee,' they think he means it of the bush, from whence he spake, all on flames without consuming, which was, questionless, token enough that God had sent him; and thereupon, they make the subsequent words the beginning of a fresh sentence, and declarative of a farther purpose, for which God would bring forth his people out of Egypt, even that from that mountain he might give them a law, which was to be the rule and directory of their religious worship and service. But there is no necessity for this subterfuge, when the difficulty may be fairly resolved, by distinguishing the promises of God into two kinds; those that depend on certain conditions, and those that have no conditions at all.

To be the messenger of the former kind of promises, is exercising a glorious ministry; but then it is a ministry attended with danger. He upon whom God confers it, may live in perpetual fear of promising something without effect; because they to whom the promise is made, may forfeit it by not performing the requisite condition; but nothing can discourage the man to whom God has given a commission of the latter kind; because the infallibility of the event supports him against all the obstacles that can possibly arise.

Now to apply this to the case in hand. When God promises Moses a deliverance of his people, Moses might fear that their impiety or unbelief might be a bar and obstruction to their deliverance; and therefore God, in order to cure him of this fear, endeavours to make him sensible that the promise he now gives him, was not indefinite and general, like those which depended on certain conditions; but that it was one of those whose accomplishment was decreed in the Divine councils, independent on any event, or any condition: and therefore he not only promises, but foretels, and particularizes the nicest and minutest circumstances. He not only acquaints him, that his people shall be delivered, but he describes to him the exact place where, after they found themselves set at liberty, they were to pay their homage to their deliverer: and this detail is the token that God gives him of the certainty of the event.

To illustrate this by a parallel instance. When the armies of Sennacherib besieged Jerusalem, Hezekiah began to fear that they would take it: to secure him against that fear, Isaiah promises him an approaching deliverance. Hezekiah is afraid lest the sins of the people should stand between him and the Divine goodness: to secure him against this apprehension likewise, and to convince him that the resolution God had taken to deliver his people was irrespective and infallible; 'This shall be a sign unto thee,' says he, 'ye shall eat this year such things as grow of themselves; and in the second year, that which springeth of the same; and in the third year, sow ye, and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat the fruit thereof.' To return to Moses.

Had this promise indeed been the only sign which God had given him, it might have administered some umbrage of suspicion; but when it was attended with several other signs and mighty wonders, it could not but be of great use for the confirmation of his faith in his present undertaking, since he knew it was as certain as if it had already been effected; because it proceeded from the mouth of the Almighty, whose promises, when absolute and unconditional, are always 'yea and amen.'

I know of few passages more difficult to be understood, than that which contains the adventure of Moses' family in the inn,³ where the Lord met him, and sought to kill him, until Zipporah took a sharp stone, and cut off the foreskin of her son, and cast it at his feet, and said, surely a bloody husband art thou to me.' Zipporah is commonly represented as a perverse and forward woman, who looked upon circumcision as a cruel and unnecessary ordinance; and therefore prevailed with her husband, who, perhaps, might be too indulgent to her in the case of her younger son, to omit it. But it ought to be considered, that as she was a Midianitish woman, and descended from Abraham by his wife Keturah, she could not have any aversion to the rite of circumcision, in which she acquiesced in the case of her elder son Gershom, and in which she was so expert, that upon her husband's incapacity, she herself performed the operation upon the younger.

The Midianites might perhaps, in this respect, imitate their neighbours the Ishmaelites, who did not circumcise their children until they were thirteen years of age; and, for this reason, some have imagined that Moses' son had not as yet undergone the operation: but Moses knew very well that there was a limitation of time in the institution of the ordinance; and therefore the more probable reason for this omission seems to be, that they were now upon their journey, when Zipporah was brought to bed, and that therefore they might think that the danger of the wound to the infant might excuse the deferring of his circumcision, as it excused the Israelites afterwards in the wilderness.

But as it does not appear that Moses lay under any necessity of taking his family, especially his wife with child, along with him, so this omission of circumcising his son might be imputed to him as a greater fault than ordinary, because he may be supposed to have understood the will of God concerning this rite more perfectly than any other man, and was, but just before, reminded of the benefit of that covenant whereof this ordinance was a seal, and some part of which he was going now to take possession of.

But how absurd would it have been for Moses to be made a lawgiver to others, when himself lived in an open violation of God's laws? or to be appointed a chief ruler and instructor of the Israelites, to whom he was to inculcate the obligation of this ordinance, and on whom he was to inflict pains and penalties for their neglect of it, when himself was guilty of the same sin? Nor was this omission only a great sin in itself, but a great scandal likewise to the Israelites, who, by his example, might very likely be led into the same miscarriage, and be tempted to suspect the call of a person who showed such a visible contempt of God's law. As Moses therefore was a public person, and just invested with a commission from God, his disobedience to a known law was more enormous, his example might have done more mischief; and therefore God's severity against him, either in afflicting him with some sudden sickness, or affrightening him with some terrible apparition, was necessary to remind him of his duty. And accordingly, whatever the means was, we find, that it brought to his wife's remembrance the neglect of their not having circumcised the child: but we injure her character, if we think that the words which she is made to utter upon this occasion, were any angry taunt or exprobaton to her husband, since, according to the exposition¹ of a very learned writer upon the text, they are not directed to him, but to her son; and are not the effect of any angry resentment, but a solemn form of speech made use of at the time of any child's circumcision.

Several of the Jewish doctors tell us, that it was a custom of the Hebrew women to call their children, when they were circumcised, by the name of Chatan, that is, spouse, as if they were now espoused to God. And to this custom the apostle perhaps might allude, when he tells his Corinthians,² 'I am jealous over you with an holy jealousy, for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ.' However this be,³ Zipporah, who was an Arabian woman, might the rather make use of this term, and apply it to her son, because the Arabians, whose language has a great affinity to the Hebrew, and who themselves, as descendants from Abraham, did all along use the rite of circumcision, make the word chatan signify to circumcise, and chiten, circumcision, as manifestly appears in their translation of the New Testament; which can no otherwise be accounted for than from this custom of calling a child chatan when he is circumcised, even as we, because a child in baptism is made a christian, use the word christen for baptize.

If Zipporah's words then were directed, not to her husband, but the child whom she had just now circumcised, their proper meaning must be, "I, by this circumcision, pronounce thee to be a member of the church."

"For the child, on the day of his circumcision," says Eben Ezra upon this text, "was used to be called chatan, because he was then first joined to the people of God, and as it were espoused unto God." And if this be the sense of the matter, Zipporah was so far from expressing any angry resentment, or giving her husband any opprobrious language upon this occasion, that she only did the office of circumcising her son, when she perceived that the delay of it had given offence to God, and in doing that office, pronounced the words over him, which used to be pronounced whenever that ceremony was duly performed.

This is an interpretation which not only the Septuagint and Chaldee Paraphrasts seem to countenance, but what most modern masters of Jewish learning have approved. And as it seems to clear the character of Zipporah, so may it receive some farther confirmation from the subsequent behaviour of the angel, who, as soon as he saw the ceremony performed, and heard the solemn form pronounced over the child,⁴ 'let Moses go, and did not slay him;' whereas had the operation been done in the manner that some pretend, grudgingly, and of necessity, with inward regret and words of reproach to her husband, this, one would think, would have incensed the angel, either to have continued the punishment, be it what it will, upon Moses, or rather to have transferred it to his wife, who, upon this supposition, seems most justly to have deserved it.

Upon the whole therefore it appears, that the words of Zipporah were addressed to her son, and not her husband, and were the usual form of admission into the Jewish church; that it was at the child's feet that she laid the foreskin, and did not throw it at her husband in anger, when she spake the words above-mentioned; and that in this whole affair, there was neither any squabble between Moses and his wife, nor any indecent behaviour, or opprobrious language used by her.

It cannot be denied, indeed, but that God, from the very first day that he appointed Moses to go to Pharaoh, intended to deliver his people from their captivity, and when once they were departed out of Egypt, that they should never return again; and yet they are directed to demand only to go 'three days' journey into the wilderness.' This was not the whole of what was intended; but Moses lay under no obligation to let so bitter an enemy as Pharaoh into his whole design. It is sufficient to absolve him from any imputation of disingenuity, that he acted according to the instructions which God gave him; and God certainly was not obliged to acquaint Pharaoh with all his mind, but only so far as he thought proper: and for wise and good reasons, he thought proper to make the demand no higher at first, than 'three days' journey into the wilderness,' that by his denial of so modest a request, he might make his tyranny more manifest, and the divine vengeance upon him more just and remarkable.

It must be acknowledged again, that the expression of 'flowing with milk and honey,' when applied to any country, like that of king Solomon's 'making silver to be in Jerusalem like stones,'⁵ is hyperbolic. It denotes very rich pastures and grounds which should feed cattle yielding abundance of milk, and which should produce great plenty of flowers and plants, for the bees to make honey. It represents indeed a general fruitfulness all the country over; for which Palestine, according to the account of writers of no mean character, was certainly once famous, however it came into Strabo's head to disparage it. For, to mention an author or two of some note, Aristens, who was there to bring the seventy interpreters into Egypt, tells us that immense and prodigious was the produce and plenty it afforded of trees, fruits, pasture, cattle, honey, besides the spicery, gold, and precious stones, imported from Arabia,¹ Josephus describes the country as it was in his time, that is, in the time of our Saviour and his apostles, as most remarkably fruitful and pleasant, and abounding in the very choicest productions of the earth. Bochart, much later, and since the country has been inhabited by the Turks, lived in it for the space of ten years, and as he was particularly curious and diligent in informing himself in every thing, speaks the greatest things imaginable of the richness of its soil, and the choiceness of its products: and to name no more, our own countryman, Mr Sandys, who, in the beginning of the last century, travelled through it, gives it the character of "a land adorned with beautiful mountains, and luxurious valleys; the rocks producing excellent waters, and no part empty of delight or profit." And certainly those who either were natives, or have sojourned a long time in a country, may be supposed to have a more perfect knowledge of it than a foreigner, who lived at a distance, as Strabo did.

The truth is, if we consider of what a small compass the land of Canaan is, and yet what a prodigious number of inhabitants, both before and after the Israelites became masters of it, it maintained, we must conclude, it could not but deserve the character which the authors above cited have given us of it; and the barrenness and poverty of its soil, which some modern travellers seem to complain of, must be imputed either to its want of tillage and cultivation. (which the Turks, its present inhabitants, are utterly ignorant of.) or to the particular judgment of God, who, for the wickedness of any nation, has frequently performed what he threatened to the Jews of old: "I will break the pride of your power, and I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass, and your strength shall be spent in vain; for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruits."

Several things are said in Scripture to be done by God, which are only permitted by him to come to pass in their ordinary course and procedure: and thus God may be said to harden Pharaoh's heart, only because he did not interpose, but suffered him to be carried, by the bent of his own passions, to that inflexible obstinacy which proved his ruin. That Moses, to whom God used these expressions concerning Pharaoh, understood them in this sense, is evident from many parts of his behaviour to him, and especially from his earnestly entreating him to be persuaded, and to let the people go.³ Had Moses known, or even thought that God had doomed Pharaoh to unavoidable ruin, it had been an unwarrantable presumption in him to have persuaded him to have avoided it: but that Moses, with all possible application, endeavoured to make an impression upon Pharaoh for his good, is manifest from this passage, "glory over me," that is, do me the honour to believe me, "when I shall entreat for thee, and for thy servants;" wherein he makes an earnest address to Pharaoh, to induce him to be persuaded to part with the people, which he certainly never would have done, had he been satisfied that God himself had prevented his compliance, on purpose to bring him to ruin.

It is farther to be observed, therefore, that not only in the Hebrew, but in most other languages, the occasion of an action, and what in itself has no power to produce it, is very often put for the efficient cause thereof. Thus in the case before us,⁵ God sends Moses to Pharaoh, and Moses, in his presence, does such miraculous works as would have had an effect upon any other: but because he saw some of the miracles imitated by the magicians; because the plagues which God sent came gradually upon him, and by the intercession of Moses, were constantly removed; he thence took occasion, instead of being softened by this alternative of mercy and judgment, to become more sullen and obdurate. When 'Pharaoh,' as the text tells us, 'saw that the rain, and the hail, and the thunder ceased, he sinned yet more, and hardened his heart.' The mercy of God, which should have led him to repentance, had a contrary effect upon him, and made him more obstinate: "for an hardened heart (as one expresses it) is neither cut by compunction, nor softened by any sense of pity. It is neither moved by entreaties, nor yields to threatenings, nor feels the smart of scourges. It is ungrateful to benefactors, treacherous to counsels, sullen under judgments, fearless in dangers, forgetful of things past, negligent of things present, and improvident for the future:"⁶ all which bad qualities seem to have centered in Pharaoh. For whatever might have contributed to his obduration at first, it is plain, that in the event, even when the magicians owned a divine power, in what they saw done, and were quite confounded when they felt themselves smitten with the boils, and might thereupon very likely persuade him to surrender, he is so far from relenting, that he does not so much as ask a remove of the plague. It was therefore entirely agreeable to the rules of divine justice, when nothing would reclaim this wicked king, when even that which wrought upon the ministers of Satan made no impression upon him, to let his crime become his punishment, and to leave him to 'eat the bitter fruit of his own ways, and to be filled with his own devices.'

The Israelites, we own, did carry out of the land of their captivity several things of great value, which they had from the Egyptians. But then we are to consider, that the word which our translators render borrow, does more properly signify to ask of one: and what they render to lend, is as literally to give. For the case stood thus between the two nations. The Egyptians had been thoroughly terrified with what had passed, and especially with the last terrible plague upon their first-born, and were now willing to give the Hebrews any thing, or every thing, only to get quit of them. They therefore bribed them to be gone, and courted them with presents, so very profusely, as even to impoverish themselves. But for this the Israelites were not at all culpable, because they only accepted of what the others gave them, and what was freely given, they doubtless had a right to detain.

But suppose that the strict sense of the word was, that they really did borrow many valuable things of the Egyptians; yet it is a truth allowed on all hands, that God, who is the supreme Lord of all things, may, when he pleases, and in what manner he pleases, transfer the rights of men from one to another. Considering, then, that God was now become the king of the Israelites, in a proper and peculiar manner; and considering farther what insufferable wrongs the king and people of Egypt had done to this people of God, who were now become his peculiar subjects and proprietary lieges; this act of spoiling the Egyptians, even in the harshest sense of the word, was, according to the laws of nations, more justifiable than royal grants of letters of marque, or other such like remedies, as kings are accustomed to make use of against other powers that have wronged their subjects, or suffered them to be wronged by those that are under their command, without making a proper restitution. In short, whatever the Hebrews took from the Egyptians, they took and possessed it by the law of reprisals, that is, by virtue of a special warrant from the Lord himself, who was now become, not their God only, but their peculiar king.

a That some compensation was due, in strict justice, from the Egyptians to the Hebrews, for the great services they had done them, is what can hardly be denied: but supposing this borrowing and lending between them had been without any such regard, yet if the Israelites acquired a right to these things afterwards, there was then no obligation for them to make any restitution. Now, that they acquired such a right, is manifest from the Egyptians pursuing them in a hostile manner, and with a purpose to destroy them, after they had given them free liberty to depart; by which hostility and perfidiousness they plainly forfeited their right to what they had only lent before. For this hostile attempt, which would have warranted the Israelites to have fallen upon the Egyptians, and spoiled them of their goods, did certainly warrant them to keep them when they had them;

a In the Gemarah of the Saabichrim, there is a memorable story concerning the transaction. In the time of Alexander the Great, the Egyptians brought an action against the Israelites, desiring that they might have the land of Canaan, in satisfaction for all they had borrowed of them when they went out of Egypt. To this Gibeon Ben Ko-am, who was advocate for the Jews, replied,—That before they made this demand, they must prove what they alleged, namely, that the Israelites borrowed any thing of their ancestors. To which the Egyptians thought it sufficient to say, that they found it recorded in their own books. Well then, says the advocate, look into the same books, and ye will find that the children of Israel lived four hundred and thirty years in Egypt; (Exod. xii. 40.) pay us then, said he, for all the labours and toils of so many thousand people, as you employed us all that time, and we will restore what we borrowed; to which they had not a word to answer. (Patrick's Commentary.) It is to be observed, however, that this passage in Exodus, which the advocate refers to, had respect to all the pilgrimages of Abraham and his posterity from the time of his setting out from Charan in Mesopotamia, to this their departure out of Egypt, as we shall have occasion to show very soon.

Thus, in what view soever we contemplate this fact, whether it be a voluntary donation made by the Egyptians, or an act of reprisal made by the Hebrews, or a deed of forfeiture which the former incurred by an unjust invasion upon the latter, the Hebrews will be found not so culpable as some would make them: nor can we see where the pretended ill tendency of such a precedent can be, since it is allowed on all hands, that it is in no case to be followed, unless it be evidently commanded by the same divine authority.

Miracles indeed, we own, are the seals and attestations of God, to evidence the truth of any thing that he is desirous the world should believe: but if magicians, by the assistance of evil spirits, have power to impose upon our senses, or to work such wonders, as seem altogether miraculous, we are left under a great uncertainty how to determine our judgment in this case: and therefore, to give a full solution to this part of the objection, we shall first premise something concerning the nature of magic, and how far its powers may extend towards the operation of miracles; thence proceed to inquire who the particular magicians were who pretended to oppose Moses, and upon what account it was that Pharaoh sent for them; thence to consider whether the miracles they seemingly wrought were real or fictitious, or if real, why God permitted them to perform them: and thence to examine whether this permission tended any way to prejudice the evidence of Moses' mission from God, or rather not to confirm it, seeing the difference between them and Moses, in this contest of working miracles, was so visible and conspicuous.

Those who have professedly treated of the magic art, have generally divided it into three kinds, natural, artificial, and diabolical. ¹ The first of these is no other than natural philosophy, but highly improved and advanced, whereby the person that is well skilled in the power and operation of natural bodies, is able to produce many wonderful effects, mistaken by the illiterate for diabolical performances, even though they lie perfectly within the verge of nature. Artificial magic is what we call legerdemain, or slight of hand, whose effects are far from being what they seem. They are deceptions and impostures, the very tricks of jugglers, (as we corrupt the word joculatores;) far from exceeding the power of art, and yet what many times pass with the vulgar for diabolical likewise. Diabolical magic is that which is done by the help of the devil, who having great skill in natural causes, and a large command over the air, and other elements, may assist those that are in league and covenant with him (in Scripture called wizards, sorcerers, diviners, enchanters, Chaldeans, and such as had familiar spirits) to do many strange and astonishing things. ²

To deny that there ever were such men as these, is to

² The Scripture warrant the belief, that, in early ages, before the coming of the Messiah, God permitted, in some instances, evil demons to league with mortals, but after the divine advent, that power seems to have been restrained, and a belief in it is now altogether discredited by every intelligent Christian. In the relation given by Moses of the miracles performed before Pharaoh, to induce him to allow of the departure of the Israelites, we read that sight the authority of all history; and to guess at the probable rise and original of them, we may suppose it to be this,—¹ That God being pleased to admit the holy patriarchs into conference with him, the devil endeavoured to do the same; and to retain men in their obedience to him, pretended to make discoveries of secret things; and that when God was pleased to work miracles for the truth, he in like manner directed those who were familiar with him, how to invoke his help, for the performance of such strange things as might confirm the world in their error.

Under which of these denominations, natural, artificial, or diabolical, the magicians who set themselves in opposition to the servants of the Most High God, are to be ranked, we have no instructions from Scripture: but it seems highly probable, that neither would Pharaoh have called together those of the least capacity and repute, neither would the devil, as far as his power extended, have been backward to assist his votaries upon such a solemn and momentous occasion as this.

Who the principal of these magicians were, our sacred historian makes no mention; but several, both Jewish and heathen authors, (from whom ² St Paul without doubt borrowed their names,) have informed us, that among the Egyptians they were called James, and Jambres, which to give them a Latin termination, would be Johannes and Ambrosius, of whom Numenius (as he is quoted by Eusebius) ³ has given us this remarkable account, namely,—‘ That they were the scribes in religious matters among the Egyptians; that they flourished in Egypt at the time when the Jews were driven from thence; that they did not give place to any body in the science of magical secrets; and for this reason were chosen unanimously by all Egypt to oppose Musæus, (so he calls Moses,) a leader of the Jews, and whose prayers were very prevalent with God.’

Now, supposing that these, and whoever else accompanied them, acted from the highest principles in magic, there are two ways wherein we may imagine it in the power of the devil to be assistant to such persons as pretend to work miracles.

The first is, by raising false images and appearances of things; which may be done either by affecting the brain or confusing the optic nerves, or altering the medium which is between us and the object. That he did some such thing as this to our blessed Saviour, when from the top of an high mountain he pretended ⁴ ‘to shew him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them in a moment of time,’ is very plain from the convexity of the earth, which bounds the horizon, and admits of no such unlimited prospect; so that all he could be presumed capable of doing in this case (as our Saviour was not insensible what he did do) was to make fictitious representations of gay and magnificent things in the air.

Secondly, The other way wherein the devil may be supposed able to assist these magicians, is by making use of the laws of nature, in producing effects which are not above the natural power of things, though they certainly exceed what man can do. Thus to transport a body, with inconceivable rapidity, from one place to another; to bring together different productions of nature which separately have no visible effect, but when united work wonders; to make images move, walk, speak, and the like; these may come within the compass of the devil’s power, because not transcending the laws of nature, though we cannot discern by what means they are effected.

Thirdly, There is a farther supposition ⁵ of some learned men, namely, that, under the divine permission, wicked spirits have a power to work real miracles, of which they perceive ⁶ some intimations given us in Scripture, and in the nature of the thing no reasons to the contrary; and therefore the question is, whether what the magicians here performed, were real miracles or not?

Some learned writers have imagined, that there was not any real transmutation, when the rods of the Egyptian magicians were pretended to be changed into serpents, nor any real miracle exhibited, when the water was turned into blood, and the frogs produced; but that either the magicians played their parts well, as dexterous jugglers, or that they did it by their knowledge of some secret art; or that some demons assisted them, who by their power over the air, enabled them to ^a deceive the sight of

⁶ Deut. xiii. 1. Matth. xxiv. 24. 2 Thess. ii. 9.

^a The Mahometans, in the account they give us of these transactions, seem to think them legerdemain tricks, rather than any real miracles in the magicians; for they tell us, that Moses having wrought some miracles before the king of Egypt, which not a little surprised him, he was advised by his council to amuse him with fair hopes, until he had sent for some of his most expert sorcerers from Thebais. Accordingly Sabour and Gadour, two brothers, renowned for their magic skill, were sent for; and before they came to Pharaoh’s court, they went to consult the names of their father about the success of their journey; acquainting him withal, that the two magicians which they were sent for to oppose, had a rod, which they turned into a serpent, and devoured all that made head against it: to which their father’s ghost answered, that if that rod turned itself into a serpent whilst they were asleep, they must never expect to prevail against them. However, this did not hinder them from appearing before Pharaoh, at the head of his other magicians, to the number, as some say, of 70,000. All these had prepared their rods, and cords filled with quicksilver, which, when heated by the sun, imitated the winding of a serpent: but Moses’ serpent soon destroyed them, to the great surprise of all the spectators:

A. M. 2433. A. C. 1571; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3763. A. C. 1648. EXOD. CH. I.—xiii.

beholders. It is to be observed, however, that in the account which Moses gives us of the miracles performed by himself and Aaron, and of what the magicians did by their enchantments, he does not hint any manner of difference, as to the reality of the performance of either of them. In the case of their rods being turned into serpents, he does not say, that they made them to appear to be such, by a deception of the sight, but that, ¹ ' they flung down every man his rod, and they became serpents;' and so of the other two miracles, which Moses exhibited, ' that the magicians did so with their enchantments.'

² Now, from the knowledge of natural causes and effects, which by the help of experiment and philosophy, has of late been introduced, we may venture to say, that no effects like what these men pretended to accomplish by enchantments, can be produced by any or all the powers of nature. No art, no study of occult sciences, can enable a man really to change a rod into a living serpent. There are no enchantments, no rules in sorcery sufficient to make a living frog, or to change water into real blood; and to suppose that the magicians went about to impose upon Pharaoh, and the rest of the spectators, by mere artifice and slight of hand, was giving Moses and Aaron, whom we cannot but suppose inquisitive upon this occasion, the fairest opportunity imaginable to detect the cheat, and expose them to the contempt and derision of the whole company.

Their only recourse, in this case, can be to the assistance of devils, deluding the company with false appearances of serpents, frogs, and blood: but let any one try to give a satisfactory account, how any magician could, by his power over the air, either by himself, or by the assistance of a demon, represent to the naked view of beholders, in opposition to a true miracle, serpents, frogs, and water converted into blood; nay, and so represent them, as that the fictitious appearance should not be distinguishable from the real, but should bear to be seen with them, at one and the same time, in the same light, in the same view; for so the magicians' rods turned into serpents certainly were, when Aaron's rod swallowed them up: I say, let any one try to give a reasonable account of this fancy, and he will quickly see, that he may more reasonably suppose the magicians able to perform a true and real transmutation, than to ascribe to them such imaginary powers as this supposition requires, and which (if they could be conceived) can tend only to destroy the certainty of all appearances whatever.

If then the magicians could have no knowledge of any mystic arts, or powers of nature, whereby to work miracles; if they could not deceive the spectators by any slight of hand, nor obtain any assistance from evil spirits, sufficient to impose upon them by false appearances; the consequence seems to be, that the miracles which they wrought were equally true with those which Moses and Aaron did. But then, as the magicians had no power inherent in themselves, they could not tell, even when they set about imitating Moses, what the success of their attempt would be. Their rods were turned into serpents, they saw, but how that was effected, they could not tell. Had they had any certain rules of art or science to work by, or any superior help or assistance to depend on, they would at once have known what to attempt, and what not, and not have exposed themselves to scorn, by not being able to produce lice, as well as frogs. If what they did was by the agency of evil spirits, it is plain, that that agency was under the divine control, and could go no farther than the God of Israel permitted it; and the reasons of his permitting it might be these:

The learned in Egypt thought, that miracles, prodigies, and omens, were given by the planetary and elementary influences; and that students, deeply versed in the mysteries of nature, could cause them by art and incantation. Pharaoh might possibly be of this opinion; and therefore, seeing Moses do very strange things, and knowing that his magicians were great adepts in these sciences, he thought proper to send for them, in order to know whether the wonders which Moses wrought were the effect of the art of man, of the power of nature, or of the finger of God; for he seems to have argued thus—If his magicians could perform what Moses did, Moses was such an one as they, and endeavoured to delude him with artificial wonders, instead of real miracles. Fit therefore it was, that these practitioners should be suffered to exert the utmost of their power against Moses, in order to clear him from the imputation of magic, or sorcery, which, considering the prevailing notions of that age, both Hebrews and Egyptians might have been apt to entertain, had not this competition happened, and his antagonists thereupon acknowledged the superiority of the principle by which he acted, in comparison of which, all their arts and knowledge of occult sciences availed nothing.

The Israelites, it must be owned, were a people of a very suspicious, diffident, and desponding temper. When Moses came to them with a message from God, at first they seemed to receive him gladly, and to rejoice at their approaching deliverance: and when he had shown them the credentials which God appointed him to exhibit, it is said, ³ ' that the people believed, and when they heard that the Lord had looked upon their affliction, they bowed their heads, and worshipped:' but within the space of a day or two, when they saw that every thing did not answer their expectation, but that their petition, to an imperious tyrant was rejected with scorn: how is their tone changed to their very deliverers, and the blame of all their grievances laid upon them! ⁴ ' The Lord look upon you, and judge, because you have made our savour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants, to put a sword into their hands to slay us:' and therefore, for the confirmation of the faith of these wavering and uncertain people, it was highly necessary that this contest between Moses and the magicians should be permitted, that the disparity of persons acting by the power of God, and by the power of Satan, in such a contraposition, might be more conspicuous.

And indeed, what could more contribute to raise in the Israelites a confidence in God's promises, and a joyful hope of a speedy deliverance, than to see the great disparity between the opposers and maintainers of their cause? To see, I say, that though, by the Divine permission, the magicians could change their rods into serpents, yet, as a manifest token of superiority, Moses' rod devoured all theirs: though they could turn water into blood, yet it was above their skill to restore it to its former nature; though they made a shift to produce frogs, yet they were utterly unable to clear the Egyptian palaces and houses of them; though they did, in short, some things, which only contributed to the calamities of Egypt, yet they could do no one thing to redress them, no even to relieve themselves against the plague of the boils? So true, and so severe withal, is that observation of the author of the book of Wisdom, ¹ "As for the illusions of the art magic, they were put down, and their vaunting in wisdom was reprov'd with disgrace; for they who promised to drive away terrors, and troubles from a sick soul, were sick themselves of fear, and worthy to be laughed at."

But now Moses not only does such miracles as the magicians never pretend to do, (the storm and hail, the thunder and lightning, and thick darkness, &c., they never once attempted to imitate,) but, supposing that Pharaoh might be addicted to astrologers, who fancied that all things here below might be governed by the motion and influence of the stars, he very frequently gives him the liberty to name the time when he would have any plague removed, that thereby he might know that God alone was the author of them, and that consequently there was no day or hour under so ill an aspect, but that he could prevail with him, at whatever moment he should assign, to rescue and deliver him.

Had Moses met with no opposition in working his miracles, Pharaoh had neither had so strong a conviction, nor could Moses himself have exhibited so clear a testimony of his divine mission. ² As the nature of the Egyptian learning then was, the king might have suspected that the prophet's miracles proceeded, if not from natural means and enchantment, at least from the influence of some planetary or elementary powers: but when men of equal skill and abilities; in all points of abstruse learning, were brought to contest the matter with him, and acknowledged their inability to proceed in a conflict where their adversary had a divine power apparently assisting him; this established the truth of Moses' pretensions, though it made the other's obstinacy and infidelity inexcusable; and ³ a signal instance of God's wisdom it was, to permit these sorcerers to proceed for some time in their contest with his servant, which added disgrace to the one's defeat, as it did no small glory to the other's conquest.

Thus we have endeavoured to satisfy the objections which are usually advanced against some parts of the Scripture history comprised in this period; and for the farther satisfaction of our reader, shall conclude with the testimony of some heathen writers, who, in all ages, have more or less taken notice of the birth, life, and several adventures of Moses, so far as we have hitherto advanced. ⁴ That of his being taken out of the river Nile, for instance, is sung by the author of the Orphic verses, under the title $\nu\delta\delta\omicron\gamma\epsilon\upsilon\gamma\eta\varsigma$, or born of the water: that the beauty and gracefulness of his person, which recommended him to every one's affection, is remembered by Justin ⁵ out of Trogus Pompeius, and that ⁶ the whole fable of Venus falling in love with Adonis, in all probability arose from the story of Moses and Pharaoh's daughter: that the wonder of the burning bush is recorded by Antiphanes, with a small variation, as he is cited ⁷ by Eusebius: that several of the plagues upon Egypt are mentioned in the fragments of Eupolemus, preserved ⁸ by the same Eusebius; and that the slaughter of their first-born, in particular, is commemorated in that mournful feast of Osiris, wherein they rise at midnight, light candles, and go about weeping and groaning: that Moses' calling the God of heaven Jao, or Jehovah, is mentioned ⁹ by Diodorus Siculus: that the names of James and Jambres, and the opposition they made against him, is preserved ¹⁰ in Eumenius, ¹¹ Pliny, and ¹² Apuleius; and, to go no farther, that the Israelites' departure out of Egypt, and settling in the land of Canaan, is ¹³ by Tacitus, who took it from some Egyptian authors, thus related. "The Hebrews were descended from the Assyrians, and possessing a great part of Egypt, led the life of shepherds; but afterwards being burdened with hard labour, they came out of Egypt under the command of Moses, with some Egyptians accompanying them, and went through the country of the Arabians, into Palestine Syria, and there set up rites contrary to those of the Egyptians." So fully does the testimony of aliens tend to the confirmation of the revelations, O God!

CHAP. III.—Of the sacred chronology, and profane history, learning, religion, idolatry, and monumental works, &c., but chiefly of the Egyptians, during this period.

BEFORE we enter upon the historical matters which are contained in this period, between God's call to Abraham out of Mesopotamia, and the children of Israel's departure out of Egypt, it may not be improper to settle its chronology, and to take notice of some exceptions that may possibly be made to it.

The difference between the Hebrew, Samaritan, and Septuagint computations, in the former periods of time, ran wide; and it was some part of our care, either to determine which was most probably in the right, or to reconcile the seeming opposition between them: but in this the variation is so small, that they seem almost unanimously to agree, that ¹⁴ from the promise made to Abraham, to his posterity's exodus out of Egypt, are 430 years, which, according to the learned Usher, may very properly be divided into two halves.

1. ¹⁵ From the time of the promise, when Abraham was in the 75th year of his age, to the birth of Isaac, are 25 years; ¹⁶ from the birth of Isaac to the birth of Jacob, 60 years; from the birth of Jacob to his descent into Egypt, with his whole family, 130 years; so that the whole of this division amounts to 215 years.

2. The other part of the division is thus reckoned up. Joseph, the son of Jacob, was 30 years old when he expounded Pharaoh's dreams: the seven years of plenty were run out, and ¹ the third year of famine begun, when his father came down into Egypt: so that by this time Joseph was 39. Now, 39 years taken from the 110 which Joseph lived, will make the time which the Israelites had continued in Egypt, before Joseph's death, to be 71: and as ² from the death of Joseph to the birth of Moses, are precisely 64 years; so ³ from his birth to the time of the Israelites' departure, are 80 years. The several articles of this division, therefore, being put together, amount in like manner to 215 years; and the two gross sums make exactly 430.

The history indeed tells us, that ⁴ 'the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was 430 years:' but it does not therefore follow that they dwelt in Egypt all that time. They came into Egypt with Jacob, A. M. 2298, according to Hales, A. M. 3548, and went out of Egypt, A. M. 2513, Ibid. 3763; so that they lived in it just 215 years. Their sojourning, therefore, must not be limited to their living in Egypt, but be taken in a more general sense, and extended equally to the time of their living in Canaan, which being added to the time of their continuance in Egypt, makes exactly the number of 430 years.

That this is the sense of the divine historian, is manifest from the authority of the Samaritan text, which has the whole verse thus: 'Now the inhabiting of the children of Israel, and their fathers, whereby they inhabited in the land of Canaan, and in the land of Egypt, were four hundred and thirty years;' whereupon the learned Dr Prideaux ⁵ has this observation, "That the additions herein do manifestly mend the text; they make it more clear and intelligible, and add nothing to the Hebrew copy, but what must be understood by the reader to make out its sense;" and upon this presumption it may very reasonably be supposed, ⁶ that the ancient Hebrew text was, in this verse, the same with the present Samaritan, and that the words which the Samaritan has in this place more than the Hebrew, have been dropped by the negligence of some transcribers.

Again in the promise which God makes to Abraham, he tells him, ⁷ 'That his seed should be a stranger in a land which was not theirs; that there they should serve the inhabitants, and they afflict them for four hundred years; but that, in the fourth generation, they should return to Canaan again;' whereas four hundred years are not the number specified in the place just now examined, nor are four generations equivalent to the space of time wherein the Hebrews sojourned in strange countries. It is to be observed, however, that both in sacred and profane authors, a common thing it is, to mention only the large sum, and drop the less, especially when, to preserve the exactness of chronology, the precise number is in other places inserted: and that though a generation does usually denote a term of an hundred years; yet, taking the words to relate to the whole sojourning of the Hebrews, from their going into Canaan to their going out of Egypt, the odd number of thirty years may here be supposed to be omitted, to make it a round sum, as well as in the former sense: but then taking a generation to mean no more than one descent, the matter of fact is, that from the Israelites' going down into Egypt, until the time of their leaving it, in some of the sons of Jacob, (particularly in Levi, who begat Cohath, and Cohath, Anram, and Anram, Moses, who conducted the people out of Egypt,) there were no more than four descents.

Whether, therefore, we take the word generation to denote an age of years, or a succession of lives, there is plainly no incongruity in the expression; because, bating the odd number of thirty, Abraham and his posterity sojourned in a strange land for the space of 400 years, and yet, allowing it to be meant of a descent of lives, at the Israelites' return to Canaan, from the time of their going down to Egypt, several persons of the fourth generation were not extinct.

Egypt indeed was the most considerable nation with whom the Israelites had any intercourse during this period: what dealings they had with the several parts of Canaan, will be best related when we come to treat of the history of that country. In the mean time we cannot but lament our want of the ancient records of those times, which forces us, instead of a continued history, to present our reader with nothing but a jejune catalogue of the succession of the Egyptian kings, which, as far as they relate to our present purpose, we have thought proper ^a to subjoin at the bottom of the page; and shall only ^a In the year of the world 1849, reigned in Thebais, or the Upper Egypt, Menes, whom the Scripture calls Mizraim, 62 years: in the year 1911, Athothes, 59 years: in the year 1970, Athothes II. 32 years: in the year 2002, Diabies, 19 years: in the year 2021, Pemplos, 18 years: in the year 2059, Tegar Amachus, 79 years: in the year 2118, Stoelchus, 6 years: in the year 2124, Golemies, 30 years: in the year 2154, Mares, 26 years.

In the time of these flourished the royal shepherds in the Lower Egypt; and in the year of the world 1920, Salatis, the first pastoral king, reigned 19 years: in the year 1939, Beon, the second pastoral king, 44 years: in the year 1983, Apelmas, the third pastoral king, 36 years: in the year 2020, Apophis, the fourth pastoral king, 61 years: in the year 2081, Janias, the fifth pastoral king, 50 years and one month; and after these Herules Assis, 49 years and two months.

Then follow the Theban kings in this order. In the year of the world 2180, Anophes, (who by Archbishop Usher is named Tethmosis, and is said to have expelled the royal shepherds, reigned 20 years: in the year 2200, Siricuis, 18 years: in the year 2218, Cnenbus Cneurus, 27 years: in the year 2245, Ravosis, 13 years: in the year 2258, Bivris, 10 years: in the year 2268, Saophis, 29 years: in the year 2297, Sensaophis, 27 years: in the year 2324, Moscheris, 31 years: in the year 2355, Masthis, 33 years: in the year 2388, Pamus Archadius, whom Usher calls Ratholis, 35 years: and in the year 2123, Apaxus Maximus, 100 years. After the expulsion of the race of the royal pastors, in the year of the world 2205, Chebron succeeded to the kingdom of the Lower Egypt, and reigned 13 years: in the year 2218, Amenophis, 20 years and 7 months: in the year 2239, Ameses, 21 years and 9 months: in the year 2261, Mephres, 12 years and 9 months: in the year 2273, Mispnagmuthis, 25 years and 10 months: in the year 2299, Thmosis, 9 years and 8 months: in the year 2309, Amenophis II. 30 years and 10 months: in the year 2310, Orus, 36 years and 5 months: in the year 2376, Achenches, 12 years and 1 month: in the year 2388, Rathotis, 9 years: in the year 2397, Achenches, 12 years and 5 months: in the year 2410, Achenches II. 12 years and 3 months: in the year 2422, Acmais, 4 years and 1 month: in the year 2426, Ramesses, 1 year and 3 months: in the year 2427, Ramesses Miamun, 66 years and 2 months: and in the year 2493, Amenophis III. 19 years and 6 months: who is the last we meet with in this period.

take notice here in particular, that A. M. 2084, when Abraham and his nephew Lot, went down into Egypt, Tegar Anachus was then upon the throne; that A. M. 2260, when Joseph was born, Biyris was king; and when he was sold into Egypt, about seventeen years after, Saophis had succeeded; that this Saophis was the prince whose dreams he expounded, and by whom he was promoted to great honour in the kingdom; that he died, however, before his dreams were accomplished, for it was A. M. 2298, that the first year of the famine began, when Sensoaphis, who was probably his son, and held Joseph in equal favour, swayed the sceptre; that this was the prince to whom Jacob and his sons, upon their coming down into Egypt, in the third year of the famine, were presented, and with whom Israel had the conversation above mentioned; that A. M. 2369, when Joseph died, Masthis was king, by whom, and some of his successors, the Israelites were well treated, in remembrance of the services he had done the public, until there happened a revolution in the government, which some choose to place about this time; that A. M. 2427, the Israelites began to be oppressed, and severely treated by Rameses Mianum, in whose reign Moses was born, slew the Egyptian, and fled into Midian; that A. M. 2493, Amenophis succeeded his father in his kingdom and in his cruelty to the Israelites; but that being compelled at last, by the mighty hand of God, to let them go, he, and all his army, in endeavouring to retake them, were A. M. 2513, swallowed up in the Red Sea.

Salatis, and his successors, not only oppressed the Israelites, as we said before, but by the violence of their conquests, so terrified the ancient inhabitants of the land, that many persons of the first figure thought it better to leave their native country, than to endeavour to sit down under such calamities as they saw were coming upon them. Cecrops, about this time, departed from Egypt; and after some years' travel in other places came at length to Greece, and lived in Attica, where he was kindly received by Actæus, the king of the country; married his daughter, and upon his demise succeeded to his throne; and thereupon he taught the people, who were vagrant before, the use of settled habitations; restrained all licentious lusts among them; obliged each man to marry one wife; and, in short, gave wise rules for the conduct of their lives, and the exercise of all civil and religious offices. About thirty years after the death of Cecrops, Cadmus^a came, either directly from Egypt, as some think, or rather from Phœnicia, as others will have it, and with several people that followed his fortune,^b of which some authors give us a strange account,

^a The true account of Cadmus is,—That his father, whose name is unknown, was an Egyptian, who left Egypt about the time that Cecrops came from thence, and obtained a kingdom in Phœnicia, as Cecrops did in Attica; and that his two sons Phœnix and Cadmus, were born after his settlement in that country; and hence it came to pass that Cadmus, having had an Egyptian father, was brought up in the religion, and was well acquainted with the history of that country, which occasioned several writers of his life to account him an Egyptian; and at the same time being born and educated in Phœnicia, he became master of the language and letters of the country, and had likewise a Phœnician name, which has induced several others that have wrote of him, to conclude, with good reason, that he was a native of that country.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. b. 8.

^b The account which Ovid, in his Metamorphosis, (b. 3. fab. 1.) gives us of this matter is,—That Cadmus' followers were all having expelled the ancient inhabitants, settled himself in Bœotia, and built Thebes.

Danaus was another considerable person, who, about this time, left Egypt and came into Greece. He was originally descended from a Grecian ancestor, and being now at Argos, when the crown was vacant, he stood candidate for it against Galenor, the son of Sthenelus, and, by the superstition of the people who were his electors, carried it. But of all the refugees who quitted Egypt much about this time, Belus, the son of Neptune, seems to be the most famous. He, with some Egyptian priests, went to Babylon, and there obtained leave to settle, and cultivate their studies in the same manner, and with the same encouragement that had been granted them in their own country.

The chief aim of the ancient astronomers seems to have been, to observe the times of the rising and setting of the stars; and the first and most proper places that they could think of for that purpose were very large and open plains, where they could have an extensive view of the horizon, without interruption; and such plains as these were the observatories for many generations. But the Egyptians had, for above three hundred years before the time of this Belus, invented a method to improve their views by the building of pyramids, from the top of which they might take a prospect with greater advantage; and therefore it is no improbable conjecture, that Belus taught the Babylonians the use of such structures, and might possibly project for them that lofty tower which was afterwards called by his name.

For this tower seems to have been an improvement of the Egyptian pyramids. It was raised to a much greater height; had a more commodious space at top, more devoured by a serpent, which when Cadmus had killed, and sown its teeth in the ground, there sprang up from them a number of armed men, who, as soon as they appeared above ground, fell a fighting one another, and were all killed exceptive, who, surviving the conflict, went with Cadmus, and helped him to build Thebes. And the mythologic sense of all this story, according to the conjecture of a learned author, is no more than this,—That when Cadmus came into Bœotia, and had conquered the inhabitants of it, it might be recorded of him in the Phœnician or Hebrew language, which anciently was the same, that he Nashah Chail Chamesh Anoshim, Noshekin be Shenai Nachash; but now there being several ambiguities in these words, where the vowels were not originally written, (Chamesh, for instance, may signify five, as well as warlike; Shenai, teeth, as spears; and Nachash a serpent, as well as brass;) a fabulous translator might say, “he raised a force of five men, armed with the teeth of a serpent;” whereas the words should be rendered, “he raised a warlike force of men armed with spears of brass;” and it is no wonder that the Greeks, who were so fond of disguising all their ancient accounts with fable and allegory, should give the history of Cadmus this turn, when the words, in which his actions are recorded, give them so fair an opportunity.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. b. 8.

^c The dispute between Danaus and Galenor, concerning their titles to the crown, was argued, on both sides, for a whole day; and when Galenor was thought to have offered as weighty and strong arguments for his pretensions, as Danaus could for his, the next day was appointed for the further hearing and determining their claims, when an accident put an end to the dispute. For not far from the place where the people were assembled, there happened a fight between a wolf and a bull, wherein the wolf got the better. This was thought a thing not a little ominous; and therefore, as the wolf was a creature they were less acquainted with than the bull, they thought it was the will of the gods, declared by the event of this accidental combat, that he who was the stranger should rule over them.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. b. 8.

useful and large apartments within; and yet was a less bulky building, and raised upon a narrower foundation: so that the contriver of this seems to have been well acquainted with the Egyptian pyramid and its defects, and to have herein designed a structure much more excellent, which can be ascribed to none, with so great a show of probability, as to the Belus we are now speaking of.

That the Egyptians, in the early ages of the world, were very famous for wisdom and learning, is evident from many ancient writers, as well as the testimony of the Scriptures themselves; for when, among other things, to the honour of Moses, it is said, that ¹ 'he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians;' and to magnify the knowledge of Solomon, we are told, that ² 'he excelled all the wisdom of Egypt;' we cannot but infer, that this nation, above all others, had gained a reputation even for the invention of several useful sciences.

The tillage of the ground made the study of astronomy absolutely necessary, in order to their knowing, from the lights of heaven, the times and seasons for the several parts of agriculture; and the nature of their country, overflowed every year by the Nile, and every year losing its land marks, made it of continual use to them to study geometry; and, as a necessary handmaid to that, to make themselves expert in arithmetic.

It is not to be supposed, however, that hitherto they had carried the study either of astronomy or geography to any great height. They observed the places of the stars, and the periodical motions of the planets. They kept registers of their observations for a long course of years, and took account of the weather and seasons that followed their several observations. They recorded the times of sowing and reaping this or that grain, and, by their long experience, became able prognosticators of the weather and the seasons, and excellent directors for the tillage of the ground: and in like manner, by their knowledge in geometry, they contrived very proper methods of marking out, and describing the several parts of their country, and were very careful, no doubt, in making draughts of the flow and ebb of their river Nile every year; but when it is considered, that the Egyptians did not as yet apprehend that the year consisted of more than 360 days, and that ^a both Thales and Pythagoras, many ages after these times, made great improvements in geometry beyond what they had learned in Egypt; that Thales was the first who ventured to foretell an eclipse; and Eudoxus and Ptolemy to reduce the heavenly motions into tables; we can hardly think, that either astronomy or geometry were as yet carried to any great perfection.

² 1 Kings iv. 30.

^a Thales, who travelled into Egypt for the sake of their learning, after his return home, sacrificed an ox to the gods for joy that he had hit on the method of inscribing a rectangled triangle within a circle; and Pythagoras no less than a whole hecatomb, for his finding out the proportion of the longest side of a right-angled triangle to the other two, which is no more than a common proposition of the first book of Euclid; and yet these two philosophers could not have the invention of these things from the Egyptians, unless we suppose, either that the Egyptians did not teach them all that they knew, or that the disciples concealed the thing, and vainly arrogated to themselves what, in strict truth, they had borrowed from their masters.—Diog. Laert. in Pythag. et Thalete.

The science of physic is generally imputed to Æsculapius; which name was given to Scethorthus, a king of Memphis, who stands second in the third dynasty of Manetho, for his great skill in that art; and though no great credit is to be given to ^b their boasted proficiency in chemistry, yet it is reasonable to believe, from their constant practice of dissections, that they could not well fail of a competent knowledge in anatomy.

The science, however, for which they were most famous, and for which indeed they valued themselves most, was magic, though the whole structure of it had no other foundation than a superstitious belief of the great influence which heavenly bodies are supposed to have upon this inferior world. To this purpose they imagined, that the seven planets governed the seven days of the week; and pretended, that, by a long observation of the motion of the celestial bodies, they had obtained the art of foreseeing future events. They believed, in short, that the sun, moon, stars, and elements, were endued with intelligence, and appointed by the supreme Deity to govern the world; and though they acknowledged that God might, upon extraordinary occasions, work miracles, reveal his will by audible voices, visions, dreams, prophecies, &c., yet they imagined also, that, generally speaking, prodigies were caused, oracles given, and visions occasioned in a natural way, by the observation, or influence of the courses of the heavenly bodies, or by the operations of the powers of nature; and therefore they conceived, that their learned professors could work miracles, obtain omens, and interpret dreams, merely by their skill in natural knowledge, which, though strange and unaccountable to the vulgar, was very obvious to persons of science and philosophy.

In later ages indeed, and when the Egyptians began to worship their departed princes, a notion prevailed that spirits or demons, of a nature superior to men, were employed in the government of the world, and had their several provinces appointed them by God. To this honour they imagined that the souls of departed heroes and extraordinary persons were admitted: and for this reason they supposed, that they were not only endowed with powers far exceeding those of mortal men, but had likewise miracles, visions, oracles, and omens, submitted to their ministry and direction: and consequently, in all their demands or exigencies of this kind, made them the objects of their incantations and prayers.

These were some of the chief arts and sciences (for their architecture, painting, sculpture, and mechanics of all kinds, for which they were so justly famous, we have but just room to mention) that flourished at this time among the Egyptians; and we come now to observe a little by what means it was that this learning of theirs came to be preserved and transmitted to posterity.

^b Some modern assertors of the great antiquity of chemistry, tell us of a medicine used only by the Egyptian priests, and kept secret, even from most of the natives, that is of efficacy almost to do any thing but restore the dead to life again. This, say they, was the grand elixir, or chemical preparation made with the philosopher's stone, the invention of Hermes, by the help of which the Egyptian kings were enabled to build the pyramids, with the treasures which their furnaces afforded them; but these fables are sufficiently confuted by the profound silence of all antiquity in this matter. They are indeed built upon suspicious authorities, uncertain conjectures, and allegorical interpretations of the fabulous stories of the Greeks, which these men will have to be chemical secrets in disguise; inasmuch that they fancy that the golden fleece, which Jason fetched from Colchis, was only a receipt to make the philosopher's stone; and that Medea restored Æson's father to his youth again, by the grand elixir.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 3; and Watton's Reflections on Ancient and Modern Learning, c. 9.

The Egyptian language was certainly one of the most ancient in the world; for considering its structure and constitution, a wherein it widely differs from all oriental and European languages, it must needs be an original, or mother tongue, formed at the confusion of Babel. Their most ancient way of writing was by hieroglyphical figures b of various animals, and plants, the parts of human bodies, and mechanical instruments; for in these things did the hieroglyphics both of the Ethiopians and Egyptians, whereof Hermes is said to have been the inventor, most certainly consist: but, besides these, they made use likewise of literal characters, whereof they had two kinds, calling the one the sacred letters, in which their public registers, and all matters of an higher nature were written; and the other the vulgar, which every one made use of in their common business. But both these characters are at present lost, unless they remain in some old inscriptions, that are unintelligible, and cannot be deciphered.

Not only the Egyptians, but several other nations, used to preserve the memory of things by inscriptions on pillars. The columns of Hermes, upon which he is said to have wrote all his learning, are mentioned by several writers of good note; and from them both the Grecian philosophers and Egyptian historians are supposed to have taken many valuable hints: but to these inscriptions succeeded the sacred books, which contained not only what related to the worship of the gods, and the laws of the kingdom, but historical collections likewise, yea, and all kinds of miscellaneous and philosophical matters of any moment, which the priests or sacred scribes were obliged to insert in these public registers, in order to be transmitted to posterity.

A nation so renowned for their knowledge and learning, and who had such certain methods of preserving the traditions of their ancestors, might have kept the original religion, one would think, with more than ordinary purity; at least would not have run into the same excess of idolatry and polytheism, that other people at this time were so strangely addicted to: and yet, if we look a little into their history, we shall soon find more corruption of this kind among them than in any other nation. Some of their wiser sort, indeed, are said to have acknowledged one supreme God, the Maker and Ruler of the world, whom they sometimes called by the name of Osiris, or Serapis; sometimes by that of Isis; and at other times by that of Neith, on whose temple at Sais was the following remarkable inscription—"I am all that has been, is, or shall be, and my veil hath no mortal yet uncovered." But though some parts of Egypt might at first be free from all idolatrous worship; yet when the humour once began to spread, it soon overran the whole kingdom. The heavenly luminaries were the first objects of profane adoration; and in Egypt, the sun and the moon went under the denomination of Osiris and Isis. After these, the elements, and other parts of nature, such as Vulcan, meaning thereby the fire; Ceres, the earth; Oceanus, the water; and Minerva, the air, were admitted into the number of their deities.

But, besides the celestial, they had terrestrial gods likewise; for most of their princes who had merited well of the people, were after their death canonized and invoked under the names of Sol, Saturnus, Rhea, Jupiter, Juno, Vulcanus, Vesta, and Mercurius; which, according to Diodorus, were the eight first hero gods which the Egyptians worshipped. Nay, and what is scarcely credible, they came at last to give divine honours to several animals, and that with so great a variety and disagreement among themselves, that, except some of the principal deities which were honoured all the kingdom over, there was almost in every town or village a different god held in veneration in one place, and detested in the next, which often occasioned bitter animosities, and sometimes inveterate quarrels, and dangerous wars.

Now the reason why the Egyptians adopted such a variety of animals into the number of their gods, was not so much from any consideration of their subserviency to human life, as from a certain similitude they perceived a For the Copts neither decline their nouns nor conjugate their verbs, not even those of foreign extract, otherwise than by prefixing particles, sometimes of one or more syllables, and sometimes of a single letter, which denote case, gender, number, and person, several of which are often joined together in one word, and the primitive word usually placed last: so that the difficulty of this language consists in the incredible combination of the words and particles, in the change of the vowels in transposing the middle part of the word, and adding superfluous letters, which it requires no small labour and skill to distinguish.—Wilkin's Dissert. de Lingua Coptica, p. 120.

b Of these there were three kinds among the Egyptians, which seem to have more or less art in them, according to the period of their invention. The 1st was, to make the principal circumstance of the subject stand for the whole. Thus, when they would describe a battle, or two armies in array, they painted two hands, one holding a shield, and the other a bow: when a tumult, or popular insurrection—an armed man casting arrows, &c.: when a siege—a scaling ladder. The 2d was, to put the instrument of the thing, whether real or metaphorical, for the thing itself. Thus an eye, eminently placed, was designed to represent God's omniscience: an eye and sceptre—a monarch: and a ship and pilot—the governor of the universe. The 3d was, to make one thing represent another, where there was perceived any quaint analogy, or similitude between the representative and the thing properly intended. Thus, the universe was designed by a serpent in a circle, whose variegated spots signified the stars; and the rising of the sun by the two eyes of a crocodile, because they seem to emerge from his head; a tyrannical king was represented by an eagle; and a cruel or improvident parent, by a hawk. Thus, from the nature of the things themselves, or their resemblance to something else, from the principal circumstance of any action, or the chief instrument employed in doing it, hieroglyphics at first seem to have been invented. But whether their invention was prior to that of letters, has been matter of some debate among the learned; though one can hardly forbear thinking, that a picture character, as hieroglyphics are, would scarce be intelligible unless men could be supposed to delineate the forms and pictures of things more accurately than can well be imagined: but even if that were granted, they would at best have been but a very imperfect character, since they could only hit off the idea of things visible, and must therefore be defective in a multitude of signs to express the full meaning of a man's mind: for which reason some have supposed, that even the Egyptians themselves were wont to intermingle letters with hieroglyphics, to fill up and connect sentences, and to express actions more fully than pictures were found to do. These hieroglyphics were at first in common use, but in process of time were appropriated to sacred and religious matters, and wrote and understood by the priests only.—Warburton's Divine Legation, b. 4. and Stuckford's Connection, b. 8.

between them and the deity to whom they were devoted. Thus the hawk was made sacred to Osiris, as an emblem of the supreme Deity, by reason of its piercing sight and swiftness; the crocodile and river-horse were sacred to Typho, the evil principle; Anubis was said to be the dogstar, and the dog was sacred to him; the serpent or dragon was consecrated to Nephthé; and other suitable animals to their respective gods; nor is the conjecture ^a of our learned countryman ¹ at all to be rejected, namely, That the use of the hieroglyphical figures of animals, might introduce this strange worship which the Egyptians in process of time came to pay them. For as those figures were made choice of according to the respective properties of each animal, to express the qualities and dignities of the persons they represented, which were generally their gods, princes, and great men, the people became gradually accustomed to these figures which they used to place in their temples as the images of their deities; and from hence it is not absurd to imagine, that they came at length to pay a superstitious veneration to the living animals themselves.

But whatever might be the reason or inducements to this kind of idolatry, nothing was so remarkable in the Egyptian religion, as the preposterous worship which that nation paid to animals, such as the cat, the dog, the ibis, the wolf, the crocodile, and several others which they had in high veneration, not when they were alive only, but even after they were dead.

Whilst they were living, they had lands set apart for the maintenance of each kind, and both men and women were employed in feeding and attending them. The children succeeded their parents in the office, which was so far from being declined, or thought despicable among the Egyptians, that they gloried in it as an high honour; and wearing certain badges to distinguish them at a distance, were saluted by bending the knee, and other demonstrations of respect.

If any person killed any of these sacred animals designedly, he was punished with immediate death; if involuntarily, his punishment was deferred to the discretion of the priests; but if the creature slain was a cat, a hawk, or an ibis, whether the thing was done with design

^a This conjecture the learned author of the Divine Legation of Moses abundantly confirms; for having enumerated the several things that might give occasion to brute-worship among the Egyptians, such as, 1. A grateful sense of the benefits received from animals. 2. The considering these animals as symbols of the divine nature. 3. The notion of God's pervading, and being present in all things. 4. The Egyptian use of asterisms, or denoting constellations by the name of animals. 5. The doctrine of metempsychosis, or human souls transmigrating into the bodies of animals. And, 6. The invention of some Egyptian king or other, for his private ends of policy. All these causes or occasions, I say, our author having examined and refuted, carries the point somewhat farther than the learned Marsham, and concludes, that the true original of brute-worship among the Egyptians, was their use of symbolical writing; for which he assigns a further reason, namely, That when the use of writing by letters, as much more commodious than the other, came generally to prevail, the priests still continued the hieroglyphic characters in their works of science and religion; and as the other grew abstruse and obsolete to the vulgar, to make them more sacred, the priests in a short time were the only persons that could read them, and then to make them more sacred and mysterious, gave it out, that the gods themselves were the inventors of them, which might easily induce a deluded people to worship the very creatures, as having something extraordinary in them, which their gods had thought proper to delineate.—B. 4.

or no, ^b the person was to die without mercy, and sometimes without any formal trial or process. The extravagant worship which they paid to some of these animal deities, (as to the bull at Memphis, the goat at Mendes, the lion at Leontopolis, ^c the crocodile at the lake Moeris; and to many others at different places,) exceeds all belief; for they were kept in consecrated enclosures, and well attended on by men of high rank, who at great expense provided victuals for them, which consisted of the greatest dainties. Nor was this all; for these creatures were washed in hot baths, and anointed with the most precious ointments, and perfumed with the most odoriferous scents. They lay on the richest carpets, and other costly furniture; and, that they might want nothing to make their lives as happy as possible, they had the most beautiful females of their several kinds, to which they gave the name of concubines, provided for them.

When any of these animals died, the Egyptians lamented them as if they had been their dearest children, and frequently laid out more than they were worth in their burials. If a cat died in any house, all the family shaved their eyebrows; and if a dog, their whole body; and thus, putting themselves in mourning, they wrapped the dead body up in fine linen, and carried it to be embalmed; where, being anointed with oil of cedar and other aromatic preparations to keep it from putrefaction, it was buried with great solemnity in a sacred coffin. So true is that reflection ² of the apostle, and with regard to these Egyptians certainly it was made, that 'though they knew God, yet they glorified him not as God; but changed the glory of God into the image of four-footed beasts, and his truth into a lie; and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. Amen.'

Before we leave Egypt, the sacred historian seems to remind us to take a view of some of the monumental works that are found there, and which, having been built within the compass of the period we are now upon, may well be presumed to be the product of some of the burdens and hard labour which the Egyptian kings laid upon the Israelites.

² Rom. i. 21, 23, 25.

^b Herodotus gives us an instance of this in a Roman, who happening accidentally to kill a cat, the mob immediately gathered about the house where he was, and could neither by the entreaties of some principal men sent by the king, nor by the fear of the Romans, with whom they were then negotiating a peace, be prevailed on to spare his life. And, what may seem still more incredible, it is reported that at a time when there was a famine in Egypt, which drove the inhabitants to such extremity, that they were forced to feed on one another, there was no one person accused of having tasted of any of these sacred animals.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 3.

^c The crocodile seems to be the last animal to which mankind could be tempted to pay divine adoration; but that this might be done with more safety, one of these creatures was trained up to be tame and familiar for the purpose, and had his ears adorned with strings of jewels and gold, and his fore feet with chains. He was fed with consecrated provisions at the public charge; and when strangers went to see him, which often happened out of curiosity, they also carried him a present of a cake, dressed meat, and wine, or a drink made with honey, which was offered to him by the priests; and when he died his body was embalmed, and buried in a sacred coffin at Arsinoë.—Herodotus, b. 2. and Strabo, b. 17.

^d It is a common opinion, that the word pyramid is derived from the Greek pyr or pur, fire; and that these structures were ders of the world, and there is more of them now remaining, than of all the other six, which have been so much celebrated. Not far from the place where Memphis once stood, there are three of these structures at no great distance from each other; two of which are shut up, but the third, which is the largest, and stands open for the inspection of travellers, we shall here describe, as a probable specimen of all the rest. a so called from their shape, which ascended from a broad basis, and ended in a point like a flame of fire. Others, whose opinion Vossius seems to approve, say that the name comes from the word pyros, which, in the same language, signifies white, because they suppose them to have been the granaries of the ancient Egyptian kings. But a late writer, versed in the Coptic tongue, has given us another etymology from that language, wherein ponro signifies a king, and missi, a race or generation, and the reason why the pyramids had this name given them, was, as he tells us, because they were erected to preserve the memory of the princes, who were their founders, and their families.—Wilkins' Dissert. de Ling. Copt. p. 108.

a We shall here give the result of the investigations of modern travellers, regarding the pyramids of Egypt. The three largest are situated at Geez or Djiza, nearly opposite to Grand Cairo, and are named from their supposed founders, Cheops, Chephren, and Mycerinus. Their height has been differently represented, and, owing to incorrectness, or different standards of measure, has been stated at all the gradations from about 800 to 500 feet. The following dimensions, however, taken by the French engineers may be given as very nearly accurate: That of Cheops, 448 feet in height, and 728 on each side of the base; Chephren, 398 feet in height, and 655 on each side of the base; and Mycerinus, 162 feet in height, and 280 on each side of the base.

The pyramid of Cheops, which is the largest, is ascended by an uninterrupted series of steps, diminishing from four to two and a half feet high in approaching the top. The breadth of each step is equal to its height. Upon the top there is a platform thirty-two feet square, consisting of nine large stones, about a ton each, though inferior to some of the other stones, which vary from five to thirty feet long, and from three to four feet high. From this platform Dr Clarke saw to the south the pyramids of Saccara, and on the east of these, smaller monuments of the same kind nearer to the Nile. He remarked also an appearance of ruins which might be traced the whole way from the pyramids of Djiza to those of Saccara, as if the whole had once constituted one great cemetery. The stones upon this platform, as well as most of the others employed in constructing the decreasing ranges from the base upwards, are of soft limestone, of the same nature as the calcareous rock upon which the pyramids stand. The pyramids are built with common mortar externally, but no appearance of mortar is discerned in the more perfect masonry of the interior. It has been calculated, that this pyramid was built 490 years before the first Olympiad, or about 3000 years ago. It was explored by Mr Davidson in 1763; and with more success by Captain Caviglia in 1817.

The second pyramid, that of Chephren, is thought to have been covered by stucco of gypsum and flint. Belzoni discovered its entrance in the north front, in 1818. Advancing along a narrow passage, 100 feet long, he found the great chamber forty-six feet long by sixteen wide, and twenty-three high, cut out of the solid rock. It contained a granite sarcophagus, half sunk in the floor, with many bones, some of which have proved to be those of the bull. A little to the east of this pyramid is the sphinx, cut out of the same sort of rock upon which the pyramids are built; its height from the knees to the top of the head is thirty-eight feet.

To the south of these pyramids there are others, which shoot far into the deserts of Libya, and are generally called the pyramids of Saccara. These erections appear to be more ancient than those about Geez. They are less perfect, and some of them are formed of unburned bricks. The most ancient bricks of Egypt were only dried by the heat of the sun; and that they might stick more closely together, the clay was mixed with chopped straw; and hence the Israelites, while in slavery in Egypt, made use of straw in making bricks. Some of these pyramids are rounded at the top, and are like hillocks cased with stone. One of them has steps like that of Cheops. The ranges or steps are six in number, each range being twenty-five feet high and eleven feet wide. The total height of this pyramid is 150 feet.

It is situate on a rocky hill, which, in a gentle and easy ascent, rises 100 feet, in the sandy desert of Libya, about a quarter of a mile from the plains of Egypt. Its basis is generally supposed to be an exact square, and every side, according to those that have been as careful as possible in its mensuration, about 693 English feet: so that the whole area of it contains 480,249 square feet, or something more than eleven acres of ground.

According to Herodotus, the pyramids were formed by distinct courses of stone, which successively diminished in size as the proportions of the edifices required it. Every course was so much within that immediately below it, as to make each front of the pyramid form a sort of stair. This agrees with the descriptions of modern travellers. A very simple machine, according to the same author, placed upon the first course, served to raise the stones destined for the construction of the second. The second being finished a similar machine was fixed upon it, and so on for the rest, one or more of the machines being always left upon each of the courses already laid, to serve successively for raising the stones from step to step. It is pretty certain, that the pyramids had all originally an outward coat either of square flags of marble or of bricks, so that they presented to the eye a perfectly even slope; but much of this has disappeared, through the dilapidation of time and other causes.

Many unsatisfactory conjectures have been formed, and theories adopted, with regard to the original design or use for which pyramids were built. The greater number of writers on the subject are of opinion, that they were erected for the tombs of kings and conquerors, to preserve their remains inviolate, and hand down their memory to the latest posterity. Herodotus states, that the Egyptians considered the pyramidal form as emblematical of human life, the broad base on the earth representing the commencement, and the gradation to a point, the termination of our existence. The emblem, if inverted, would bear an equally natural interpretation; yet this is the reason he alleges for pyramids being used for sepulture. That they were erected for astronomical purposes is a fanciful conjecture, although it is certain that they are constructed on scientific principles, and give evidence of some progress in astronomy, for their sides are accurately adapted to the four cardinal points. That they were meant for altars to the gods, their tapering form being in imitation of flame, as the Persians and other nations worshipped fire; or that they were constructed as a permanent memorial of the proper length of the cubit, of which it is said, that all their dimensions contain a certain number of multiples, appear to be conjectures equally strained and fanciful. Still less were they adapted to the purpose of granaries, as some have supposed. That they were originally intended to remedy the disadvantage of the Delta, and particularly Upper Egypt, by attracting the clouds and eliciting a discharge of rain, may be considered as in some measure sanctioned by the enormous sphinx found in their vicinity, and its relation to the fertilizing of Egypt by the waters of the Nile, the sphinx, representing the head and bosom of a woman with the body of a lion, being designed to symbolize the annual inundation, which takes place while the sun passes through the signs of the zodiac, denominated the Virgin and the Lion. But whatever their original destination was, or whether they ever served any purpose farther than gratifying the vanity of their builders, they now, as has been well remarked, harmonize admirably with a dewless heaven, a sandy waste, a people that have been. There is now a sublimity in their uselessness. Standing on the same earth which has entombed so many thousand generations, pointing to the same sky which heard the cry of the oppressed when they were building; they no longer belong to Cheops or Sesostris, Pharaohs or Ptolemies, Mamelukes or Turks, but to the imagination of mankind. "The humblest pilgrim," says Dr Clarke, "pacing the Libyan sands around them, while he is conscious that he walks in the footsteps of many mighty and renowned men, imagines himself to be, for an instant, admitted into their illustrious conclave. Persian satraps, Macedonian heroes, Grecian bards, sages, and historians, all of every age, and nation, and religion, have participated, in common with him, the same feelings, and have trodden the same ground."—Ed.

Its altitude, if measured by its perpendicular, is 481 feet, but if taken according to the inclination of the pyramid, as it ascends, it is exactly equal to a side of its basis.

The ascent to the top of this structure is by degrees, or steps, which run round the whole pyramid in a level, and if the stones were entire on every side, would make a narrow walk. The first of these steps is near four feet in height and three in breadth; but the higher one ascends, they proportionably diminish. They are made of massy and polished stone, so very large, that the breadth and depth of every step is one single stone; but as the weather has in many places worn these steps, this pyramid cannot be ascended without some difficulty. According to the computation of most modern travellers, the steps are 207 or 208 in number, which end ^a on the top, in a handsome platform, covered with nine stones, besides two that are wanting at the corners, of sixteen or seventeen feet square, from whence you have a pleasant prospect of Old Cairo, and the adjacent country.

On the sixteenth step from the bottom of this pyramid, there is a door or entry of three feet and a half in height, and a little less in breadth, through which you descend insensibly, much about seventy-six feet, and then come to another passage, which very probably is of the same dimensions with the first entrance, but is so choked up with the sand, which the wind blows in, that it is no easy matter for a man of any bulk to squeeze himself through it. Having passed this strait, however, you meet with nothing deserving observation, till on the left hand you enter a passage which leads into a gallery 16 feet high, and 162 feet long; a very stately piece of work indeed, and not inferior either in curiosity of art, or richness of materials, to the most sumptuous and magnificent buildings! The stone of which this gallery is built, is a white polished marble, very evenly cut into large tables, and jointed so close, as hardly to be perceived by the most curious eye: but what adds a grace to the whole structure, though it makes the passage the more slippery and difficult, is the acclivity or rising of the ascent, which, however, is not a little facilitated by certain holes made in the floor, about six hands' breadth from one another, into which a man may set his feet, while he holds by a bench of marble, which runs all along the gallery, with one hand, and carries his light in the other.

As soon as you come to the end of this gallery, you enter another square hole, much of the same dimensions with the former, which brings you into two little rooms, lined with a rich kind of speckled marble; and thence you proceed into the chamber of the tombs or sepulchres, which is very large and spacious, 32 feet long, 16 feet wide, and 19 feet high. This room stands, as it were, in the heart and centre of the pyramid, equidistant from all the sides, and almost in the midst between the basis and the top. The floor, the sides, and the roof of it

^a On this platform Proclus supposed that the Egyptian priests made their astronomical observations; but it is far from being probable that these structures were designed for observatories, and it is scarce to be conceived that the priests would take the pains to ascend so high, when they might make the same observations with more ease, and as much certainty below, having as free and open a prospect of the heavens, and over the plains of Egypt, from the rock whereon it was built, as from the pyramid itself.

are all made of vast and exquisite tables of Thebaic marble, which, if they were not sullied with the steam of torches, would certainly appear very bright and shining. From the top to the bottom of the chamber, there are about six ranges of this stone, which being all sized to an equal height, run very gracefully round it. The roof is flat, and consists of nine stones, whereof seven, in the middle, are each four feet wide, and 16 feet long, but the other two, which are at each end, appear not above two feet broad apiece, because the other half of them is built into the wall. The stones lie athwart, over the breadth of the chamber, with their ends resting upon the walls on each side.

At the end of this glorious room stands an empty tomb, three feet and an inch wide, and seven feet two inches long; the stone which it is made of is the same with the lining of the room, a beautiful speckled marble, above five inches thick, and yet, being hollow within, and uncovered at the top, whenever it is struck it sounds like a great bell: which is just such a wonder as the surprising echo that is heard in this place, and, as some travellers tell us, will repeat the same sound some ten or twelve times together. The figure of this tomb is like an altar, or two cubes finely set together. It is cut smooth and plain, exquisitely finely polished, but without any sculpture or engraving. It is not to be doubted, but that the tomb was placed here before the pyramid was finished; and one reason for its want of ornaments may be what the inhabitants of the country tell us, namely, that it was built for the sepulchre of a king who was never buried in it: and the common opinion is, that it was the same Pharaoh who, by the just judgment of God, was drowned in the Red Sea.

These are the principal things that have been observed of this pyramid; only, to give us a still fuller idea of the vastness of its structure, Pliny has taken care to inform us, that it was 20 years in building; that 37,000 men were, every day, employed in the work; and that 1800 talents were expended upon them merely for radishes and onions. Which last article may seem incredible perhaps to those that were never in the country; but when it is considered, that this is the ordinary food of the common people, and that almost all those who were employed in raising these great piles were slaves and mercenaries, who, besides bread and water, had nothing but radishes and onions, there will be no occasion for any surprise or wonder at the supposed largeness of this account.

A building of the like date, and not of inferior grandeur, was the labyrinth which stood in the Hæraclæotic Nome, or province, near the city of Arsinoë, and not far from the lake Moeris. The design of this structure seems to have been both for a pantheon, or universal temple for all the gods that were worshipped in the several places of Egypt, and also for a general convention-house, for the states of the whole nation to meet, and enact laws, and determine causes of great importance: and therefore it is said by some to have been built at the common charge of the twelve kings who, in those days, reigned all at once in Egypt, as a monument of their magnificence, and a place for their sepulture.

vince or nome had, in this building, a distinct hall, where its principal magistrates used to meet; that these halls were vaulted, were surrounded with pillars of white stone, finely polished, and had an equal number of doors opposite to one another, six opening to the north, and six to the south, all encompassed by the same wall; that there were three thousand chambers in this edifice, fifteen hundred in the upper part, and as many under ground; and that he viewed every room in the upper part, but was not permitted by those who kept the palace, to go into the subterraneous part, because the sepulchres of the holy crocodiles, and of the kings, who built the labyrinth, were there. What he saw there, as he reports, seemed to surpass the art of man; so many ways out, by various passages, and infinite returns, afforded a thousand occasions of wonder, as he passed from a spacious hall to a chamber, from thence to a private closet, then again into other passages out of the closet, and out of the chambers, into more spacious rooms, where all the walls and roofs were not only encrusted with marble, but richly adorned likewise with figures of sculpture.

To this description of Herodotus, others add, that this edifice stood in the midst of an immense square, surrounded with buildings at a great distance; that the porch was of Parian marble, and all the other pillars of the marble of Syene: that within it were the temples of the several deities, and galleries to which one ascended by 90 steps, adorned with many columns of porphyry, images of their gods, and statues of their kings, of a monstrous size; that the whole edifice consisted of stone, the floors were laid with vast tables, and the roof looked like one continued field of stone; that the passages met and crossed one another with so much intricacy, that it was impossible for a stranger to find his way, either in or out, without a guide; and that several of the apartments were so contrived, that upon opening the doors, there was heard within a terrible noise of thunder.

Such was the strength of this wonderful building, that it withstood, for many ages, not only the rage of time, but that of the inhabitants of Heracleopolis, who, worshipping the ichneumon, or water-rat, the mortal enemy of the crocodile, which was a peculiar deity of Arsinoe, bore an inconceivable hatred to the labyrinth, which was the sepulchre, as we said, of the sacred crocodiles; and therefore assaulted and demolished it, though there are some remains of it still to be seen, which retain manifest marks of its ancient splendour.

One building more, supposed to be the work of this period, though, according to modern accounts, it still stands firm and entire, is the well of the patriarch Joseph. It is entirely hewn out of a rock, in a kind of an oval or oblong form, being eighteen feet wide, twenty-four long, and in the whole two hundred and seventy-six deep. The depth is properly divided into two parts, which we may call the upper and the lower well; and to each of these there is a wheel, which being turned round by two oxen in each place, draws up the water by a long chain, to which are fastened several leathern vessels, that fill and empty themselves alternately as the wheel goes round.

To go down to the second well, as we call it, which is but fifteen feet long, and nine wide, there is a staircase of so easy a descent, that some say the oxen which draw the water below, are every day drove down and up it; though others report, that they are let down and drawn up upon a platform. However this be, it is certain that the staircase turns twelve times round the well, for which reason the Arabs call it the well of the winding staircase, and of these turnings, six have eighteen steps each, and the other six have nineteen, which make two hundred and twenty-two steps in all: and to secure you from falling, as you go down, you have, on the left hand, the main rock, and on the right, some of the same rock left, which serves both as a wall to the well on the inside, and on the other side as a wall to the staircase, which, at convenient distances, has windows cut in it, that convey the light down from the mouth of the well.

When you go down to the lower well, which has likewise a staircase, but neither so wide, nor so deep as the other, and no parapet on the side of the well, which makes the descent dangerous, it is here that you see the oxen at work, turning the wheel, and drawing the water from a spring at the bottom, about eight or nine feet deep; which water, passing through a pipe into a large cistern, is from thence drawn up again by two other oxen, which turn the wheel above; and so from a reservoir at the top of the well, the water is conveyed into all the apartments of the castle of Grand Cairo, which, by the bye, as Thevenot tells us, both for strength and beauty, is one of the finest palaces he ever saw; a work not unworthy the ancient Pharaohs and Ptolemies who built it, and which comes not behind the pomp and magnificence of the pyramids.

There are some other buildings in this place, such as Joseph's hall, Joseph's prison, Joseph's granaries, &c., which the inhabitants ascribe to that patriarch, as they do indeed every fine piece of antiquity: but as there is a The remains of this noble structure are thus described by our author. "The first thing you see is a large portico of marble, facing the rising sun, and sustained by four great marble pillars, but composed of several pieces. Three of these pillars are still standing, but one of the middle ones is half fallen. In the middle is a door whose sides and entablature are very massy; and above is a frieze, wherein is represented an head with wings, stretched out along the frieze, and several hieroglyphics underneath.—Passing through this portico, you enter into a fine large hall, above 40 feet high, all of marble. The roof consists of twelve tables of marble, exquisitely joined, each 25 feet long, and three broad, which cross the room from one end to the other; and as the room is not arched, but flat, you cannot but be struck with admiration at the boldness of its architecture, since it is scarcely conceivable how it could continue so many ages in a position so improper to support so prodigious a weight. At the end of this hall, over against the first door, there is a second portico, with the same ornaments as the first, but less, by which you enter into a second hall, not so big as the first, but covered with eight stones. At the end of this room, strik'd forwards, there is a third portico, still less than the second, as well as the hall into which it leads, though it has sixteen stones to roof it; and at the end of this third hall, there is a fourth portico set against the wall, and placed there for symmetry only, and to answer the rest. The length of these three halls is the whole depth of the building, in its present condition. It was on the two sides, and especially under ground, that the prodigious number of rooms and avenues, mentioned by the ancients, were built.—What is now remaining of it seems to be no more than a fourth part of the inner edifice, which, in all probability, had four fronts, and twelve halls answering to them: the rest are decayed by time, or demolished by design, as appears from the prodigious ruins which are to be seen all around it.—Lucas' Voyages, b. 2. p. 18., &c.

little or no probability that any of these came under the period we are now upon, we must refer the reader, who is minded to satisfy his curiosity in this matter, ¹ to the authors who have purposely treated of them; and shall only take notice farther, that the great Selden in his Arundel Marbles, reckons the fabulous stories of Greece, such as the flood of Deucalion, the burning of Phaeton, the rape of Proserpine, the mysteries of Ceres, the story of Thebes by Cadmus, together with the fables of Bacchus, Minos, Perseus, Æsculapius, Mercury, and Hercules, to have fallen out under this period; and it is certain that ² the learned Spanheim makes several ancient kingdoms, as that of the Argives, the Cretans, the Phrygians, the Ethiopians, the Phœnicians, the Midianites, Canaanites, Idumæans, and Nabatheans, either to have been founded, or to have flourished in this time. But as these, and other heathen nations, had no historian or chronologer of their own, and the Greeks, who undertook to write for them, for want of a certain knowledge of their affairs, have stuffed their accounts with the rapes and robberies of their gods; we thought it more proper to stop here than to enter into a barren land, where the country for a long way lies waste and uncultivated; or if perchance any fruit is to be seen, like the famed fictitious apples about the banks of the Dead Sea, it crumbles at the very first touch into dust and ashes.

BOOK IV.

CONTAINING AN ACCOUNT OF THINGS FROM THE ISRAELITES' DEPARTURE OUT OF EGYPT, TO THEIR ENTRANCE INTO THE LAND OF CANAAN, IN ALL FORTY YEARS.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

IN contemplating the extraordinary deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt, we must advert to the instrument employed by divine providence in its accomplishment. Moses, who was called to this difficult and perilous task, was pre-eminently fitted by his talents and his temper for its performance. 'There arose not a prophet like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, in all the signs and wonders which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land, and in all that mighty land, and in all the great terror, which Moses showed in the sight of all Israel.' He himself having been rescued when an infant from the most imminent danger, was preserved to be the deliverer of his nation.

The redemption of the Israelites from the land of Egypt, is the greatest type of Christ's redemption, of any providential event whatsoever. It was intended to shadow forth that greater redemption from the captivity of sin and Satan, which was wrought out by the Son of God, when he destroyed principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in his cross.

Nor can we fail to observe in the narrative of the period on which we are now entering, how much the giving of the law at Sinai tended to prepare the way for the accomplishment of this great redemption. It is here seen how the covenant of works operates as a school-master in leading us to Christ; how the law which is holy, just, and good, shuts us up to the faith of the gospel. That it might have full effect in this way, God was pleased to institute at the same time the ceremonial law—full of various and innumerable typical representations of good things to come; by which the Israelites were directed every day, month, and year in their religious actions—in all that appertained to their ecclesiastical and civil state, so that the whole nation by this law was, as it were, constituted in a typical state. The great outlines of gospel truth were thus held forth to the nation; and the people were thus directed, from age to age, to look for salvation to the Lamb that was slain from the foundation of the world.

We must also observe the wisdom and the goodness of God in giving, for the first time, a written communication from himself. That written and infallible word, with its subsequent accessions of infallible wisdom, was the means, as it was designed to be, of carrying on in the world the work of redemption. The word of God had previously been transmitted from age to age by tradition; but now the ten commandments, the five books of Moses, and probably the book of Job, were, by the special command of God, committed to writing, and were laid up in the tabernacle, to be kept there for the use of the church.

That the church might derive instruction from typical representation, in the character and actions of intelligent beings, the progress of the redeemed through this world to that rest which remaineth for them in the heavenly Canaan, was shadowed forth by the journey of the children of Israel through the wilderness, from Egypt to Canaan. The low and wretched condition from which they are delivered,—the price paid for their redemption,—the application of that redemption in their conversion to God,—the various trials, difficulties, and temptations which they have to encounter in their christian course,—the manner in which they are safely conducted through this world by their great Leader, to their immortal inheritance, are all typified and represented in the history of Israel from their departure out of Egypt, to their entrance into the promised land. 'All these things happened unto them for ensamples, and they were written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.'¹

These typical representations were at the time accompanied with clearer predictions of Christ than had before been given. 'I will raise up a prophet,' says God unto Moses, 'from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth, and he shall speak unto them all that I command him.' It is unnecessary to say, how clearly the mediatorial office of the Redeemer is pointed out in this remarkable prophecy. Balaam, also, during this period bore testimony to Christ, in the sublime prediction which he uttered concerning him in the well known words—'There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall arise out of Israel:—Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion.'

Finally, we ought to notice in the narrative of God's procedure towards his ancient people, on which we are about to enter, the outpouring of his Holy Spirit on the young generation in the wilderness, or that generation which entered into Canaan. Concerning this generation God had said to their fathers—'But your little ones, which you said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despised.' This generation was, accordingly, brought into Canaan. They were distinguished for their piety, and their zealous adherence to all the will of God.

SECT. I.

CHAP. I.—From their Departure to the Building of the Tabernacle.

THE HISTORY.

WHEN the Israelites set out from Egypt, they made Rameses, the chief city of Goshen, the place of their general rendezvous; and from thence, on the 15th day of the first month, they travelled about ten or twelve miles to Succoth, where they made a stop, and reviewed their company, which consisted of 600,000 persons, besides children and strangers; for strangers of several nations, having seen the wonders which were wrought for their deliverance, left Egypt at the same time, with a purpose to accompany their fortunes.

While the sense of their deliverance, and God's judgments was fresh in their minds, Moses was commanded to let the people know, that when they came to be settled in the land of Canaan, the first-born both of man and beast, in remembrance of God's having spared their first-born when he destroyed the Egyptians, should be set apart and dedicated to him; and as Joseph, dying in the faith of this their deliverance, had laid an injunction upon his brethren, whenever they should go from thence, to carry his bones out of Egypt, so Moses^a took care to have the coffin, wherein he had lain for above 140 years, not left behind.

^b From Succoth their nearest way to Canaan was certainly through the country of the Philistines; but for ^a The Jews tell us, that upon the Israelites' departure out of Egypt, every tribe took care to bring along with them the bones of the ancestor of their family; but though they are not always to be credited in matters of this nature, and Josephus does not seem to have dreamed of any such act of filial piety, or else he would, in all probability, have recorded it; yet St Stephen, (Acts vii. 15, 16,) seems to allude to some tradition among them, when he tells us, that 'Jacob and the fathers went down into Egypt, and were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre which Abraham had bought of the sons of Emmor.'—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^b It is somewhat difficult to make out the geography of the places where the Hebrews encamped, between their parting from Rameses and their arrival at the Red Sea; but the account of fear that a people unaccustomed to war should, in case of any opposition, repent of their deliverance, and take it into their heads to return into Egypt, God ordered them to take their route along the coasts of the Red Sea; and for their greater encouragement and security, himself undertook to guide and direct them, both in their marches and encampments, by the wonderful appearance of a cloud, in the form of a large column, which shaded them from the heat of the sun by day, and in the night-time became a pillar of fire, or a bright cloud, to supply the sun's absence, and illuminate their camp. By this means they were enabled, upon any occasion, to march both day and night: and, under this auspicious guide, proceeding from Succoth, they came to Etham, which gives name to the wilderness on whose borders it is situated, and there they encamped.

In the mean time the King of Egypt had information brought him, that the Israelites, instead of returning to his dominions, were attempting their escape into the deserts of Arabia, by the cape of the Red Sea; and therefore grieving at the loss of so many useful slaves, and supposing that by speedy marches he might overtake those who have wrote upon the subject is,—That though there are two places named Rameses, which are a little differently pointed, yet they are but one and the same, or, at the most, that they differ only in this, that the one was the province, and the other the chief city of it; that Succoth, not far from Rameses, in the way to the Red Sea, had its name from the tents (for so the Hebrew word signifies) which the Israelites pitched here, as we find upon the like occasion another place between Jordan and the brook Jabbock, so named; that Etham lay on the confines of Egypt and Arabia Petrea, not far from the Red Sea, and gave the denomination to the wilderness adjacent; that Pi-hahiroth, which in our English, and some other translations, is rendered as one proper name, is by the Septuagint made part of it an appellative, so as to signify a mouth, for so the word pi may mean, or a narrow passage between two mountains, lying not far from the western coast of the Red Sea; that magal was probably a tower or castle, for the word carries that signification in it, upon the top of one of these mountains, which might give denomination to the city, which, as Herodotus informs us, lay not far distant from it; and that Baal-Zephon was by some learned men thought to be an idol set up to keep the borders of the country, and to hinder slaves from making their escape. Baal, indeed, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies lord; and hence the name is generally applied to the eastern idols; and the word zephon is thought to be derived from the radix zaph, to watch or spy; and from hence it is conjectured, that this idol has its temple on the top of some adjacent mountain, and that the sacred historian particularly takes notice of it, to show how unable it was, whatever opinion the Egyptians might have of it, to hinder the Israelites from going out of Egypt. There is but small certainty, however, to be gathered from the etymology of words; and therefore the authority of Eusebius should ponderate with us, who makes it not an idol, but a town, standing upon the northern point of the Red Sea, where the ancients, especially the Jews, think that the Israelites passed it, and where there stands to this day a Christian monastery.—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries, his Dissertation on the Passage of the Red Sea, and Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

^c It is not unlikely, that some of the mixed multitude (Exod. xii. 38,) which went along with the Israelites, observing this alteration in their route, and not being able to perceive the reason of it, might forsake them, and returning to Pharaoh, inform him, that they had lost their way, and were entangled among the mountains; or, what is more likely, some spies, which Pharaoh had upon them, seeing them leave the way to Horeb, where they desired to go three days' journey, in order to offer sacrifices, concluded that they never intended to return to Egypt, but were running quite away, and might therefore bring Pharaoh the news thereof, as we may suppose, upon the eighteenth day.—Patrick's Commentaries.

and recover them, he mustered up what forces he could, and for the greater expedition, a considerable quantity of a chariots and horsemen, and with these b put himself upon the pursuit. But God, who well understood what measures were taking in Pharaoh's court, instead of suffering the Israelites to march round the point of the c Red Sea, as they probably intended, ordered them to a Josephus, who loves to magnify matters, when they tend to the glory of his countrymen, as well as conceal what would occasion their disgrace, tells us, that the Egyptian army consisted of 600 chariots, 50,000 horse, and 200,000 foot: but how so large a number could be raised in so short a time, or what need there was of so vast an armament against a weak and defenceless people, is hardly conceivable. As therefore we may presume, that the haste which the Egyptians were in, lest the Israelites should get out of the straits wherein they were entangled, or make their escape some other way, before they came up with them, made them pursue them with chariots and horsemen for the greater expedition; so we may observe, that the chariots they employed in this pursuit, are called chosen chariots, which most interpreters imagine to be such as were armed with scythes, which being drawn with horses, and filled with men, who threw darts and spears and other offensive weapons from them, could not but make a strange havoc wherever they came; and the number which the Scripture mentions, under proper captains, who might have the direction of them, was enough to destroy all the Israelites, being worn with hard bondage, wearied with marching, destitute of arms, strangers to war, and now encamped in a very disadvantageous situation.—Josephus' Antiquities, b. 2. c. 15., Ainsworth's Annotations, and Hovell's History.

b "Of all the infatuated resolutions," to use the words of the learned Dr Jackson, b. 10. c. 11., "that either king or people adventured on, the pursuing the Israelites with such a mighty army, after they had so irritated and urged them to leave their country, may well seem, to every indifferent reader, the most stupid that ever was taken." And so indeed the author of the Book of Wisdom, c. xix. 3., justly censures it: "For whilst they were yet mourning," says he, "and making lamentation at the graves of the dead, they added another foolish device, and pursued them as fugitives, whom they had entreated to be gone." But how much soever it was that the Egyptians had suffered for detaining the Hebrews; yet, now that they were gone, they possibly might be of the same mind with the Syrians, (1 Kings xx. 23.) who fancied, that the God of Israel might not be alike powerful in all places; or, if he was, they might nevertheless think, that Moses' commission extended no farther than the meridian of Egypt, or that if it did, it might however have no power over mighty hosts and armies. They knew, at least, that the Israelites, as we said, had no skill in military matters, no captains of infantry, no cavalry at all, no weapons or engines of war; whereas they were well furnished and equipped with every thing of this nature; and upon these and the like presumptions, it was that they became foolhardy, and desperately resolute, either to bring back the Israelites to their slavery, or to be revenged upon them for all the losses they had sustained, and the penalties they had suffered.—Patrick's Commentary.

c The Red Sea, called by the ancients Sinus Arabicus, and now Golfo de Mecca, is that part or branch of the southern sea which interposes itself between Egypt on the west, and Arabia Felix and some part of Petraea on the east; while the northern bounds of it touch upon Idumea, or the coast of Edom. Edom, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies red, and was the nickname given Esau for selling his birthright for a mess of pottage. The country which his posterity possessed was called after his name, and so was the sea which adjoined to it; but the Greeks, not understanding the reason of the appellation, translated it into their tongue, and called it ἑρυθρὸν θάλασσαν; thence the Latins, Mare Rubrum, and we, the Red Sea. The Hebrews call it the sea of Suph, or Flags, by reason of the great abundance of that kind of weed, which grows at the bottom of it; and the Arabs at this day name it Bahr el Chalsem, that is, the Sea of Clysm, from a town situate on its western coast, much about the place where the Israelites passed over from the Egyptian to the Arabian shore. But as the word clysm may denote a drowning or overflowing with water, it is not improbable that the town built in this place, as well as this part of the sea, might have such a name given it, advance along the coasts of it, until they came to Pihahiroth, which lies between Migdol and the sea, and there to encamp.

By this time Pharaoh and his army were come up with them; and when the Israelites perceived themselves hemmed in on every side, with the sea in their front, huge mountains on their flanks, and the Egyptian army in the rear, they began to despair of any means of escape, and to clamour against Moses for having induced them to leave Egypt, and for bringing them into the wilderness to be sacrificed. Moses, however, being apprized of God's design, instead of d resenting their reproaches, endeavoured to comfort them by giving them assurance that God himself would certainly fight for them, and by his almighty power bring matters to such an issue, that these very Egyptians, of whom they were so much afraid, should not one of them live to molest them any more.

With these comfortable words, he ordered them to advance towards the sea-side: and as they were advancing, the miraculous cloud, we were speaking of, removed from the front to the rear of the Israelites' camp, and so turning its dark side towards the Egyptians, made them incapable of knowing what they were about; while by its bright or fiery side, which it turned to the Israelites, it gave them a sufficiency of light, and kept the two camps from joining that night.

As soon as the Israelites came to the brink of the sea, Moses waved his sacred rod, and immediately a strong east wind blew, and drove the waves back from the land, and by dividing the waters, which stood suspended as it were a wall on each hand, made a dry and safe passage for the Israelites, until they had gained the other shore. The Egyptians, in the mean while, never suspecting but that they, with their chariots and horsemen, might safely follow, where they saw the Israelites go on foot, entered after them into the midst of the sea; but about break of day they began to see their error, and e their whole army

d The words which Moses makes himself speak upon this critical occasion, (Exod. xiv. 13, 14.) discover a wonderful spirit and bravery; and it is no bad comment which the Jewish historian has given us of them. "Put the case," says he, "that you had deposited some great trust in the hands of a person that had hitherto managed all well and wisely for you, might not you reasonably depend upon that man for the same care and kindness, and in the same case too, over again? What a madness is it for you to despond then, where God himself has taken you under his protection, and of his own free bounty, performed every thing by me that can contribute to your freedom and security? Nay, the very difficulty of the case you are in, is an argument to inflame your hope rather than discourage it. He hath brought you into this distress, on purpose to show his power and kindness in bringing you out again, even to the surprise and admiration of yourselves, as well as your enemies. It is not God's time to interpose with his almighty power in small matters, but in great and trying calamities; when all hopes of human help fail us, that is the season for him to work out the deliverance of those who cast themselves upon him. And therefore fear nothing, so long as you have him for your protector and defender, who is able to raise the lowly and oppressed, and to lay the honour of their persecutors in the dust. Be not afraid of the Egyptian armed troops, neither despond of your lives and safeties, because you are at present locked up between the sea and the mountains, and have no visible way in nature to come off; for the God whom you serve, is able to level all these mountains, and lay the ocean dry. His will, in fine, be done."—Josephus' Antiquities, b. 2. c. 15.

e The expression in the text is, that 'God troubled the host of in the utmost confusion. Their chariots were some of them broken, others ran into quicksands, and others cast off their carriages; so that, perceiving the hand of God against them, they were turning about, and offering to flee, but all in vain. As soon as the Israelites were all landed, Moses, by the divine command, stretched out his rod again over the sea: whereupon the roaring waves break loose from their invisible chain, and come rushing upon Pharaoh and his army, and overwhelm them all: while the Israelites, beholding with wonder and amazement, the carcasses and rich spoils of their enemies thrown upon the sea-shore, began, at least seemingly, to fear God, and to reverence his servant Moses; who, to celebrate this joyful deliverance, having composed a triumphant hymn, wherein he extols the greatness of God's power, and his amazing mercy to his people displayed on this occasion, divided the company into two great choirs; and, setting himself and his brother Aaron at the head of the men, and his sister Miriam with a timbrel in her hand, at the head of the women, they sung and played alternately, and in the height of their joy intermixed dances.^a

But notwithstanding all these thankful acknowledgements of God's goodness, scarce had the Israelites travelled three days from the Red Sea into the wilderness of Shur, before their excessive thirst, and want of water, put them out of all patience: and when in a short time they met with some, at a place which is called Marah, it proved so ^b bitter, that they could not drink it. This the Egyptians; and to enforce the strength of this expression, the Jewish historian tells us, that before God let loose the waves upon the Egyptians, fierce winds and tempests, storms of hail and rain, terrible thunderings and lightnings, and whatever else could make their condition horrible, were sent down upon them from above; and therefore it is not without good reason, that these words of the Psalmist have been applied to this occasion, 'The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee, and were afraid; the depths also were troubled: the clouds poured out water, the air thundered, and thine arrows went abroad. The voice of thy thunder was heard round about, the lightning shone upon the ground, the earth was moved and shook withal. Thy way is in the sea, and thy paths in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known:' whereupon it follows, 'thou leadest thy people like sheep, by the hand of Moses and Aaron.'—Josephus's Antiquities, b. 2., and Psal. lxxvii. 16. &c.

^a Exod. xv. 20. 'And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances.' Lady M. W. Montague, speaking of the eastern dances, says, 'Their manner is certainly the same that Diana is said to have danced on the banks of Eurotas. The great lady still leads the dance, and is followed by a troop of young girls, who imitate her steps, and, if she sings, make up the chorus. The tunes are extremely gay and lively, yet with something in them wonderfully soft. Their steps are varied according to the pleasure of her that leads the dance, but always in exact time.' (Letters, vol. ii. p. 45.) This gives us a different apprehension of the meaning of these words than we should otherwise form. Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her, with timbrels and dances. She led the dance, and they imitated her steps, which were not conducted by a set well known form, but extemporaneous. Probably David did not dance alone before the Lord, when the ark was removed, but led the dance in the same authoritative kind of way. (2 Sam. vi. 11. Judges xi. 34. 1 Sam. xviii. 6.) Representations similar to this are frequently to be met with in the ancient writers.—See Chandler's Life of David, vol. 2. p. 116.—Ed.

^b The word Marah, in the Hebrew language, signifies bitterness; and it was from the taste of the waters that the place received its name. That there are several fountains of bitter water not far from the Red Sea, at some small distance from the disappointment inflamed their thirst, and exasperated their murmurings against Moses, until, by the divine direction, he made use of the wood of a certain tree, which as soon as it was thrown into the water, changed its offensive quality, and made it sweet.^c

From Marah they went, and encamped at d Elim, where there were twelve wells of water, and a great quantity of palm or date trees, and here they continued for some time. From hence they removed towards the wilderness of Sin; but before they entered it, the supposed scarceness of provisions made them begin to distrust God, and to repent from their very hearts, that they had suffered themselves to be decoyed from the plenty they enjoyed in the land of Egypt, into a barren wild waste, where they could have no other prospect but to die with hunger: and therefore, to convince these murmuring people of his almighty power and providence, God was pleased to inform them, that he would take care to supply them with food from heaven, which accordingly came to pass. For that very evening, he caused ^e quails to fall among them in such great quantities, as city Arsinoe, is attested by Strabo, Diodorus, and most modern travellers; but then the question is, whether it was by the miraculous power of God, or by the natural virtue of the wood to which Moses was directed, that these bitter waters were at this time made sweet? The author of that excellent book called Ecclesiasticus, seems to be of the latter opinion: for, having treated of the honour and esteem due to a physician, he adds, 'The Lord has created medicines out of the earth, and he that is wise will not abhor them. Was not the water made sweet with wood, that the virtue thereof might be known!' Eccles. xxxviii. 5. But, notwithstanding the authority of this writer, we have reason to think, that there was no tree in these parts of this virtue, because had its virtue once been known, there is no question to be made, but that others, as well as Moses, would have made use of it to the same purpose; but that the writers who make mention of these bitter waters, would have told us, at the same time, of a tree or trees growing hard by, which had a medicinal quality to correct the taste of them; but since we meet with nothing of this kind, we may reasonably suppose that the author of Ecclesiasticus, a book of modern composition in comparison of Moses' writings, speculating in the chapter upon the medicines which God had provided for man's use, offered this hint purely from his own fancy, and without any authority for it; and consequently we may conclude, that the correction of the quality of this water is to be ascribed, not so much to the virtue of the wood, as to the power of God, who used it rather as a sign to the Israelites, than as an instrument to himself in doing it.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Pool's Annotations, and Shuckford's Connection, vol. 2. b. 10.

^c Exod. xv. 23. 'And when they came to Marah, they could not drink of the waters of Marah, for they were bitter.' Dr Shaw (Trav. p. 311.) thinks that these waters may be properly fixed at Coromdel, where there is a small ill, which, unless it be diluted by the dews and rain, is very brackish. Another traveller tells us that, at the foot of the mountain of Hamamel Aaron, a small but most delightful valley, a place called Garondec, is a rivulet that comes from the mountain, the water of which is tolerably good and sufficiently plentiful, but is bitter, though very clear. Pucecke says, there is a mountain known to this day by the name of Le Marah, and toward the sea is a salt well called Birhammer, which is probably the same here called Marah.—Id.

^d In remarking the several stations of the Israelites, from the Red Sea, until they came to the Mount Sinai, we must observe, that Moses does not set down every place where they encamped, as he does in Numbers, chap. xxxiii., but only those where some remarkable thing was done; but Elim, where they were now encamped, was esteemed a pleasant and fruitful place, at least in comparison of the desert and barren parts about it; and that the desert of Sin, which was their eighth station, and Rephidim their tenth, lay at equal distances, in their way to the holy mountain.—Bells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

quite covered their camp; and on the next morning, as soon as the dew was gone, there lay upon the ground a little white round thing, much in the shape of a coriander seed, which when the people saw, they were struck with admiration, and said one to another, ^a 'What is this?' And from whence they gave it the name of 'manna.'

This was the bread which the Israelites were to eat for the space of forty years; and therefore God was pleased to give these special directions concerning it.—That it was to be gathered by measure, an homer for every head, according to the number of each family: but this direction some persons slighting, and gathering above the proportion that was allowed them, found their quantity miraculously lessened, while the more moderate had theirs increased: that it was to be gathered fresh every morning, and all that was gathered consumed that day; which precept some persons likewise neglecting, and keeping a part of it until the next morning, found that it was putrefied and stunk: that on the seventh day, which was the ^b Sabbath, there was none

sion of the Jews themselves, is of uncertain signification, and may denote a locust as well as a quail. But what should rather incline us to the latter acceptation, is that passage of the Psalmist, (lxxxviii. 27.) where he tells us, that 'God rained flesh upon them, as thick as dust, and feathered fowls, like as the sand of the sea?' which cannot, with any tolerable propriety, be applied to insects. But here we must remember, that this was done in the middle of April, when these birds are known to fly out of Egypt cross the Red Sea in vast quantities; so that the sum of this miracle will consist, not so much in the prodigious number of them that fell in the Israelites' camp, as in God's directing them thither, and in that very evening too, according to his promise, and his servant Moses' prediction.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^a Our translation, and some others, make Moses fall into a plain contradiction, in relating this story of the manna, which they render thus; 'And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, it is manna, for they wist not what it was,' (Ex. xvi. 15.) whereas the Septuagint, and several authors both ancient and modern, have translated the text according to the original, 'The Israelites seeing this, said one to another, what is this? for they knew not what it was?' For we must observe, that the word by which they asked, 'what is this?' was, in their language, man, which signifies likewise meat ready prepared; and therefore it was always afterwards called man or mannu. Various are the conceits which the Jewish writers have entertained concerning the taste of this manna, and some of them not unlikely have been borrowed from the author of the book of Wisdom, where he tells us of manna, 'that it was able to content every man's delight, agreeing to every taste, and attempering itself to every man's liking.' (Wisd. xvi. 20, 21.) Whereupon some have affirmed, that it had the taste of any sort of fish or fowl, according to the wish of him that ate it; but these are idle fancies; what we know of certainty is this,—That here, in Exodus, Moses tells us, that its 'taste was like wafers made with honey,' and in Numbers, he says, that the cakes made of it had the 'taste of fresh oil,' (c. xi. 8.) so that we may conjecture, that it had a sweetness, when gathered, which evaporated in the grinding, and baking. It tasted like honey, when taken off the ground, but the cakes made of it were as cakes kneaded with oil.—Essay for a New Translation; and Shuckford's Connection, vol. 3. b. 10.

^b This seems to be the first time that the 'rest on the seventh day' was solemnly appointed. God, indeed, from the very first intended to preserve the memory of the creation in six days, by appointing the seventh day to be kept holy; but when, before the flood, men grew so wicked as to neglect the thoughts of God, they very little regarded the distinction between this day and others; and after the flood, the dispersion of mankind very much blotted it out of their minds, as it did many other good things. In the family of Abraham, we may presume, the remembrance of it was preserved, though not with such a strict abstinence from all labour as was afterwards enjoined, and therefore we read nothing of their resting from their travels upon that day, before to be found; and therefore, on the sixth they were to gather a double portion, which being laid up, according to God's direction, against the ensuing day, was never once known to corrupt: and that, to perpetuate the memory of this 'miraculous bread, wherewith God had fed their forefathers in the wilderness so long, an homer of it should be put in a pot, and repositied in the ark of the covenant within the sanctuary.

From the desert of Sin, the Israelites had not advanced many days' journey towards Horeb, until coming to Replidim, and finding no water there, they fell into their old way of distrusting God's providence, and murmuring against Moses; but on this occasion they seemed to be more mutinous and desperate than ever. 'It was in vain for Moses to endeavour to persuade them to be patient a little, and wait God's leisure. His words did but inflame and carry them to such a height of rage, that they even threatened to stone him; so that he was forced to have recourse to God, who was soon pleased to dissipate his fears, by promising to signalize that place by a miraculous supply of water, as he had lately done another by a miraculous supply of food. ^d Taking, therefore, the elders of the people, who might bear testimony to the fact, along with him, Moses, as he was commanded by God, went to a certain rock on the side of Mount Horeb, which was distinguished from all the rest by the divine appearance resting upon it, and no sooner had he smitten it with his rod, but water in abundance gushed out at several places, and joining in one common stream, ^e ran down to the camp at their coming out of Egypt. The truth is, they were kept under such severe servitude, and day and night so pressed by their taskmasters to hard labour without intermission, that all observation of the Sabbath was, very likely, laid aside; but when God brought them out of slavery, he renewed his commandment for it, with this addition, in memory of the Egyptian bondage, that they should rest from all manner of labour upon that day.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c Whether this manna had those extraordinary qualities in it or no, which some imagine, it must be allowed to be truly miraculous upon the following accounts. 1. That it fell but six days in the week. 2. That it fell in such prodigious quantity as sustained almost three millions of souls. 3. That there fell a double quantity every Friday, to serve them for the next day, which was their Sabbath. 4. That what was gathered on the first five days stunk, and bred worms, if kept above one day; but that which was gathered on Friday kept sweet for two days. And lastly, That it continued falling while the Israelites abode in the wilderness, but ceased as soon as they came out of it, and had got corn to eat in the land of Canaan.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^d Exod. xvii. 12. 'The elders of Israel.' Not only fathers, but old men, had great authority among the Israelites, and all the people of antiquity. They everywhere, in the beginning, chose judges for private affairs, and counsellors for the public, out of the oldest men. Thence came the name of senate and fathers of Rome, and that great respect for old age which they borrowed from the Lacedemonians. As soon as the Hebrews began to be formed into a people, they were governed by old men.—Ed.

^e It was this same water which served the Israelites, not only in this encampment of Replidim, and in that of Mount Sinai, but in their other encampments likewise, perhaps as far as Kadesh-Barnea. For the Jews have a tradition, that as these waters were granted for the sake of the merits of Miriam, Moses' sister, so they happened to fail as soon as she died; and hence it is, that at the encampment of Kadesh-Barnea, which was seen after the death of Miriam, we find the people falling into murmurings again for want of water. St Paul, speaking of this miraculous rock, which he makes the type of Jesus Christ, tells us, that 'it followed them,' (1 Cor. x. 4.) And from hence

Rephidim.^a This station, however, because it was so infamous for the mutiny of the people, and their distrust of God, Moses, as a caution and remembrance to them for the future, thought proper to have called Massah and Meribah, which signify temptation and contention.^b

While the Israelites continued at Rephidim, they were alarmed by the approach of an army of Amalekites, who were just upon their heels, and ready to fall upon them. Hereupon Moses ordered Joshua, a valiant young man who was always about him, to draw out a party of the choicest men in the camp, against next morning, and to give the Amalekites battle. When the next morning came, Moses, attended by Aaron and Hur, went to the top of an eminence, from whence they might have a view of the field of battle; and as the two armies were engaged, so it was, that while Moses held up his hands to God in prayer, and in one of them his wonder-working rod, the Israelites prevailed; but when, through weariness, his hands began to drop, the Amalekites had the better; which Aaron and Hur perceiving, set him down upon a stone, and supported his hands upon each side, until the going down of the sun, in which time the Amalekites were quite routed, and put to the sword.

This good success, in their first martial enterprise, gave the Israelites great encouragement; and the action indeed was so very remarkable, that to transmit it to posterity, Moses was ordered to record it in a book, for Joshua's future instructions, and to offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving: whereupon, he raised upon the spot an altar, which he called Jehovah Nissi, the Lord is my banner, as never doubting but that God, who had commanded him to denounce^c incessant war against the Amalekites, would not fail to crown it with success.

The defeat of the Amalekites opened a way for the Israelites to Mount Sinai, where God at first appeared to Moses in the burning bush, and not far from the place where his father-in-law Jethro dwelt; ^d who having heard what mighty things God had done for him and the people he conducted, took his daughter, Zipporah, Moses' wife, and the two sons Gershom, and Eliezar, which he had by her, and brought them to the Israelitish camp; where, after mutual salutations and embraces, Moses

^c The Amalekites were a people descended from Amalek, the son of Eliphaz, the son of Esau, by a concubine, (Gen. xxxvi. 12.) And the ground of their enmity against the Israelites is generally supposed to have been an innate hatred, from the remembrance of Jacob's depriving their progenitor, both of his birthright and blessing. Their falling upon them, however, and that without any provocation, when they saw them reduced to so low a condition by the fatigue of their march, and the excessive drought they laboured under, was an inhuman action, and justly deserved the defeat which Joshua gave them; but then the reason why God thought fit to denounce a perpetual war against them is to be resolved into this,—That knowing the Israelites were pre-ordained by God to be put in possession of the land of Canaan, they came against them with an armed force, in hopes of frustrating the designs of Providence concerning them. And this is the reason which Moses himself assigns for this declaration of war, 'because his,' that is Amalek's, 'hand is against the throne of God,' that is, against God himself, 'therefore the Lord will wage war against him from one generation to another,' (Exod. xvii. 16.) The injury done the Israelites was not so much as the affront offered to the divine Majesty; and therefore God threatens utterly to extirpate the designers of it.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7, and Patrick's Commentary.

^d When it was that Jethro came from Midian to visit his son-in-law Moses, whether immediately after the fight with the Amalekites, as it is here set down, or some time after, when the Israelites were better settled, is a matter much controverted amongst interpreters. The Jews are generally agreed, and to them do some other great names, as well as the learned Usher and Selden, assent, that this visit happened after the promulgation of the law, in the first year of their coming from Egypt, and in the month Tisri, say the Jews, above three months after God gave Moses the second tables; though others will have it to have been in the second year. It seems reasonable to think, however, that Jethro would take the first opportunity to visit Moses, and to bring him and so near relations together, when once he had heard the news of their departure from Egypt, and passing the Red Sea: which he, as a borderer upon the wilderness, could not long be a stranger to. It is to be observed farther, that had the law been given before Jethro's arrival in the Israelitish camp, Moses could hardly have escaped saying something of the most remarkable passage of all others, God's glorious appearance upon Mount Sinai, and the decalogue which he pronounced from thence: whereas all that he relates at this meeting is, what God had done to Pharaoh and the Egyptians: in what manner he 'had delivered his people;' and 'what travail had come upon them by the way,' which comprehend their passage of the Red Sea, their want of water and bread, their engagement with the Amalekites, and, in short, whatever we read in the foregoing chapters. But of the most momentous thing of all, we find him making no mention, nor Jethro, in the congratulations which he gives him, taking any manner of notice; which we can hardly suppose would, on either side, have been omitted, had they been prior to this interview: nor can we conceive, for what reason Moses should place the account of this interview in immediate succession, had it not followed the fight with the Amalekites.—Patrick's Commentary.

some have inferred, either that the streams which gushed out of the rock formed themselves into a kind of river, which followed them through all their encampments, or that they carried the rock itself in a cart, like a great tun always full, and always open to those that had an inclination to drink. But these are idle fictions, drawn from words that are not to be understood in a literal sense; what we may learn of certainty from modern travellers is,—That at the foot of the Mount Horeb, there is still to be seen a brook of water, but as for the rock itself, which is a vast large stone standing separate by itself, there is no water that now runs from it, though there are, at present, to be seen twelve holes or mouths, as it were, from whence the water did flow heretofore.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word Rephidim, and Morizan's Voyages, b. 1. c. 1.

^a Exod. xvii. 1. 'Rephidim.' "After we had descended, with no small difficulty, the western side of Mount Sinai, we came into the other plain that is formed by it, which is Rephidim. Here we still see that extraordinary antiquity, the rock of Meribah, which hath continued down to this day, without the least injury from time or accident. It is a block of granite marble, about six yards square, lying tottering, as it were, and loose in the middle of the valley, and seems to have formerly belonged to Mount Sinai, which hangs in a variety of precipices all over this plain. The waters which gushed out, and the stream which flowed, have hollowed, across one corner of this rock, a channel about two inches deep and twenty wide, appearing to be encrusted all over, like the inside of a tea-kettle that had been long in use. Besides several mossy productions that are still preserved by the dew, we see all over this channel a great number of holes, some of them four or five inches deep, and one or two in diameter, the lively and demonstrative tokens of their having been formerly so many fountains. It likewise may be further observed that art or chance could by no means be concerned in the contrivance, for every circumstance points out to us a miracle; and in the same manner with the rent in the rock of Mount Calvary at Jerusalem, never fails to produce a religious surprise in all who see it."—Shaw's Travels, p. 352.—Ed.

^b Exod. xvii. 6. 'Thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it.' This remarkable interposition of God for the Israelites appears to have been imperfectly known in other countries; and the remembrance of it is still retained in some of the heathen fables. There is a manifest allusion to it in Euripides, (Baccha, 703.) where he makes one smite the rock at Citharon, and waters gush out. Smiting rocks, and producing water, is recorded among the fabulous miracles of heathen mythology.—Callimachus, Hymn 1. v. 31.—Ed.

entertained him with a particular account of every thing that had befallen him during his absence; and in return, Jethro, who was a devout man, offered up solemn praises to God, and joined with Moses, and the rest of the elders of Israel, in sacrifices, and such holy rejoicings as were thought proper upon this occasion.

While Jethro staid in the camp, he could not but perceive the great weight of business, in hearing complaints, and determining differences among so numerous a people, which Moses must necessarily labour under; and therefore he gave him advice, to substitute under him a certain number of officers, men of parts and men of courage, such as 'feared God, and hated covetousness,' to be rulers, some over thousands, some over hundreds, some over fifties, and some over tens, with proper authority for them to hear, and determine ^a all such matters, as they were able; but where causes were too difficult for their decision, these to refer to him; which in the event, as he told him, would prove a great ease and advantage both to himself and the people: and this advice of his, as soon as he saw put in execution, Jethro took leave of his son-in-law, and returned into his own country.

It was three months after their departure out of Egypt, when the Israelites came, and encamped in the wilderness of Sinai, before the mount of God: and they had not been long there, before God called Moses to come up to him on the mount, and there charged him to remind the Israelites of the many wonders he had wrought in their favour; and that, notwithstanding their frequent murmurings and distrust of his providence, if, for the future, they would become obedient to his laws, he would still look upon them as his peculiar people, a favourite nation, and a royal priesthood.

Upon his descent from the mount, Moses made a report to the elders, and they to the people, of the gracious message which God had sent them; which as soon as the people heard, they promised in return all possible obedience to the divine commands. With this answer of the people's Moses ascended the mountain again, and received a command from God, that all the people should purify themselves, and be in readiness against the third day, for that within three days, ^b he would come down upon the mountain, and make a covenant with them. In the mean time he gave him strict charge to set boundaries about the foot of the mountain, which none might adventure to pass, under the severest penalties; ^c and when he had thus done, and the people had prepared themselves according to the divine injunction, on the third day they saw early in the morning, the mountain surrounded with a thick cloud, out of which proceeded such terrible thunder and lightnings as filled them with horror and amazement.

The signal for the people to approach the mountain, was upon the first sounding of the trumpet; and therefore as soon as it began, Moses brought them out of the camp, as near to the mountain as the barrier would permit, and there they observed the whole top of Sinai covered with fire and smoke, while the foundations of it seemed to tremble and shake under them. ^d In the ^b It must be observed here, as also in other places of the like nature, that the Scripture, suiting itself to man's common way of speaking and thinking, assigns such things to God, as are only proper to the effects. Thus it is said that God 'descended on the mountain,' because he made his presence more visible there by sensible and surprising effects; and whereas it is said by the protomartyr, St Stephen, (Acts vii. 53.) 'that the Jews received the law by the disposition of angels;' and by St Paul to the Galatians, (iii. 19.) 'that the law was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator;' there is in these, and the like passages, no contradiction between the new and old testament, which assigns all this dispensation to God himself. For though it was God who descended, in the sense we have explained it, upon the mount, yet the angels, these courtiers of heaven, attended him, and made up his train; and though he himself pronounced the law, yet the thunder and lightnings, and noise resembling the sound of a trumpet, which were preparatory to such pronouncement, may not improperly be ascribed to the ministry of angels. The intent, however, of these passages in the new testament, is only to oppose the gospel to the law in this respect, namely, that when God gave the law, he was surrounded with an awful host of angels, but when our Lord delivered the gospel, he was clothed in our flesh, and adapted himself to our weakness.—Howell's History of the Bible, and Miller's Church History.

^c Exod. xix. 13. 'He shall surely be stoned.' To be stoned to death was a most grievous punishment. When the offender came within four cubits of the place of execution, he was stript naked, only having a covering before, and his hands being bound, he was led up to the fatal place, which was an eminence twice a man's height. The first executioners of the sentence were the witnesses, who generally pulled off their clothes for the purpose: one of them threw him down with great violence upon his loins; if he rolled upon his breast he was turned upon his loins again, and if he died by the fall, there was an end; but if not, the other witness took a great stone and dashed upon his breast, as he lay upon his back; and then, if he was not despatched, all the people that stood by threw stones at him till he died.—Lewis' Origines Hebraeæ, vol. 1. p. 74.—Ed.

^d Of all the descriptions that I ever read, there is no one seems to me so awful and tremendous, as this descent of God upon Mount Horeb, and the amazing phenomena that attended it. The pomp pretended to by pagan deities, even when set off with the grandeur of poetry, and the magic of numbers, is uncouth, ridiculous, and profane. The procession of Bacchus, as it is described by Ovid, (b. 3.) is neither more nor less, than a downright drunken riot, or the brutal pastime of a disorderly country wake. The boisterous expedition of Neptune, even as it is painted by the great master Homer, (Iliad, 13.) seems to represent nothing more august than the roaring of London bridge, or a rabble of sea monsters frisking in a storm; nay, that very famous speech of Jupiter, (Iliad, 18.) where he maintains his supereminence, by shaking Olympus with his imperial nod, and menacing his refractory offspring, in case they should rebel, though it certainly be embellished with the utmost force of words and stretch of art, is at the best but a lame and imperfect copy, in the main strokes of it, from the native majesty of this unlaboured prose, in the midst of this dreadful scene, the trumpet was heard to sound louder and louder, claps of thunder and flashes of fire were more and more ingeminated, till all on a sudden every thing was hush and silent, and then God was heard from the midst of the fire and smoke (which still continued) to pronounce the law of the decalogue, or a ten commandments, which is indeed a complete system of the moral part of the Jewish institutes, and in few but significant words, comprehends their duty to God, to their neighbour, and to themselves.

^a The words of the text are, 'Every great matter they shall bring to thee, but every small matter they shall judge,' (Exod. xviii. 22.) And from hence some have imagined, that there were several sorts of causes, that might not at first be brought before inferior courts, and these they make to be four. 1. All sacred matters, or things relating to God and religion. 2. All matters of equity, where the rigour of the law was to be mitigated. 3. All capital cases, and, lastly, all such cases as the rulers of thousands referred to Moses. What the other rulers referred to him was indeed properly under his cognizance, because it supposed an incapacity in them, either for the want of some law, or a non-agreement among themselves, to determine it; but where nothing of this happened, they had a full power to judge finally. Neither was it the people, when a cause was thought intricate, that were to bring it primarily before Moses, but when any such difficulty arose, as they were not able to surmount, the judges, as Moses himself directs them, (Deut. i. 17.) were the persons that were to order the appeal to him: 'Bring it to me,' says he, 'and I will hear it;' which shows that the cause had been before the bar of inferior courts before, only they were not skillful enough to determine it. So that the words in the text do not intimate, that there were some causes which the other judges might not try, if they were able; but only where the causes were heavy, and they incompetent to decide them, these they were to refer to Moses.—Patrick's Commentary.

In the mean time the people, astonished at what they saw and heard, removed farther off; and as soon as the divine voice had ceased speaking, came to Moses, and in the height of their fear and surprise, besought of him, that for the future, he would speak to them in God's stead, and whatever he enjoined them they would obey, because they were conscious, that were they to hear his dreadful voice again, they should certainly die with horror and astonishment. This motion, as it bespoke their reverence and respect, was not displeasing to Moses; and therefore he assured them, that all this wonderful scene was not exhibited to them with a design to create in them any slavish fear, but a filial confidence, and submission to such laws as the divine wisdom should hereafter think fit to enjoin them: and with these words he went up to the mount again, where, in addition to the decalogue, he received from God several other laws, both ceremonial and political, which seem to have been calculated with a wise design to preserve the people in their obedience to God, to prevent their intermixture with other nations, and to advance the welfare of their commonwealth, by securing to all the members of it a quiet enjoyment of their lives and properties.^b 19th chapter of Exodus. It must be owned, however, that our English poet Milton, has in several places described the usual display of the divine Majesty, in a very magnificent manner.

Clouds began
To darken all the hill, and smoke to roll
In dusky wreaths, reluctant flames, the sight
Of wrath awaked: nor with less dread the loud
Ethereal trumpet from on high gan blow,
At which command the powers militant,
That stood for heaven, in mighty quadrate joined
Of union irresistible, moved on
In silence their bright legions to the sound Of instrumental harmony. ———

Again,

He on his impious foes right onward drove,
Gloomy as night: under his burning wheels
The steadfast empyrean shook throughout,
All but the throne of God. ———

And again,

He ended, and the sun gave signal high
To the bright minister that watched: He blew
His trumpet, heard on Oreb since perhaps When God descended, and perhaps once more To sound the general doom. ———

a These ten commandments, as contained in the 20th chapter of Exodus, are so very well known, that there is no occasion here for the repetition of them: and in what manner they are to be disposed of in the two tables, whether four are to be placed in the first, and six in the second table, which is the common distribution, or an equal number is to be appropriated to each table, as Philo and his followers among the Jewish rabbins contend, is not a question of moment enough to be discussed in this place.

b Exod. xx. 12. 'That thy days may be long upon the land.' As disobedience to parents is, by the law of Moses, threatened to be punished with death, so on the contrary long life is promised to the obedient; and that in their own country, which God most peculiarly enriched with abundance of blessings. Heathens also gave the same encouragement, saying, that such children should

With this body of laws, which were all that God for the present thought fit to enjoin, Moses returning from the mount, erected an altar to God, c and offered burnt-sacrifices and peace-offerings upon it; and having caused the contents of this new covenant to be read to all the people, and exacted a solemn promise from them, that they would keep it faithfully, he confirmed this covenant, by sprinkling the altar, the book, and the people with the blood of the victims which were slain upon this occasion; and then ordered twelve pillars to be raised, according to the number of the twelve tribes, as a standing monument of this alliance between God and them.

As soon as Moses had made an end of this ceremony, he took Nadab, Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel, some part of the way towards the mountain, where, without incurring any hurt, they were vouchsafed a prospect of the divine presence, and where, having committed the care of the people to them, he took Joshua along with him, and went up higher to the top of the mount, where he continued for the space of forty days.

Here it was that God, calling him nearer to himself, and into the cloud where he then resided, instructed him in what manner the tent or tabernacle, wherein he intended to be worshipped, was to be made. He described to him the form of the sanctuary, the table for the shew-bread, the altar of frankincense, the altar for burnt-offerings, the court of the tabernacle, the basin to wash in, the ark, the candlestick, and all the other sacred utensils. He gave him the form of the sacerdotal vestments, and taught him how the priests were to be consecrated; what part of the oblation they were to take, and in what manner the perpetual sacrifice was to be offered. He named the two chief men, Bezaleel, of the tribe of Judah, and Aholiah, of the tribe of Dan, who were to be the builders of the tabernacle; and having recommended a strict observation of the Sabbath, d he gave him the two be dear to the gods, both living and dying. So Euripides. It was also one of their promises, thou shalt live long, if thou nourish thy ancient parents.—Patrick in locum.—En.

c Exod. xx. 24. 'An altar of earth shalt thou make unto me.' This command certainly imports, that the altars of the Lord were to be as simple as possible. They were to be made either of sods and turfs of earth, which were easily prepared in most places, while they strayed in the wilderness, or of rough and unpolished stone, if they came into rocky places, where no sods were to be obtained; that there might be no occasion to grave any image upon them. Such altars, Tertullian observes, (Apolog. c. 25.) were among the ancient Romans in the days of Numa; when, as they had no sumptuous temples, nor images, so they had only altars hastily huddled up of earth, without any art.—Patrick in locum.—En.

d Exod. xxiii. 12. 'On the seventh day thou shalt rest; that thine ox and thine ass may rest.' We should here observe the great clemency of God, who by this law requires some goodness and mercy to be exercised even to brute animals, that he might remove men the farther from cruelty to each other. The slaughter of a ploughing ox was prohibited by a law common to the Phrygians, Cyprians, and Romans, as we find recorded by Varro, Pliny, and others. The Athenians made a decree that a mule worn out by labour and age, and which used to accompany other mules drawing burdens, should be fed at the public expense.

Exod. xxiii. 16. 'The feast of ingathering, which is in the end of the year, when thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field.' The same custom prevailed among the Gentiles, who at the end of the year, when they gathered in their fruits, offered solemn sacrifices, with thanks to God for his blessings. Aristotle

a Who was the first inventor of letters, and what nation had the invention soonest among them, is variously disputed by the learned. The invention seems to be a little too exquisite to have proceeded from man; and therefore we have, not without reason, in a former page, derived its original from God himself, who might teach it Adam, and Adam his posterity. As to particular nations, however, some say that the Phœnicians, others the Ethiopians, and others again that the Assyrians, had the first invention of them; but upon better grounds, it is thought by Eusebius (in his Præpar. Evan. b. 18.) that Moses first taught the use of letters to the Jews, and that the Phœnicians learned them from them, and the Grecians from the Phœnicians. The matter whereon men wrote in ruler times was different; some on the rinds of trees, others on tiles, and others on tables; which last was chiefly in use among the Jews; and probably from this example given them by God. The instrument wherewith they wrote, was not a pen, but a kind of engraver made of iron or steel, called a stylus, which was sharp at one end, for the more convenient indenting, or carving the character, and broad at the other for the purpose of scraping it out. To perpetuate the memory of any thing, the custom of writing on stone or brick was certainly very ancient, and (as Josephus, in the case of Seth's pillars, tells us, Antiquities, b. 11.) older than the time of the flood. The words of the decalogue, spoken by God himself, were such as deserved to be had in everlasting remembrance; and therefore God was willing to have them engraved upon durable matter; but then the question is, whether it was God himself, with his own finger, as we say, or some other person from God's mouth, who wrote them. In Exod. xxxiv. 27, 28, we are told, that 'the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words; for after the tenor of these words have I made a covenant with thee and with Israel;' and that accordingly 'he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, even the ten commandments.' Now since it is a common form of speech, that what a superior commands to be done, that he does himself; the meaning can be no more, than that the words of the decalogue were written by the hand of Moses, but by the direction and dictation of God.—Howell's and Universal History.

b Exod. xxiv. 11. 'And upon the nobles of the children of Israel he laid not his hand.' It is usually said that God 'laid not his hand' in a way of terror, or anger, on these nobles on account of their intrusion; but in the Monthly Magazine for January, 1804, is the following description of the appearance at court of the Mogul's officers, who partake of his bounty or rewards. "Those officers of the districts, whose time has expired, or who have been recalled from similar appointments, repair to the imperial presence, and receive the reward, good or evil, of their administration. When they are admitted into the presence, and retire from thence, if their rank and merit be eminent, they are called near to his majesty's person, and allowed the honour of placing their heads below his sacred foot. The emperor lays his hand on the back of a person, on whom he means to bestow an extraordinary mark of favour. Others from a distance receive token of kindness, by the motion of the imperial brow or eyes." Now if the nobles of Israel were not admitted to the same nearness of approach to the Deity as Moses and Aaron, perhaps this phrase should be taken directly contrary to what it has been. 'He laid not his hand' in a way of special favour, nevertheless they saw God, and did eat and drink in his presence. This sense of laying on the hand is supported by a passage in Bell's Travels to Persia, p. 103. "The minister received the credentials, and laid them before the Shah, who touched them with his hand, as a mark of respect. This part of the ceremony had been very difficult to adjust; for the ambassador insisted on delivering his letters into the Shah's own hands. The Persian ministers, on the other hand, affirmed that their king never received letters directly from the ambassadors of the greatest emperors on earth."—Theological Magazine, vol. iv. p. 140.—Ed.

camp, who by reason of his long absence began now to give him over for lost, assembled themselves in a riotous manner about Aaron's tent, and demanded of him to make them some gods to go before them. The demand was astonishing, and such was his weakness, and want of courage, that instead of expostulating the matter with them, he tamely submitted to their request; nay, he contributed not a little to their idolatry, by ordering them to bring a sufficient quantity of their golden ornaments, which when he received from them, c he tied in a bag, and thereof made them a molten calf. Nor was this all, for seeing them so highly delighted with their new made god, he set it upon a pedestal, in full sight of the camp, built an altar before it, and appointed the next day for a solemn festival, which was begun with offering of sacrifices to it, and concluded with feasting and dancing, and all d kinds of noisy mirth.

God, in the mean time, who knew what had passed in the camp, acquainted his servant Moses, that the people whom he had brought out of Egypt had so soon forgot their promises and engagements, that at that very time they had made them a molten image, and were worshipping a golden calf; a defection so provoking, that he threatened to extirpate the whole nation of them, but at c The words in the text are these, 'All the people brake off the golden ear-rings which wore in their ears, and brought them unto Aaron, and he received them at their hands, and fashioned it with a graving tool, after he had made it into a molten calf,' Exod. xxxii. 3, 4. But here seems to be a great mistake in most versions as well as our own, and what but few critics and expositors have yet espied. For it may very well be asked, who taught Aaron to engrave, or how could this idol be engraven so soon, since it is said that Aaron presented it to the people on the morrow! If the custom of engraving molten work was then known, how comes it, that we hear nothing of it even in Solomon's time, since it may be presumed, that the furniture of Solomon's temple was wrought with much more art than the figure of Aaron's calf? The whole foundation of this mistake seems to lie in the ambiguity of the Hebrew word Tsour, which sometimes signifies to fashion, and sometimes to bind or tie, and of the word Chereth, which signifies a graving tool, and sometimes a sack or bag, 2 Kings v. 23. And therefore the nature and circumstances of the thing here spoken of might have directed the translators to think of putting the great quantity of ear-rings, which were brought to Aaron, into a bag; which would have prevented the incongruity that the Geneva version has incurred, of engraving the calf before it was molten; for so it runs, 'he fashioned the ear-rings with a graving tool, and made a molten calf of them,' Essay for a New Translation.

d The words in the text are, (Exod. xxxii. 6.) 'the people sat down to eat, and to drink, and rose up to play; and from hence some have supposed their sense to be, that after the Israelites had eaten of the sacrifices offered to this new idol, and drunk very plentifully, they committed fornication, after the manner of heathen worshippers, and as in after ages they were induced to do in the case of Baal-peor, Numb. xxv. 1, 2. It cannot be denied, indeed, but that those sacrificial feasts among the heathens were usually attended with drunkenness and lasciviousness, which generally go together; and that the word which we render play, is the same which Potiphar's wife makes use of, when she tells her husband, that his Hebrew slave came in to mock her, that is, violate her chastity; but since there is no intimation of this in the story, but only of their singing and dancing, it is hardly presumable, that they could become so very profligate the very first day of their setting up idol-worship. Much more reasonable it is therefore to suppose, that all this merriment of theirs was in imitation of the Egyptians, who, when they had found out their god Apis, whereof this golden calf was designed as an emblem, were used to bring him in solemn pomp to Memphis, the royal city, with children going before in procession, and all the company singing a song of praise to the Deity.—Patrik's Commentary.

the same time promised to make him the father and founder of a nation as numerous, and more powerful than these ungrateful rebels were. But so far was Moses from seeking his own interest in their destruction, that he threw himself at the feet of the Lord, and interceded for their pardon with so much importunity, that having obtained a kind of promise of it, he took the tables and his servant Joshua with him, and so hastened down from the mount.

As soon as they were come to the bottom, Joshua hearing the noise which the people were making, expressed his apprehensions, that possibly there might be some alarm or engagement in the camp; but Moses, who knew what had happened, told him that the noise seemed to be an indication of joy, rather than of war; and as they drew near, and saw the golden calf, and the people singing and dancing about it, Moses, for indignation throwing down the tables he had in his hands, brake them in pieces; and then taking the idol calf, he put it in the fire, and melted it, and so ^a reducing it to powder, and mixing the powder in water, to make them more sensible of their folly in worshipping that for a god which was to pass through their bodies, he made them drink it up.

After this, Aaron was called to give an account how he came to indulge the people in this idolatrous humour; but all the excuse that he could make turned upon their tumultuous, and his timorous temper, which compelled him to comply with their demand. But Moses' business was, to take vengeance on the idolaters; and therefore turning from his brother Aaron, he called such to his aid as had not been guilty in the late rebellion; and seeing some of the tribe of Levi adjoin themselves to him, ^b he appointed them to take their swords, to go through the camp, and without any respect to age or quality, friendship or consanguinity, to kill all the ringleaders of this

^a This action of Moses, in melting, grinding, and pounding this golden idol, in order to make the people drink it, is by some thought contrary to our present philosophy, and the account which alchemists give us of the nature of gold. The goldbeater can reduce gold to the thickness of one fifteen hundredth part of an inch, in the form of leaves, which may be easily beat into powder, thrown into a liquid, and drunk. A strong current of electricity being made to play upon gold, will cause it to burn, and be dissipated in the form of a very fine purple powder, which may also be thrown into water and drunk. Gold may also be dissolved in nitro-muriatic acid and drunk? By the help of a file, Moses might grate it into a dust, as fine as flour that is ground in a mill. But the rabbinical reason for his giving the people this gold powder to drink, namely, that he might distinguish the idolaters from the rest, because as soon as they had drunk, the beards of the former turned red, is a little too whimsical to be regarded.—Universal History, b. l. c. 7.

^b This may be thought too hazardous an undertaking, and, for a few Levites to kill 3000 of the people impracticable; but as they had God's warrant for what they did, and knew at the same time how timorous guilt is apt to make men, they might be confident, that none would have courage to oppose them. Before that Moses called any avengers to his assistance, the text tells us, that 'he saw that the people were naked, for Aaron had made them naked to their shame,' (Exod. xxxii. 25.) where, if by 'nakedness' we are, with some expositors, to understand their want of arms, which they had laid aside, that they might be more light and nimble to dance about the idol, it is plain, that the Levites might have less trouble in slaying such a number of people, loaded with liquor perhaps, and, as it usually happens in the conclusion of a festival, weary with dancing and sports, and without any weapons about them to make resistance.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

idolatrous defection, and their adherents; which the Levites accordingly executed; so that at this time there were about three thousand persons slain. Nor did the Levites, in consideration of this their laudable zeal and obedience, go long unrewarded; for, upon the institution of the priesthood, they were appointed to the honour and emoluments of that office, though in subordination to that of Aaron and his posterity.

The people, in the mean time, having seen this dreadful example on the delinquents, were not in a little fear and consternation. But Moses, the next day contented himself with reproving them for their ingratitude and extreme folly, and at the same time promised them that he would go up to the mount again, and try ^c how far his prayers would prevail with the divine mercy, to avert the punishment which they justly deserved. To show, however, how highly they had offended God by their wicked apostasy, he took a tent, and pitching it out of the camp at a good distance, he called it 'the tabernacle of the congregation,' whither the cloudy pillar, (to let them see that God would no longer dwell among them,) immediately repaired; and whither Moses, whenever he wanted to consult the divine oracle, was wont to resort. Nor was it long after this, that God, to comfort and encourage him under all the fatigue that he had with an obstinate people, granted his request, and showed him as much of his glory as his nature was able to bear, and gave him fresh orders to prepare two other tables of stone, and to come up again to him on the mountain all alone. Moses, accordingly, early next morning, repaired to the mountain, with the two tables, and having prostrated himself before God, implored of him to pardon the sins of his people; which God graciously condescended to do, and withal to make a farther covenant with them, upon condition that they would keep his commandments; would observe his Sabbaths, his pass-over, and other appointed festivals; and would not worship the gods of the Canaanites, nor make any alliances with the people of the country.

THAT in the deserts of Arabia, and such extended plains (for there were no cities, rivers, or mountains for landmarks,) it was a general custom, before the invention of the compass, to carry fire before armies, in order to direct their march; and that, notwithstanding the present use of the compass, the guidance of fire is practised

^c Moses indeed was by lineage and descent of the tribe of Levi, which though it forfeited the primogeniture and regalia, by being concerned in the blood of the Schemites, was nevertheless dignified with the priesthood, which gave him a right of approaching God, as an intercessor for a rebellious and backsliding people. Aaron, in strictness, was both the high priest and his elder brother, but besides that, he, by his imprudent compliance in the business of the golden calf, had at this time not only forfeited the honour of mediation, but stood himself in need of an atonement; there seems to be something in the character that is given of Moses' singular meekness, that might entitle him to the spirit of intercession, and make the younger, in this office, be preferred before the elder.—Bibliotheca Biblica Append. of the Oceanus, Annot.

among the caravans in the east, and by the great number of pilgrims, who go every year from Grand Cairo in Egypt, to Mecca in Arabia, cannot, by any one that is acquainted either with ancient or modern history, be denied; and had the sole intent of the cloudy pillar been to guide and conduct the Israelites in their journeys, there might have been more grounds for asserting, that it was a mere machine of human contrivance, and had nothing miraculous or supernatural in it. But when it shall appear, that this pillar of a cloud was of much greater use to the children of Israel than barely to conduct them; that in it resided a superior power, upon whom the name and attributes of God are conferred; that from it proceeded oracles, and directions what the people were to do, and plagues and punishments, when they had done amiss; and that to it are ascribed such motions and actions, as cannot, with any propriety of speech, be applied to any natural fire; it will from hence, I hope, be concluded, that this guidance of the cloud was a real miracle; its substance quite different from that of portable fire preceding armies; and its conductor something more than a mere man.

The first mention that is made of this phenomenon is in the thirteenth chapter of Exodus, where Moses, describing the route which the Israelites pursued, tells us that¹ 'they took their journey from Succoth, and encamped at Etham, at the edge of the wilderness, and the Lord went before them, by day, in a pillar of a cloud, and, by night, in a pillar of fire:' and what we are to understand by 'the Lord, that went before them,' we are advertised in another place;² 'Behold I send my angel before thee, to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared. Beware of him, and obey his voice; provoke him not, for he will not pardon thy transgression, for my name is in him,' that is, my name Jehovah, which is the proper and incommunicable title of God. Another place wherein we find this pillar of a cloud mentioned, is in the 14th chapter;³ and 'the angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed, and went behind them, and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them, and it came between the camp of the Egyptians, and the camp of Israel, and it was a cloud and darkness to them, but it gave light to these.' There is, in the same book, another place where this pillar is taken notice of, and that is in the 33d chapter, where God being highly offended at the people's impiety in making the golden calf, refuses to conduct them any longer himself, and proposes to depute an angel to supply his place:⁴ 'When the people heard these evil tidings, they mourned:—and it came to pass, as Moses entered into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar descended and stood at the door of the tabernacle, and the Lord talked with Moses. All the people saw the cloudy pillar at the tabernacle door, and they rose up, and worshipped, every man at his tent door. We have occasion to mention but one place more, and that is in the 16th chapter of Numbers, where the people murmured for the loss of Korah and his company:⁵ 'And it came to pass, that when the congregation was gathered against Moses, and against Aaron, they looked towards the tabernacle of the congregation, and behold the cloud covered it, and the glory of the Lord appeared, and Moses and Aaron came before the tabernacle of the congregation, and the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Get you up from among this congregation, that I may consume them, as in a moment, and they fell upon their faces; and Moses said unto Aaron, 'Take a censer, and put fire therein from off the altar, and put on incense, and go quickly into the congregation, and make an atonement for them, for there is wrath gone out from the Lord, the plague is begun.' Now, from a bare recital of these passages, we cannot but observe, that the Israelites' pillar made quite another appearance than any combustible matter, when set on fire, and carried upon a pole, can be supposed to do; that in this pillar resided a person of divine character and perfections, and therefore called 'the Lord, the angel, the angel of the Lord, and the angel of his presence,' &c.; that this person was invested with a power of demanding homage and observance, of both punishing and pardoning transgressions, and to whom even Moses and Aaron, as well as the rest of the congregation, might fall down on their faces, and pay obeisance, without the imputation of idolatry. The whole tenor of the narration, in short, seems to denote, that every one in the congregation looked upon the pillar as something awful and tremendous, and the person residing therein above the rank and dignity of any created essence: and therefore, the most general opinion is, that he to whom these divine appellations, divine powers, and divine honours are ascribed, was the eternal Son of God, with a troop of blessed angels attending him in bright and luminous forms; and who, either by the display or contraction of their forms, could make the cloud they inhabited either condense or expand itself, either put on a dark or radiant appearance, according as the great Captain of their host signified his pleasure. For to suppose that mere fire, without any supernatural direction, could appear in different forms at the same time, with darkness to one sort of people, and light to another, is a thing incongruous to its nature.

For how many purposes this miraculous pillar might serve the Israelites, it would be presumption to determine; but this we may say with safety,—That besides its guiding them in their journey,⁶ it was of use to defend them from their enemies, that they might not assault them; of use to cover them from the heat of the sun in the wilderness, where there were few trees, and no houses to shelter them; and of use to convey the divine will, and to be, as it were, a standing oracle whereunto they might resort upon all occasions. In this cloud, we are told expressly, that⁷ the Lord appeared from the tabernacle; from this cloud, that⁸ he called Aaron and Miriam to come before him; and out of this cloud again, that he sent forth the expresses of his wrath, as well as the tokens of his love, among the whole congregation: and therefore this cloud could, at that time, be nothing else but the vehicle of God, as we may call it, or the place of his majestic appearance. Nor is the conjecture improbable, that from this very instance the poets first took the hint of making their gods descend in a cloud, and arrayed with a bright effulgency.

However this be, it is certain, that the Jews were persuaded of the divinity of their guide; otherwise they would not have expressed such undissembled sorrow and concern upon hearing the news of his intention to leave them: nor could Moses, with all his authority, have ever prevailed with them to wander so long in the wilderness, exposed to so many dangers and hardships, had they been satisfied that it was no more than a man, with some fire, elevated upon a pole, that was their conductor. It may be allowed, indeed, that a multitude of such fiery machines might be of service to an army in a march; but the thing is utterly inconceivable, how a company of six hundred thousand men, besides women and children, and no small number of associates, together with all their cattle, could receive any great benefit from only one of these, which, at a moderate distance, would diminish into a small light, and at a larger be quite lost; or every moment was in danger of being blown aside by the wind, or extinguished by the rain.

The Scriptures everywhere represent the Israelites going out of Egypt with a high hand, marching in a regular order, and ¹ 'covered by God, in the day, with a cloud, and led, all the night through, with a light of fire;' but a sufficient company of link boys, placed in a regular order to illuminate each column as they moved, would have certainly been of more use, and made a much better appearance, than this pretended mixture of smoke and flame, smothering from an iron pot, at the end of a long pole. For from my heart I cannot conceive what manner of comparison there can be between the dark, fuliginous smoke arising from a culinary fire, and the glorious, heavenly, and bright appearance of ² 'that burning pillar of fire, which,' as the author of the book of Wisdom expresses it, 'was both a guide of their unknown journey, and an harmless sun to entertain them honourably.'

The Scripture indeed assigns but one reason for God's conducting the Israelites by the way of the wilderness, which was so much about, to the land of Canaan, and that is,—An apprehension that the Philistines, through whose country they were to go, being a bold and warlike people, would, in all probability, have disputed the passage with them, which the others, destitute of arms as they were, and having their spirits broken with a long servitude, were in no condition to make good: but as the almighty power of their conductor was sufficient to make them superior to all such obstacles, we may well suppose, that a farther end which the divine Providence might have herein, was to manifest his glory and goodness by his constant attendance upon them in this luminous appearance, and by the many wonderful works which he did to oblige them to his service.

According to the course of the country, Moses might have marched the people a much shorter way; but then, we had heard nothing of the 'angel of God's presence' visibly preceding them; nothing of his dividing the sea to facilitate their passage; nothing of his overwhelming their enemies in those very floods, which to them were a kind of wall on each side; nothing of his drawing out rivers of water from the stony rock; nothing of his ³ 'sending down manna upon them, and giving them food from heaven;' nothing of his 'raining flesh, as thick as dust, and feathered fowls, like as the sand of the sea;' nothing of his amazing descent upon Mount Sinai, when, in the lofty words of the Psalmist, ⁴ 'he bowed the heavens and came down, and it was dark under his feet; he rode upon the cherubim, and did fly: he came flying upon the wings of the wind; he made darkness his secret place, his pavilion round about him with dark water, and thick clouds to cover him; there went a smoke out of his presence, hail-stones, and coals of fire, so that the earth trembled and quaked, the very foundations also of the hills shook, and were removed.' The wilderness, in short, was the scene which God had made choice of for the display of his almighty power and goodness: there it was, that he 'laid bare his arm,' as he calls it, to the Israelites; that every day he took care of their meat and drink, and indelicacy of their clothing: and had he not detained them there so long, he had not been so kind. It may be considered farther, that before this people were to be admitted into the possession of the inheritance which God had promised them, all matters were to be adjusted between him and them; and to this purpose laws were to be given, ordinances instituted, and covenants sealed; but a work of this importance could nowhere be so commodiously transacted as in the retirement of the wilderness. Here it was that God, in the bush, talking with Moses, gave it as a token of his promise, that the people after their deliverance should come to Mount Horeb, and ⁵ there worship him; and fit it was, that such an engagement on God's part should now receive its accomplishment. And since it was no more than requisite, that a nation designed for such peculiar favours from God, should be held some time in a state of probation, before they were admitted to it, and until the people, whom they were appointed to reject, had filled up the measure of their iniquity, and were ripe for extirpation; therefore it is, that Moses calls upon them ⁶ 'to remember all the way, which the Lord their God led them, for these forty years, in the wilderness, to humble them, and to prove them, and to know what was in their hearts, whether they would keep his commandments or no.'

These commandments, it must be owned, were delivered to the Israelites with all the ensigns of horror, which the Psalmist, so lately quoted, has described; but that there is no ground to suspect any deceit in this wonderful occurrence, is manifest from Moses' dealing so openly with the people in this matter, and suffering them to go up into the mountain, after the Lord had departed from it. ⁷ 'When the trumpet soundeth long, they shall come up to the mount.' This is the signal which God himself gives them; whereas, had there been any fallacy in the phenomenon, Moses would have debarred them from going up for ever. And therefore, as we need not doubt but that several upon this signal went up, we cannot but think, that the cheat would have soon been discovered, had there been any marks of a natural eruption of fire discernible upon the top of the mountain.

mountains, do all agree in this, as the nature of the thing indeed seems to require it,¹ that on their tops they have always an open mouth, which the ancients called crater, through which they belch out their flames; and that after the fire is expended, it will still appear in the form of a monstrous gap, even unto the end of the world. And therefore, since all travellers, both ancient and modern, who have taken an accurate survey a of the Mount Sinai, could never discern the least appearance of any such gap, but, on the contrary, a continued surface, whereon there stands at present a little chapel of St Catherine; all this supposed contrivance of Moses, to make a natural volcano pass upon the people for the majestic presence of God upon the sacred mount, can be deemed no other than a crude, nonsensical fiction, wherein the lovers of infidelity are found to show their ignorance, as well as their malice, when they pretend to tax this relation of Moses, representing God's appearance in a flame of fire, in thunder, and lightning, &c., with any incongruity, or invent any groundless stories to account for it; since nothing can be more agreeable to the ancient divinity, or common notions of the heathen world,^b than that the apparition of their gods, whenever they descend upon the earth, is usually attended with such like harbingers.

Sundry lawgivers, no doubt, have pretended to a familiarity with their respective deities, as well as Moses did with the God of Israel; but, besides the attestation of miracles in his favour, which none of them laid any claim to, we may venture to put his character upon this issue, namely, the excellency of his laws, above what Athens, or Lacedemon, or even Rome itself ever had to produce. For what a complete system of all religious and social virtues do the ten commandments, delivered on the Mount, contain, taking them, as we ought to do, in their positive as well as negative sense. In the second of these, indeed, there is a passage, of 'God's visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children,' which seems to bear a little hard upon his mercy and justice; but this is entirely owing to the mistake of our translation. For if the preposition lamed, and hal, which we there render upon, may,² according to the sense of some critics, be rendered by, or in favour of; then may the words now under consideration be properly translated, "God's punishing the wickedness of the father, BY OR IN FAVOUR OF the children." In the former of these senses,³ David's murder and adultery was justly punished by his favourite, but wicked son Absalom; and in the latter, the meaning will be, that God frequently inflicts remarkable judgments upon a wicked father, in order to deter his children, even to the third and fourth generations, from the like provocations.

What more just, as well as merciful constitution could there be devised, than to ordain cities of refuge for the innocent manslayer to fly to, thereby to avoid the rage and ungovernable fury of the dead man's relations, who, according to the custom of those times, were wont immediately to revenge their kindred's death, and thereby to gain time to prepare a plea in his own vindication; which, if it was found insufficient, and the man adjudged guilty of wilful murder, could not, according to the tenor of the same law, secure him from being dragged even ⁴ 'from the horns of the altar?'

'An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth,' may seem to us, who live under a milder dispensation, a rigid and severe decree; but then we may observe, that it was no more than what was thought reasonable in other nations, and obtained a place among the c celebrated Roman laws of the twelve tables. It was in some measure necessary to restrain quarrelsome and unruly tempers from violence; and in case that death did not ensue, the law was always mitigated, and the talio commuted for a pecuniary mulct.

Several of the Jewish laws, which to us may seem frivolous, had a valid reason for their institution at first, if it were but to discriminate them from other nations, and to guard them against the common infection of idolatry. The wearing of lincey-woolsey was probably a proud, fantastical fashion of the heathens at that time, which the Jews were forbid to imitate. An ox and an ass were not to be coupled together in the same carriage, a The mountains of Sinai and Horeb are promiscuously used by the sacred historian, by reason of their contiguity; and yet it is certain, that they are two different places. Sinai, which the Arabians at this day call Tor, or the Mountain, by way of eminence, or otherwise, Gibel Moutsa, the Mount of Moses, stands in a kind of peninsula, formed by two arms of the Red Sea, one of which stretches out towards the north, and is called the Gulf of Kolsom; the other towards the east, and is called the Gulf of Elan, or the Elanitic Sea. Sinai is at least one-third part higher than Horeb, and of a much more difficult ascent; whose top terminates in an uneven and rugged space, capable of containing about sixty persons. Here, as we said, is built the little chapel of St Catherine, where it is thought that the body of this saint rested for 330 years, but was afterwards removed to the church which is at the foot of the mountain. Not far from this chapel issues out a fountain of good fresh water, which is looked upon as miraculous, because it is not conceivable how water can rise from the brow of so high a mountain. Horeb is to the west of Sinai, so that at surising the shadow of Sinai entirely covers Horeb. At the foot of this mount there is a fountain, which supplies water to the monastery of St Catherine, and about five or six paces from it, they show us a stone, about four or five feet high, and three broad, which, as they tell us, is the very same from whence Moses caused the waters to gush out. It is of a spotted grey colour, stands by itself, as it were, and where no other rock appears, and has twelve holes about a foot wide, from whence it is thought that the water came forth which the Israelites did drink.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Sinai.

b That fire and lightning should attend the presence of God, is a notion so frequent in the most ancient and oriental theology, that it might possibly give occasion to the worship of fire among the Chaldeans and Persians; to the Magi, among the Cappadocians called Purothi, which Strabo mentions, and to the vestal fires among the Greeks and Romans, as well as ancient Britons. "When you behold the formless sacred flame boundingly gleaming from earth's black abysses, then hark to the voice of Fire," say the Chaldeic oracles: and as for earthquakes, or shaking of mountains, this is no more than what all nations suppose have ever come to pass, upon God's manifesting himself at any time; for it is not only the Psalmist who tells us, that 'the earth shook, and the heaven dropped at the presence of God;' but in the description which Virgil gives us of the approach of Phœbus, he does in a manner translate the words of Moses,—"All things seemed on a sudden to quake, even the hills and laurel trees of the god; the whole mountain around was trembling, and the tripod groaned in the inner recesses of the temple."—See Nicholls' Conference, part 2.

with this merciful intent, that one beast of greater strength might not strain a poor creature of less beyond its ability; and as sowing the ground with mixed seeds, in some men's opinion, is an effectual way to wear it out, it was therefore a practice prohibited, in commiseration, if I may so say, to our mother earth, as well as to set bounds to the husbandman's covetousness; though, as others imagine, these three injunctions, as they stand altogether in the same place, might perhaps have some-thing emblematical in them, besides the precept, to make men have a greater abhorrence of all venereal mixtures, contrary to nature.

It is an injunction which God often inculcates to his people the Jews, 'After the doing of the land of Egypt, wherein ye dwell, ye shall not do: and after the doing of the land of Canaan, whither I bring you, ye shall not do: I am the Lord your God, ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments;' which words seem to imply, not only that the idolatrous rites of the Gentiles were forbidden, but that those of God's appointment were made in direct opposition to them: and to this purpose we find² the Roman historian representing the Jews as a people whose religious rites were so contrary to all the world besides, that what in others was most sacred, they accounted profane, and allowed as lawful what other nations were wont to abominate.

Now, if the Mosair laws and ceremonies were given to the Jews, as barriers against idolatry, and formally repugnant to the customs of the heathens, we may appeal to any sober and considerate man, whether it be consistent with good sense, or congruous to truth and reason, that God should make laws exactly contrary to the Egyptians and other pagan nations, showing thereby, that he hated the very semblance of their rites, and yet at the same time take the rise of his institutions from the customs and practice of these pagans: nay, whether it gives us not such an idea of God, as reverence to his tremendous majesty will not suffer me to name,³ to represent him making up all the vain, ludicrous, superstitious, impious, impure, idolatrous, magical, and diabolical customs, which had been first invented, and afterwards practised by the most barbarous nations, and out of these patching up a great part of the religion which he appointed his own people.

It cannot well otherwise be, but that, in matters of tradition, which have equally descended among all nations perhaps from Noah, a man of some learning and fancy may form a similitude between the religious rites and usages of one people with another; but it would really rack one's invention to find out the great agreement between the Jewish high priest and the Egyptian chief justice; since the Urim and Thummim^a of the one was a piece of cloth, about a span square, beset with jewels, but the Alathea, as they call it, of the other, was a golden medal, representing the figure of a bird; since the robe of the one was made of scarlet, blue, and purple woollen cloth, only embroidered with wreaths of fine linen; but the garment of the other was made of linen only, because it was unlawful,⁴ as Herodotus tells us, for the Egyptian magistrates to wear any thing else.

When the tables of the covenant were delivered to Moses, it seems no more than requisite, that some care should be taken of them; and if so, what could be a more apposite contrivance for that purpose than a chest? Moses, even by his enemies, is reputed a very cunning man; but they certainly mean it as a compliment, and not his due, if they think him not capable of so small a contrivance as this, without copying from the Egyptian cista, wherein the priests were wont to lock up their religious trinkets from the eyes of the vulgar; and as for the cherubim which overshadowed this ark, there certainly seems nothing analogous, but rather a particular opposition in these to the Egyptian idolatry. For, whereas their temples were generally filled with the images of monkeys, calves, and serpents, the representations of real animals, which, according to the natural deism of those times, they fancied to be parts and exhibitions of the Deity; Moses here^b orders figures to be made, which had little or no resemblance of any thing in the world, and were expressive of the angelical nature only, which every one knew was subordinate to God's. So little congruity is there to be found between the Egyptian and Jewish laws and ceremonies,^c less

^b What the particular figure of these cherubim was, it is hard to imagine at this distance. Grotius, indeed, and some others, have ingeniously conjectured, from the creatures seen by Ezekiel in his vision, c. 1. 5. and x. 15, which he calls cherubim, that they had the face of a man, the wings of an eagle, the mane of a lion, the feet of an ox; and by this they will have the dispensations of divine providence, by the ministry of angels, symbolically represented; the lion exhibiting the severity of his justice; the eagle the celerity of his bounty; the man his goodness and mercy; the ox the slowness of his punishment; which comes, as the Greek proverb says, βόσκω τοῦτα, with an ox's foot.—Nicholls' Conference, part 2.

^c To this purpose, we are informed, that the brahmins, the Indian priests, wear bells about them like the Jewish high priest, were alone allowed to go into the inward part of the temple, and were like him obliged to marry virgins. Slaves there have their ears bored through; a perpetual light is kept in their temples, and cakes are set before their idols like shewbread. Nay, even the barbarous Tartars have many things not unlike the Jews; for they celebrate their new moons with songs and computations; they bewail their dead thirty days; they breed no hogs, and punish adultery with death. The like may be said of the people of the new world. Those of Jucatan are circumcised; those of Mexico keep a perpetual fire in the temples; and the Charibean celebrate the new moon with the sound of a trumpet, and abstain from swine's flesh; and therefore if a similitude in ceremonies is admitted as a valid argument, we may as well say that the Jews had their laws and religious ordinances from any of these, as that they had them from the Egyptians.—Nicholls' Conference, part 2.

Golden bells formed a part of the ornaments of the pontifical robe of the Jewish high priest, with which he invested himself upon those grand and peculiar festivals, when he entered into the sanctuary. That robe was very magnificent, it was ordained to be of sky blue, and the border of it, at the bottom, was adorned with pomegranates and gold bells intermixed equally, and at equal distances. The use and intent of these bells is evident from these words:—'And it shall be upon Aaron to minister, and his sound shall be heard when he goeth in unto the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh out, that he die not.' The sound of the numerous perhaps than might be discovered in several other nations, were we disposed to be prolix upon this subject. But let us return to their legislator.

That God, who is a pure spirit, eternal and omnipresent, has neither body nor parts, nor any affections thereunto belonging, is a proposition which our reason cannot but assent to; and yet when we set ourselves to explain, as we call it, the divine nature and attributes, we soon find ourselves under a necessity to borrow expressions from corporeal beings, the better to accommodate the loftiness of our subject to our reader's comprehension. For unless we could contrive a perfect set of new words, there is no speaking at all of the Deity without using our old ones in a tralatitious sense. Providence and mercy, for instance, are two known attributes of God: but if we respect their original use, and do not take them in a metaphorical meaning, they are altogether as absurd, when applied to God, as are his eye, or hand, or back parts, in their grossest sense. For how improper is it, literally speaking, to say, that God looks before him, like men when they act cautiously; or that he has that relenting of heart, or yearning of bowels, which merciful men feel at the sight of a miserable object? The truth is, languages were composed to enable men to maintain an intercourse with one another, and not to treat of the nature of that Being who dwelleth in light that is inaccessible. No form of words, be they ever so exquisite and well chosen, can reach those transcendent perfections that are unutterable; and therefore if we consider the low capacity of the people to whom the real poverty of the language, in which, and the vast sublimity of the subject, about which Moses wrote, we shall have less occasion to blame this metaphorical way of expressing the divine nature, which upon experiment he certainly found the best adapted, both to inform the understanding, and animate the affections of the people; while a number of dry, scholastic and abstracted terms, would have lain flat upon their minds, and served only to amuse and confound them.

Though therefore it must be acknowledged, that there is indeed an impropriety in language, when corporeal parts or actions are imputed to the Deity; yet since the narrowness of the Hebrew tongue would not furnish Moses with a sufficiency of abstract terms, and the dulness of the people, had he had a sufficiency, would not have permitted him to employ them, he was under a necessity of speaking according to the common usage, which was secured from giving the people any gross bells that covered the hem of his garment, gave notice to the assembled people that the most awful ceremony of their religion had commenced. When arrayed in this garb, he bore into the sanctuary the vessel of incense; it was the signal to prostrate themselves before the Deity, and to commence those fervent ejaculations which were to ascend with the column of that incense to the throne of heaven." "One indispensable ceremony in the Indian Pooja is the ringing of a small bell by the officiating brahmin. The women of the idol, or dancing girls of the pagoda, have little golden bells fastened to their feet, the soft harmonious tinkling of which vibrates in unison with the exquisite melody of their voices." (Maurice's Indian Antiquities, vol. 5. p. 139.)—"The ancient kings of Persia, who, in fact, united in their own persons the regal and sacerdotal office, were accustomed to have the fringes of their robes adorned with pomegranates and golden bells. The Arabian courtesans, like the Indian women, have little golden bells fastened round their legs, neck, and elbows, to the sound of which they dance before the king.—ED.

ideas of God, because these phrases were always understood to be spoken with the feelings of a man; and therefore ¹ a Jewish rabbin acquaints us, that whenever they meet with an expression concerning the Deity, of this nature, they are used to interpose a cabtical, or, if I may so speak.

Interpreters indeed are at some variance what we are to understand by the hand, face, and hinder parts of God. "The face of God," ² says an ingenious glossary, "signifies his essence, before the beginning of the world, and his hinder parts, his creation and providence in the government of the world:" ³ but Maimonides is of opinion, that these words may be interpreted according to the Targum, namely, that God made his majesty, that is, an exceedingly bright representation of himself, though not in its full glory, pass before Moses, in so much splendour as human nature could bear, which may be termed his back parts; but not in his unveiled brightness, which may signify his face, and, as the apostle speaks, is inaccessible; and ⁴ the hand, wherewith God covered him, while he passed by, may probably denote a cloud, which God cast about him, that he might not be struck dead by the inconceivable force and refulgency of those rays, which came from the face or full lustre of the divine Majesty.

In this sense the ancient Jews could not but understand their legislator, when they found him conveying sublime truths under outward and sensible representations. For, to clear him from all unjust imputation, we need but call to mind the glorious descriptions he gives, almost everywhere, but especially in Deuteronomy, of the Deity, and what pains he takes to deter them from making any representation of it, under any form whatever, by reminding them, that when God was pleased to display his glory upon Mount Sinai, at the delivering of the ten commandments, they saw no shape or likeness, but only heard his dreadful voice. ⁵ These so frequent inculcations may therefore be looked upon as so many intimations given them, in what sense they were to understand all those other expressions which he had been forced to accommodate to their capacity, that is, not in a literal, but in such a one, as was becoming the Deity, and suitable to the dignity of the subject.

Moses, no doubt, was a good governor, and zealously affected for the welfare of his people: but we injure his memory much, if we think him either so ignorant of a future state, or so negligent of his own salvation, as to wish himself damned, in his deprecation of God's judgments, for their salvation. The case is this,—The Israelites, in making a golden calf to worship, had highly offended God: God renounces all relation to them, and in his displeasure, threatens either to abandon or destroy them; whereupon Moses intercedes for their pardon, and among other motives, makes use of this: ⁶ "Oh, my God, this people have sinned a great sin, and have made them gods of gold; yet now, if thou wilt, forgive their sins; and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of the book which thou hast written:" ⁷ not that God stands in need of a book wherein to register or record any of his purposes: "but the Scripture makes use of this form of expression, in allusion to the custom of numbering the people, and setting down their names in a scroll or register,¹ as Moses did at their coming out of the land of Egypt. The same method was likewise observed at the return from the Babylonish captivity, as may be seen in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah; and those who were enrolled in this book, are said² 'to be written for life,' or 'among the living,' because every year they blotted out of this catalogue the names of those that were dead.

According to this construction of the phrase, and this is certainly the true construction, Moses can by no means be supposed to wish his own damnation, which would look like an enthusiastic rant, rather than divine inspiration; which would be impious for him to ask, and unrighteous for God to do; but only that, "rather than live to see the calamities which would befall the people in case God should either desert or destroy them, he desires to be discharged from life, that so he may escape the shock of so woeful, so terrible a spectacle."³

In a former communion with God, wherein he threatens either to extirpate or disinherit his people, he promises Moses to⁴ 'make him a greater nation, and mightier than they;' but instead of that, Moses here desires to die with them; and, as a learned father of the church observes,⁴ "there is a great deal of pious art and policy in the petition, or proposal, as we may call it, which this great favourite and confident of God offers to him." He does not make it at all adventures, as one less acquainted with the divine mind might do; nor does he make it out of a slight and contempt of life, as one whose circumstances had brought him into despair might do. He knew God's goodness was infinite, as well as his justice; so that, in this alternative, 'either be thou pleased to slay me and them together, or to spare them and me together,' he was sensible he should engage God's mercy to pardon the criminals, whilst, on their behalf, he devoted himself at the same time to that justice which cannot be supposed capable of hurting the innocent.⁵

One great commendation which we have frequently remarked of the author of the Pentateuch, above any other historian, is, that he consults truth more than plausibility in his narrations, and conceals no material point, even though it tends to the dishonour of the people whose actions he is recording. Josephus wrote the Jewish history of these times as well as Moses; and yet, when he comes to the proper period, he quite conceals their blind idolatry in worshipping the golden calf, whereas Moses relates it in all its aggravating circumstances, and seems to fix, in a manner, the whole odium of it upon his brother Aaron. And therefore, to inform ourselves how far Aaron was culpable in this particular, we must attend a little to the probable occasion of it.

While Moses was gone up into the Mount, he appointed Aaron and Hur to be the rulers of the people in his absence; but as his absence proved longer than was expected, the people began to be uneasy. They saw 'the glory of the Lord, which was like a devouring fire on the top of the mount,' and thereupon they concluded that Moses, who tarried so long, was certainly destroyed in the flames. They saw too that the 'pillar of the cloud,' which used to conduct them in their marches was gone, and in no likelihood of returning again; and hereupon having lost their guide, and the visible token of God's presence among them, they came unto Aaron, and in a tumultuous manner, demanded of him to make them another representation of the divine presence, in the room of what was departed from them.⁵ 'Up, say they, and make us gods, or (as the Hebrew text will bear⁶) 'make us a god which shall go before us.'⁶ Not that they were so stupid as to imagine, that the true God could be made by any man, or that any image could be a means of conducting them, either forward into Canaan, or back again into Egypt; but what they wanted, was some outward object to supply the want of the cloud, by being a type and symbol of the Deity, and where they might depose the homage which they intended to pay to the supreme God; for so some of the Jewish doctors have expounded the text of Moses:⁷ 'They desired a sensible object of divine worship to be set before them, not with an intention to deny God, who brought them out of Egypt, but that something, in the place of God, might stand before them, when they declared his wonderful works.'⁷

The commandment against making images had so lately, in so terrible a manner, been enjoined by God himself, that though some reason may be given why the children of Israel were so forward to make the demand, yet none can be imagined, why Aaron should comply with it, without making any remonstrance; and yet we meet with no refusal recorded by Moses. All that we have in extenuation of Aaron's fault, is from the suggestion of the rabbins, who pretend that his compliance proceeded from his fear; that the people had murdered Hur the other deputy, for opposing their desire;

And again, speaking of wicked men, he says, 'Let them be wiped out of the book of the living, and not be written among the righteous, (Ps. lxxxix. 28.) Nor is this form of speech to be found only among sacred writers, but even Plautus himself, having occasion, in one of his prologues, to take some notice of the divine Providence, makes use of these words:—"Those who by false witnesses wish to gain unjust pleas, those who in a suit deny by oath money which they owe, have their names inscribed in the rolls of Jupiter; he knoweth every day who here ask for what is unjust. ⁷ R. Jehudah, in b. Cozzi, part 1, sect. 97.

^b It has been argued by some learned men, that the Israelites intended here to fall entirely into the Egyptian religion, and that the Deity they made the calf to, was some god of the Egyptians; but to me this seems not to be the fact. In this call the Israelites evidently designed to worship the God who brought them out of the land of Egypt, and accordingly their feast was proclaimed, not to any Egyptian deity, but to the Lord, to Jehovah, their own God, (Exod. xxxii. 1.) So that their idolatry consisted not in really worshipping a false deity, but in making an image of the true and living God, which the second commandment expressly did forbid.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 3, b. 11.

^c What authority they had for these assertions, I cannot say; but if what they offer be true, this does not at all prove Aaron to be innocent; because no obstinacy of the people could have forced him without his own fault, and he should have been wil-that to discourage them from pursuing their design, Aaron demanded all their golden ear-rings, in hopes that they would not insist upon having an idol which would cost them so dear; but that when nothing would avail, he took their gold, and cast it into the fire, and, contrary to his intention, by some magical or diabolical art, there immediately came out a calf, which much increased the people's superstition. But this, and abundance more of the like nature, seem to be conceits invented for the excuse of Aaron, who is plainly enough said to have ¹ 'made this molten calf,' which he could not have done, without designing it, and running the gold into a mould of that figure.

The word which we here render calf, ² does, in other places of Scripture, signify an ox: and as an ox's head was, in some countries, an emblem of strength, and the horns a common sign of kingly power; so ³ a learned prelate, out of a design to apologize for Aaron, is willing to insinuate, that his design in making an ox the symbol of the divine presence, was to remind the Israelites of the power of God, and to express the great tokens which they had seen of it, in their wonderful deliverance. But how ingenious soever this hypothesis may be, it wants this foundation for its support, that this hieroglyphic of the divine power was not in use in the time of Moses; for if it was, we cannot imagine why Aaron, when called to an account by his brother, should forget to plead it in excuse for himself; or why God should be so highly incensed against him, had his design been only to exhibit a symbol of the divine power and authority to a people of too gross sentiments, without such a visible representation, ever to comprehend it.

Another learned prelate of our own, ⁴ equally inclined to excuse this action of Aaron, supposes that he took his pattern from part of what he saw on the holy mount, when the Shechinah of God came down upon it, attended with angels, some of which were cherubim, or angels appearing in the form of oxen: but this opinion is inconsistent with the great care which was taken on Mount Sinai, not to furnish any pretext for idolatry, and the caution which Moses gives the people to that purpose. ⁵ 'Take ye therefore good heed to yourselves, for ye saw no manner of similitude, on the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb, out of the midst of the fire, lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure, the likeness of any male or female, the likeness of any beast that is on the earth: the likeness of any winged fowl that flieth in the air; the likeness of any thing that creepeth on the ground; the likeness of any fish,' &c. where the Holy Spirit enumerates animals of all kinds, and positively assures us, that none of their forms or figures appeared upon the mount.

The most common therefore, and indeed the most probable opinion is, that Aaron made choice of the figure of an ox or calf, in compliance to the prejudice of the people, and because that creature was worshipped in Egypt. That the Israelites were sorely infected with the idolatry of the Egyptians, we have many plain proofs ⁶ from Scripture to convince us, that all sorts of animals were worshipped by the Egyptians, and among the terrestrial, more especially the ox, is what ⁷ the several authors, who have treated of the affairs of Egypt, do abundantly testify; and that the idolatry of animals, and more especially of the ox, was established in Egypt during the sojourning of the Israelites in that land, is more than probable from these words of Moses to Pharaoh; ⁸ 'If we sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes;' that is, if we sacrifice to our God, oxen, sheep, and goats, which the Egyptians worship and adore, and consequently make an abomination to the Lord, 'will they not stone us?' So that it seems most rational to suppose, that this image was made in compliance to the giddy humour of the people, who, upon the supposed death of Moses, were probably all for turning back again, and in imitation of the Egyptians, who worshipped their idol Apis, or Serapis, not only in a living ox, but in an image made after the similitude of an ox, bethought themselves of the like representation of a deity to go before them: the only question is, whether the worship of the Egyptian Apis was prior to the formation of this golden calf? which happens to be a point wherein ⁹ the learned are not so well agreed.

Thus we have endeavoured to give a full answer to several objections which have been raised against the sacred historian, during the period which is at present under consideration: and for a further confirmation hereof, we might now produce some foreign testimonies and traditions concerning the truth and veracity of his narrations. That the miraculous pillar, for instance, which conducted the Israelites in the wilderness, very probably gave rise to the ancient fables, ¹⁰ how Hercules and Bacchus, (who under different shapes, are both supposed to denote Moses,) set up pillars in testimony of their travels and expeditions; that the Israelites' safe passage over the Red Sea, upon its being divided by the rod of Moses, and the tradition which the people of Memphis have thereupon, are related by Antipanus, as he is quoted ¹¹ by Eusebius; that upon the return and conflux of the waters, the armies which pursued them were swallowed up in the deep, is mentioned ¹² by Diodorus, as a current story among the people inhabiting the western coast of the Red Sea: that on this coast there are several lakes and springs of a salt and brackish taste, in the manner that Moses has recorded, and no such thing found on the other side of the sea, is testified, ¹³ by Grosius, as well as several ancient geographers, that God's sending down manna for bread to the Israelites, and great plenty of quails for meat, is mentioned by Antipanus, as he is cited again ¹⁴ by Eusebius; that, from Moses' striking the rock with his rod, the fable of CHAP. III.—Of the Israelites passing the Red Sea.

THE passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea is what we have reserved for the subject of our dissertation, because it is one of the most remarkable events in this period, if not in the whole Jewish history; and yet has had the misfortune to meet with more suggestions against its miraculousness, than any other that we find upon record.

What has contributed to this perverseness, may not unlikely be the fond conceits which some ancient doctors, both of the Jewish and Christian church, have been pleased to affix to this miracle, namely, that God divided the sea into twelve passages, according to the twelve tribes; that to facilitate their passage, he pulled up the weeds, removed huge stones, levelled the rugged places, and made the sand at the bottom as hard as a rock; that the waters, upon being divided, were immediately congealed, and stood in array, like a wall of glass; and that some fragments of the Egyptian chariot-wheels may even to this day be seen at the bottom, as far as the sight can reach. For it is not improbable, that in prejudice to these extravagant fancies, others have exercised all their wit and learning to depreciate the miracle by asserting,—That there was no more in it, even as Josephus himself seems to insinuate, than in Alexander's passing the sea of Pamphylia; ¹ that the Red Sea, especially in the extreme part of it, where the Israelites passed, is not above two or three miles over, and very often dry, by reason of the great reflux of the tide; and that Moses, who perfectly understood the country, and had made his observations upon the flux and reflux of the sea, led down his men at the time of ebb, when, being favoured by a strong wind blowing from the shore, he had the good luck to get safe to the other side; while Pharaoh and his army, hoping to do the same, but mistaken in their computation, had the misfortune to be lost. And therefore, to give this matter a fair hearing, we shall first endeavour to establish the truth of the miracle, and then examine into the pretensions of those who are willing either to ascribe it to natural causes, or to compare it with other events, as they suppose, of the like nature.

had some honour and modesty in him; and yet if he had, we can hardly conceive how he durst have recorded so palpable an untruth, supposing this passage to have nothing miraculous in it, when there was such a multitude of living witnesses to confront him; or ² what possible artifice he could use to persuade above two millions of persons that God, by his hand, had wrought a stupendous miracle, when they knew as well as he that there was no such thing transacted. Among such a contumacious and mutinous set of people, Moses must necessarily have made himself ridiculous, and his authority despicable, had he ever once attempted to foist such a fable upon them. And therefore, when we find other sacred writers bearing testimony to what he relates, and relating the matter in the like lofty expressions; when we find the royal Psalmist assuring us, that ³ 'God dividing the sea, made the waters to stand up on an heap, and caused the Israelites to pass through;' when we find the prophet Isaiah demanding, ⁴ 'where is he, that brought them up out of the sea, that led them by the right hand of Moses, by his glorious arm dividing the water before him, to make him an everlasting name?' when we find the prophet Habakkuk declaring upon this occasion, that ⁵ 'the Lord made himself a road to drive his chariot and horses cross the sea, across the mud of the great waters;' and when we find the author of the book of Wisdom thus recording the story; ⁶ 'Where water stood before, dry land appeared; out of the Red Sea a way without impediment, and out of the violent stream a green field, where-through all the people went, that were defended by thy hand, seeing thy marvellous strange wonders; for they went at large like horses, and leaped like lambs, praising thee, O Lord, who hadst delivered them:' when we find these, I say, and several more writers of great authority, asserting the wonderfulness of this passage, unless we can suppose that they were all combined to impose upon us, we cannot but assent to the truth of the fact itself, how poetical soever we may think the words of that sacred hymn to be wherein Moses endeavours to display it: ⁷ 'By the blast of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together, the flood stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea.'

In an event so wonderful and so unaccountable to human reason, it cannot be expected but that traditions should differ, and accounts be various: but certainly it is no small confirmation of the testimony which the sacred writers give us of it that we find Antipanus, in his history of the Jews, as he is quoted by ⁸ Eusebius, and ⁹ Clemens of Alexandria, giving us this narration of the matter. 'The people of Memphis tell us, that Moses, who was acquainted with all the country, knowing the time when the tide would be out, carried over all his army at low water; but those of He-liopolis say otherwise, namely, that the king, following the Jews going away with what they had borrowed of the Egyptians, carried with him a great army; but that Moses, by an order from heaven, struck the sea with a rod, whereupon the waters immediately separated, and he led over his forces in a dry track; but that the Egyptians, attempting the same passage, were dazzled by lightning, and as the sea returned upon the paths they were in, were all destroyed either by fire or water." So that if the joint testimony both of friends and foes can have any weight with us, we cannot but believe that this passage of the Israelites, as it is recorded by Moses, was certainly matter of fact, and a fact so very wonderful and miraculous, that nothing in history can stand in competition with it.

The passage of Alexander the Great over the sea of Pamphylia bears no manner of resemblance to this of the Israelites. Alexander, as ¹ Ariau, ^a and others relate it, was to march from Phaselis, a seaport, to Perga, an inland city of Pamphylia. The country near Phaselis, upon the shore of the Pamphylian sea, was mountainous and rocky; so that he could not find a passage for his army, without either taking a great compass round the mountains, or attempting to go over the strand between the rocks and the sea. The historian remarks, that there is no passing along this place unless when the wind blows from the north; and therefore Alexander, when he came to Phaselis, perceiving that the wind blew from this quarter, laid hold of the opportunity, and having sent some of his army over the mountains, went himself with the rest along the shore. But now what miracle was there in all this, unless we call the wind's blowing opportunely for Alexander's purpose a miracle? It is certain that, according to Plutarch's account of the thing, Alexander himself thought that there was nothing extraordinary in it; and therefore we may justly wonder ^b at Josephus' comparing this passage with that of the Israelites, when there is so manifest a disparity between them. The Israelites crossed over a sea, where no historian makes mention of any persons, but they, that ever found a passage; whereas Alexander only marched upon the shore of the sea of Pamphylia, where the several historians who most magnify the divine providence in protecting him, do all freely allow, that any one may at any time go, when the tide retreats, and the same wind blows that favoured him.

What the breadth of the Red Sea may be at the place where the Israelites passed over, is not so easy a matter to determine, ^c because both geographers and travellers mightily differ in their computations. But if, according to some of the lowest accounts, we suppose it to be much about two leagues, most writers agree, that the sea in this place is very boisterous and tempestuous, which is hardly consistent with a shallowness, much less a total desertion of water, upon any hasty reflux. The wind, it must be owned, if it blew from a right quarter, might both forward the ebb, and retard the flux; but the wind, which blew at this time, we are told, was an east wind, whereas it must have been a west, or north-west wind, to have driven the water from the land's end into the main body of the sea, as any one who looks into a map may easily perceive. But now the east wind blows cross the sea, and the effect of it must be, to drive the waters partly up to the extremity of the bay, and partly down to the ocean, which probably is the meaning, if we must allow an hyperbole in the expression, of the waters 'being a wall to the Israelites on their right hand, and on their left,' because they so defended them on both sides, that the Egyptians could no way come at them, but by pursuing them in the same path which they took.

Why they ventured to pursue the Israelites, the sacred historian seems plainly to intimate, when he tells us, ³ that 'the angel of the Lord, which went before the camp, removed, and went behind them: it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel, and was a cloud and darkness to the one, but gave light by night to the other:' so that the true reason why the Egyptians went in after the Israelites into the midst of the sea, was, that they knew not where they were. They imagined, perhaps, that they were still upon the land, or at least upon the shore, whence the sea had retired; the darkness of the night, and the preternatural darkness of the cloud, not suffering them to see the mountains of water on each side. But ⁴ 'when the Lord looked on the host of the Egyptians through the pillar of fire,' that is, when he turned the bright side of the cloud upon them, to let them see the danger they were in, and at the same time, as Josephus adds, poured out a storm of thunder and lightning, and hailstones upon them from the cloud, ⁵

^a Strabo relates the matter thus. "About Phaselis there are straits towards the sea, through which Alexander passed his army. There is also a mountain called Climax, which lies to the Pamphylian sea, leaving a strait passage to the shore, which is quite bare in good weather, but when the waves arise, it is for the most part covered with them. Now, the road by the mountain is about, and difficult; and therefore, in calm weather, they go by the shore. But Alexander coming hither in stormy weather, and trusting to his fortune, would go over before the waves were abated, which made his soldiers go all day up to the navel in water." (b. 14.) And much to the same purpose is the account which Plutarch gives us. "The march through Pamphylia," says he, "has been the subject to many historians of mighty wonder, and fine declamation, as if the sea, by order of the gods, gave place to Alexander, which almost always is rough there, and does very rarely open a smooth passage under those broken rocks. But Alexander himself, in his epistles, speaks of no miracle, but only says, that he passed by Climax, as he came from Phaselis." (Vita Alex.) Now, by the joint authority of these two excellent historians, this passage is no more than an ordinary thing; and the Mosaic transit must still remain a miracle, until we find as good historians to vouch for a passage over the Red Sea.—Nicholls' Conference, part 2.

^b The words of Josephus are these. "I have been more particular in these relations, because I find them in holy writ; and let no man think this story incredible of the sea's dividing to save the Hebrews, for we find it in ancient records, that this hath been seen before, whether by God's extraordinary will, or by the course of nature, it is indifferent. The same thing happened one time to the Macedonians, under the command of Alexander, when, for want of another passage, the Pamphylian sea divided to make them way, God's providence making use of Alexander at that time as his instrument for destroying the Persian empire." (b. 2. c. 16.) But it is evident that Josephus was ignorant of the account of the above cited historians, otherwise he would have said nothing of the Pamphylian sea's dividing

^c One affirms that the sea is six leagues wide at this place; another makes it but fifteen furlongs: one says it is narrow, and long like a river, and another allows it to be the breadth of one league. Thevenot makes it eight or nine miles in breadth, but Andriocomius will have it to be no more than six. The transit most probably took place at the embouchure of the valley of Bedea, or about twenty miles below Suez, at which point, according to Bruce, the gulf is three leagues over, with fourteen fathoms of water in the channel.

'Let us flee,' cried they, 'from the face of Israel, for the Lord fighteth for them.'

It is not to be questioned, but that Moses was a person of excellent judgment: by his being so long a general of an army, he could not but know the proper advantages that might be made in marches and retreats; and yet he seems to give no great specimen of his skill, by declining the mountains, which possibly were inaccessible to the chariots and horsemen, and marching his men along the sea coasts, where Pharaoh's army might make after him, as we find they did, had not God commanded him to take this route, and foretold him the event. Upon the approach of the Egyptian army, Moses has sufficiently described the consternation which the Israelites were in; and can any one suppose, that such a situation of things was matter of their own choice, or that their leader would of his own head have brought them into a place where there was no possibility of escaping the fury of their enemies, without crossing the sea? ¹ Had Pharaoh laid hold of this advantage, and nothing but a miraculous interposition could have hindered him, how could Moses, with all his sweet words, and address, have prevailed with his people to run into the sea? Or, supposing that he trusted to the tide at ebb, how could he know for certainty, that this ebb would begin precisely at the close of the day, and that the Egyptians would allow him time to decamp, without their guards giving them intelligence, or their forces pursuing him in his retreat; which had they done, to what dismal extremities must he and his people have been reduced? If we suppose that this was an hasty resolution, which the difficulties he found himself in compelled him to take; yet we shall still be at a loss to know, how he could possibly answer for the event, or with what face he could promise the people, that ² 'the Lord would fight for them; that they should stand still and see the salvation which he would show them:' and that the Egyptians, who had given them so much molestation, 'they should see them again no more for ever?'

He might not be ignorant perhaps of the course of the tide, and might easily discern the favourable disposition of the wind; but was there never a man in all the great army which Pharaoh brought with him, of equal observation and skill? It is incongruous to think, that the Egyptians, who excelled at that time all other nations in their knowledge and observation of celestial bodies, should be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the sea, in their own country, in their own coast, and in their own most trading and frequented ports and havens, and if they were not ignorant of the time of the reflux, it is hardly to be imagined, that any eagerness of pursuit would have made them venture into the gulf, when they could not but be sensible, that in case they miscomputed, the returning waves would devour, and swallow them up.

But the truth is, their taking the tide at the ebb would serve the purposes, neither of the Israelites escaping, nor the Egyptians pursuing them. That it badly answered the design of the Egyptians is plain from the event; and that the Israelites could promise themselves no security by it, is evident from the nature of its motion. ³ Every one knows, that in the flux of the sea, its waters come on gradually, and for the space of six hours, swell higher and higher upon the banks; and then continuing in this state for about a quarter of an hour, they sink by degrees for six hours more, and retreating from the shores, which is called the reflux, they remain at their lowest ebb, as long as they had done at their highest flux, and then begin to change their course, and creep in towards the shore again; and in this revolution they always go on, with the variation only of three quarters of an hour, and some minutes, in each tide.

That the Red Sea does ebb and flow like other seas that have communication with the main ocean, we readily grant; but then we are told by those who have made the exactest observations, that the greatest distance that it falls from the place of high water, is not above three hundred yards, and that these three hundred yards, which the sea leaves uncovered at the time of low water, cannot continue so above half an hour at most; because, during the first six hours, the sea does only retire by degrees, and in less than half an hour, it begins to flow again towards the shore; so that upon a moderate computation, the most that can be allowed, both of time and space of passable ground, is but about two hundred yards, during six hours, and an hundred and fifty during eight. But now it is plain, that a multitude of above two millions of men, women, and children, encumbered with great quantities of cattle and household stuff, could never be able to cross, even though we suppose it to be that arm or point of the sea, which is not far distant from the port of Suez, and allow them withal a double portion of time, and a double space of ground to perform it in; whereas the general tradition is, that the place where the Israelites entered the Red Sea on the Egyptian side, is two or three leagues below this northern point, at a place called Kolsum; and the place where they came out of it, on the Arabian side, is at present called ⁴ Corondal, where the sea is about eight or nine miles in breadth.

From the breadth of the sea, and the Israelites coming out of it at a place ⁵ of the same name with that of their entrance, some have imagined, that they did not cross from shore to shore, but only took a short compass along the strand that was left dry at low water, and so came out a little farther in the bay, which the Egyptians attempting to do, by the unexpected return of the tide, were all lost. Now, besides the incongruity, as we said before, of supposing the Israelites better judges of the tide than the Egyptians were, we do not find, that the Scriptures anywhere determine the length of time which the former employed in passing this sea. 'In the morning watch,' which continued from two to six in the morning, it is said indeed, that ⁶ 'the Lord troubled the host of the Egyptians, and took off their chariot wheels;' but how long the Israelites might have entered the channel, before the Egyptians met with this obstruction, is nowhere said; so that the computation of time will depend upon the supposed breadth of the sea.

Supposing then, as we said before, that the breadth of the sea, was about eight miles in all, we cannot but imagine, that a people, 'full of strength and vigour,' as¹ the Psalmist represents them, pursued by so dreadful and enraged an enemy, would make the best of their way; nor can we see any absurdity, in an event so abounding with miracles, to suppose one more.² Now, if God interposed his power to disable the chariots of Pharaoh, lest the return of the waters should excite the Egyptians' fears, and their fears, by improving their diligence, save them from destruction, why might not God interpose the same power, if there was occasion, to quicken and accelerate the Israelites, and make them perform their passage in due time? Nay, if we will allow his own words to be a good comment upon his actions, we cannot but suppose that he did so, when we find him, after all was over, recounting his kindness to them thus:³ 'Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I did bear you on eagle's wings,' where the expression certainly denotes some extraordinary assistance given them in their passage, 'and brought you unto myself.' It cannot be denied, indeed, but that some ambiguity may arise as to the place where the Israelites came on shore, since they were at Etham but two days before, and now landed in a wilderness of the same name; yet if we will but suppose that there were two Ethams, the one a town where they encamped on the Egyptian side, and the other, on the Arabian side, a wilderness; or if we will needs have the wilderness of Etham denominated from the town, supposing that the town was situated near the upper part of the Red Sea, and gave denomination to a great desert, which surrounded the head of the bay, and reached down a considerable space on both sides of it, we may easily perceive that though the Israelites, in the evening, marched from the wilderness of Etham cross the gulf, yet, upon their landing in the morning, they would but be in another part of the wilderness of Etham still. Upon the whole, therefore, it appears, that the Israelites coasting it along the Egyptian shore, in a kind of semi-circle, is both a needless and groundless supposition. For had this been all, upon the return of the tide the drowned Egyptians must have been brought back upon their own shore; whereas the scripture account of this matter is, that, as soon as⁴ 'Moses stretched out his hand over the sea, it returned to its strength, and the waters returned, and covered the Egyptians who fled against them;' which certainly can denote no less, than that the mountains of waters were first dissolved where they were first congealed, that is, on the Egyptian side, and that there beginning to reunite, in order to stop the Egyptians' return, they came rushing upon them in vast inundations, and of course swept them away to the contrary, that is, the Arabian shore, where all the host of Israel was safely arrived.

Thus we have endeavoured to evince the reality of this miraculous event, and to examine the pretences of those who have either compared it with others recorded in profane story, or ascribed it to natural causes, or espied some seeming contradictions in it; and have nothing now more to do, but, with the grateful Psalmist, to acknowledge upon this occasion,⁵ 'Thy way, O Lord, is in the sea, and thy paths in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known. Thou art a God that doest wonders, and hast declared thy power among the people.'

CHAP. VI.—On the passage of the Red Sea, and journeyings of the Israelites.

SUPPLEMENTAL.

THE following very satisfactory article on the geography of the Israelites' route from Egypt to Canaan, is taken from Mansford's Scripture Gazetteer, the best recent work on Scripture geography that we have met with.

'The Almighty having punished the Egyptians for their blindness and obduracy by the plagues which they had suffered, and prepared his people, by their miraculous preservation during these scenes of terror, to place an unlimited confidence in their leader, moved the hardened mind of Pharaoh that he should order their departure in the middle of the night. 'And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he and all his servants; and he called for Moses and Aaron by night, and said, Rise up, and get you forth from among my people, both ye and the children of Israel, and go, serve the Lord as ye have said. And the Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might send them out of the land in haste: for they said, We be all dead men. And the children of Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth.'⁶ Rameses was a city built by the Israelites in the land of Goshen, a little to the south of the Babylon of the Persians, the Grecian Letopolis, and about six or eight miles above the modern Cairo. Here they assembled, and from hence they took their departure; making their first march towards the east, or to Succoth, which is estimated to have been about thirty miles.

In this first part of their route, they were obliged to incline a little to the north, to round the mountain called the mountain of Arabia, which shuts in the valley of Egypt on the eastern side through its whole length, and which sinks into the plain towards the north at a line nearly parallel with the point of the Delta. Succoth implies nothing more than a place of pens or booths; and was probably either a halting-station in the route towards the Desert, or an enclosure for cattle during the inundation of the Nile. Their stay here appears to have been short. 'And they took their journey from Succoth, and encamped in Etham, on the edge of the Wilderness.'⁷ This was a long march of not less than sixty miles, according to the present computed distance; which, as no intervening place of halt is mentioned, must be considered as having been performed at once. But it must be remembered, that they were flying from a treacherous and inexorable enemy, whose pursuit they had reason to fear; and that they were besides experiencing the particular protection and support of that power which could as easily prevent their being wearied in a forced march of sixty miles, as he could save their shoes from being worn out, or find them a passage through the Red Sea. But the real distance was probably not then so much by twelve or fifteen miles as at the present day; as, according to the concurrent reports of travellers, there are undoubted marks of the gulf having extended several miles in a north-west, or N.N.W. direction beyond its present limits. This was precisely in the route of the Israelites, and was just so much taken from their day's march, reckoning to where Suez now stands; the traveller having now to bend considerably to the south-east, to arrive at that place, after rounding the Arabian mountain, or Djibel Atakka.

Etham is said to have been in, or upon, the edge of the wilderness. But it must not be imagined from hence that the wilderness began here. It is probable that the whole way from Succoth to this place was, as it is at this day, the same kind of parched and stony desert; but here, at the northern extremity of the Red Sea, it first assumed the name of Etham; which it bore for some distance to the north, east and south. Arrived at this place, the Israelites may be said to have been safe from all fear of the Egyptians, as another such a march as that from Succoth would carry them into the heart of a desert, where no army, without a miracle, could subsist. They were now on the high road to Canaan, with nothing to interrupt their progress; but in the midst of their hopes and rejoicings, an order comes to turn. This must have been a grievous disappointment: such an order, indeed, as no body of people in their senses, unless convinced of the Divine appointment and supernatural power of their leader, would ever have complied with. Just congratulating one another on their escape, they were directed to return in the very face of their enemy; and not only so, but to place themselves in a situation where they would be rendered incapable either of resistance or of flight. 'And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, that they turn, and encamp before Pi-hahiroth (or Phi-Hiroth), between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-Zephon; before it shall ye encamp by the sea.' The situation into which their obedience to this decree brought them, was a narrow defile, shut in by the mountains on the west, the sea on the east, and closed up on the south by a small bay or inlet of the latter: they were, indeed, "entangled in the land." Some of them, at least, must have been acquainted with the position they were about to occupy; but they entered, and gave vent to no murmur until they saw themselves all at once in the power of their enemy, who stood before them in the only opening by which, without a miracle, it was possible to escape. At this sight their faith and courage failed; 'and they said unto Moses, Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?' But the God who brought them there, was about to show his power by again interposing in their behalf. 'And the Lord said unto Moses, Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward; but lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thine hand over the sea, and divide it; and the children of Israel shall go on dry ground through the midst of the sea. And Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all that night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left.' While the Egyptians, hardened as usual, and blind to the power of the God of Israel, ventured to pursue, and were quickly overwhelmed in the water.

The precise site of this miracle has much engaged the attention of travellers and of the learned; who have differed more or less according to their respective views and prejudices. The first step in our inquiry for the situation of this place, must obviously be to fix that of the previous encampment. Before taking up this encampment, it will be recollected that the last position was at Etham, at the bottom of the gulf, which will be found in the map twelve miles north-west of its present termination at Suez; and which carries up that position to meet the road towards Canaan, and makes the subsequent 'turn' completely retrograde. This turn was to bring them by another day's march beside Pi-hahiroth, before Migdol, and over against Baal-Zephon. The Hebrew word Pi answers to the modern Fam of the Arabic, and implies an opening in the mountains. Pi-hahiroth, then, means an opening or cleft in the mountain leading into the valley of that name. If, then, such an opening at a proper distance from Etham can be found, the situation of Pi-hahiroth may be considered as fixed. Just such an opening, and no other, presents itself about twenty miles to the south of Suez, and thirty-two or thirty-five from the ancient position of Etham: which answers exactly to the required distance; and being the only one of the kind, leaves little doubt of its identity. Into this opening, which runs quite through the mountains to the valley of Egypt, an inlet of the Red Sea, now dry, extended itself; closing up all possibility of advance in that direction. The situation of Migdol and Baal-Zephon are not so clear; but from the precision with which that of Pi-hahiroth can be fixed, their exact recognition is not so material. Migdol implies a fortress; and nothing can be more likely than that the Egyptians should station a garrison at this important entrance into their country. Such might be inferred from strong probability; but there are, in fact, distinct historical traces of such a fortress in this situation. Mr Bryant, in his learned Dissertation on the Egyptian Plagues, cites a passage from Harduin's Notes on Pliny to the following purpose: "At this present time, in the cosmography which was made during the consulships of Julius Caesar and Mark Antony, I find it written, that a part of the river Nile flows into the Red Sea, near the city Ovila and the Camp of Monsens (Monsai): the last word is evidently a misprint for Mousai. This document is invaluable from the traditional evidence it bears of the situation of the miracle being at this place: and the "Camp of Moses" must imply either the place of encampment of the Israelites, or the fortress which always existed at the embouchure of the valley, to which the natives might probably enough have given the name of Moses. Mr Bryant thinks the former: but here, too, on the same spot, were the Φρουρα, or Præsidium Clysniatis of Ptolemy, and the Castrum Clysniatis of Hierocles; both undoubtedly referring to the same fortress, or Migdol of the Egyptians.

Of Baal-Zephon we have no traces. The name implies the god of the watch-tower; and it was probably a beacon for mariners on the opposite coast, over against which the camp was to be pitched. The position of this camp is now determined. It was in front of Pi-hahiroth, or the gorge in the mountains opening into the valley of

A. M. 2511. A. C. 1490; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3761. A. C. 1647. EXOD. xxxiv. 28—NUM. xviii.

Hiroth; which extended through the mountains all the way to the valley of the Nile. It was also in front of Migdol, which we have the strongest reasons to believe was a fortress at the opening of the valley, at the northern angle of the mountains, to defend it on the side of the Arabian Desert, for from the south there was no approach.

Something remains yet to be said in illustration of the topography of this interesting spot. Thus far the Israelites had advanced without meeting with any obstacle; but how came they to be stopped at this precise spot, without the possibility of proceeding another mile? How came they just here to be so "entangled in the land" that, without a miracle, they must have fallen an immediate prey to their enemies? for neither in the maps, nor in the general accounts given of this miracle, is there any explanation of this difficulty. After quitting Etham, they entered a lengthened defile, in which they advanced about thirty miles, having the mountains on their right hand and the sea on their left—both impassable. Arrived thus far, their further progress southward was arrested, either by the impracticable nature of the country beyond, or by an estuary of the Red Sea, which ran up into the valley of Hiroth; from which inlet, it appears by the above cited passage from Harduin, a canal of communication was, in the time of the Ptolemies, carried on to the Nile. The latter opinion the reader will find ably maintained by Mr Bryant, in the work already referred to. This estuary probably came so close to the foot of the mountains, as to admit only of a difficult passage in that direction; which was guarded by the fortress of Migdol. Besides, if it had been free of access, the Israelites could have had no inclination to take such a course, which would only have led them back again into the heart of Egypt. They were accordingly hemmed in, in a kind of cul de sac, which rendered the subsequent miracle for their deliverance as necessary as it was signal.

The place of this estuary is now dry; having been, in the course of ages, partly filled up by the fallen materials of the mountains, and partly left dry by the retreat of the sea itself: it is called Bedea by the Arabs—a name which may be referred to the same origin with the Phrygian word Βεδω, water. The inlet itself, some remnant of which perhaps existed in the time of the Greeks, was by them denominated Clysmā; which likewise signifies water, or an inundation, and might refer either to the place or the miracle. From the inlet, the name was transferred to a town and fortress on its borders; which was probably in the same situation as the Migdol of the Egyptians, and was subsequently the Kolsūm of the Arabs, a word denoting drowning, and which gave its name to the adjoining sea, which is still called Bayer-al-Kolsūm.

The position and agreement of these places are, however, not so clear, but that some authors of eminence have entertained a different opinion. Mr Bryant, and more recently Mr Horne, adopting the arguments of the former, contend that Clysmā and Kolsūm were not the same place; and that the mistakes of former writers from confounding the two, and thereby embarrassing the attempts to fix the precise place of passage, may by this means be rectified. It is possible, indeed, that they might not have been the same place; and the difficulties arising out of their supposed identity, and the situation of Kolsūm at Suez, would thus be obviated. But with deference to the learned authorities who have espoused this opinion, the grounds on which it is formed are not to be depended upon; and new and equal difficulties will be found to attach to them. Mr Bryant, confiding in the astronomical observations of Ptolemy and Ulug Beg, makes a distance of seventy miles from Heroum to Clysmā, but of only twenty-two or twenty-three to Kolsūm; thus separating them by nearly fifty miles of latitude. According to Ptolemy, the latitude of Heroum was 29° 50', and that of Clysmā 28° 50'. According to Ulug Beg, the latitude of Kolsūm was 29° 30'. Now if the reader will take the trouble to consult a map, he will perceive that these positions are impossible; that of Heroum would be 7' south of the present head of the gulf at Suez, while that of Clysmā would be far down the gulf, where no town and no communication with the interior ever existed. These observations of Ptolemy then must be erroneous, and permit no well-founded argument to be derived from them. But the position assigned to Kolsūm by Ulug Beg is, in fact, within a few minutes of a degree of that of Clysmā, and the difference is on the south instead of the north. Whether Heroum ever stood on the gulf, as Mr Bryant infers, or, in other words, whether the gulf ever extended up to that city, is not here of consequence. The canal of Ptolemy Philadelphus passed by it in its way to the Red Sea; but it cannot be shown that it ever stood on its shores. Whether it did or not, does not, in fact, affect the calculations in question; the latitudes are evidently erroneous, and all conclusions derived from them must be erroneous also. The actual distance, however, given by Ptolemy, between Heroum and Clysmā, may be correct, though not on the meridian. This distance is, in fact, corroborated by Antoninus, who makes it sixty-eight miles; but then it is not in a direct line from north to south, but in a south-eastern one, which diminishes the amount in point of latitude one-half, or to thirty-four miles, equal as near as may be to half a degree. D'Anville has placed Clysmā in 29° 40' north latitude, and Heroum, or Heroopolis, in 30° 17'; difference 37', equal to about forty-three English, or forty-seven Roman miles; to which, if half of the amount, or 23½ miles be added for the easting, it comes as near the distance of Antoninus as can be expected.

Nothing, then, in these calculations affects the true position of either Clysmā or Kolsūm, or the arguments founded on their identity. One thing, indeed, is clear: that no measurement from Heroum, on the Trajanus Annis, to Kolsūm at Suez, will give the required distance between the former and Clysmā; and as to the difficulties which have been supposed to have arisen out of the identity of the two places, they may, it is hoped, be shown to be far from formidable. These difficulties have chiefly arisen from the frivolous and sceptical arguments of the celebrated traveller Niebulr; which are altogether founded in misconception, and in a culpable inattention to the scope and letter of the sacred history: and which from a writer of less repute would be totally undeserving of notice.

In the first place, then, this author, overlooking the obvious route of the Israelites round by Etham, which he himself places at the head of the gulf, makes them pass through the valley of Bedea to the sea; and then wonders how they could be said to be 'entangled in the land, and shut in by the wilderness,' with the way open before them straight up to Suez. This obvious difficulty is sufficient alone to show that this was not their route. Yet the intelligent Bruce has fallen into the same error. Niebuhr reasons on the march of the Israelites as on that of a modern caravan; and intimates, that as no mention is made of their being apprized that a miracle would be wrought for their deliverance, it is not likely that they would suffer themselves to be led blindfold into such a snare. "Amongst so many thousand persons," says he, "some would be well acquainted with the way, and would surely have opposed the design of Moses, if he had made them take a route which plainly led to their destruction. One need only travel with a caravan which meets with the least obstacle, a small torrent for instance, to be convinced that the Orientals are not deficient in intelligence, and that they do not suffer themselves to be led like fools by their Caravan-Baschi," or leader. After indulging in this style of reasoning, our author, wishing to diminish the force of the miracle, though not entirely to destroy it, contends for a higher passage near Suez, where the channel is narrower, and the passage itself may be supposed to have come more within the reach of natural causes; and here, to give some countenance to his argument, are the ruins of a town called Kolsun. And as the Arabic tradition has always placed the site of the miracle near that town; as the name of this town is also supposed to be only a variation of Clysma; and has, further, been taken by travellers to be the same with Arsinoe, or Suez; Mr Bryant took the above-mentioned mode of proving that they were not the same: in doing which he proved too much. But if the ruins in question be indeed those of a town called Kolsun, there is nothing conclusive to be drawn from thence. The original town of this name was very probably built on the true site of Clysma; from whence, in course of time, for greater convenience of trade, or to be nearer water, or for many purposes with which we may be unacquainted, it was removed to the site of the present ruins, carrying its name along with it. This is nothing more than what is perfectly analogous to what has happened in every country. Or if these ruins be those of the first and only town of Kolsun, what is there improbable in the supposition that this name should have been given to it? The distance from Clysma is comparatively insignificant: the event which the name records was too stupendous to be forgotten; while the precise spot in which it occurred, might, to the illiterate Arabs, though known to be near, be totally lost.

We again, then, come to the conclusion, that the position of this town, and its being or not the same as Clysma, cannot mislead us. Niebuhr, then, stands inexcused, even upon this principle, in endeavouring to fritter the miracle down to nothing, by placing it in a narrow and shallow part of the channel; and the following argument, like most of his others on this subject, admits as little of palliation: "Pharaoh," says he, "would not appear to me to have been inconsiderate in attempting to pass the sea at Suez, where it is not above half a league over; but he must have lost all prudence, if, after seeing such prodigies in Egypt, he ventured to enter the sea where it was more than three leagues in breadth."

These remarks of Niebuhr were called forth by some sceptical queries proposed by the celebrated critic Michaelis: namely, "Whether there were not some ridges of rocks where the water was shallow, so that an army at particular times may pass over?" Secondly, "Whether the Etesian winds, which blow strongly from the north-west, could not blow so violently against the sea, as to keep it back on a heap, so that the Israelites might have passed without a miracle?" How different to those of Niebuhr are the observations of the sensible Bruce, to whom the same queries were proposed! These observations are indeed inimitable; and the author quotes them at length with the greater pleasure as he has more than once, in the course of the present work, found occasion to dissent from his opinions.

"I must confess," says Mr Bruce, "however learned the gentlemen were who proposed these doubts, I did not think they merited any attention to solve them. This passage is told us by Scripture to be a miraculous one; and if so, we have nothing to do with natural causes. If we do not believe Moses, we need not believe the transaction at all, seeing that it is from his authority alone we derive it. If we believe in God that he made the sea, we must believe he could divide it when he sees proper reason; and of that he must be the only judge. It is no greater miracle to divide the Red Sea, than to divide the river Jordan.

"If the Etesian wind, blowing from the north-west in summer, could keep up the sea as a wall on the right, or to the south, of fifty feet high, still the difficulty would remain of building the wall on the left, or to the north. Besides, water standing in that position for a day, must have lost the nature of fluid. Whence came that cohesion of particles which hindered that wall to escape at the sides? This is as great a miracle as that of Moses. If the Etesian winds had done this once, they must have repeated it many a time before and since, from the same causes. Yet Diodorus Siculus,¹ says, the Troglodytes, the indigenous inhabitants, of that very spot, had a tradition from father to son from their very earliest ages, that once this division of the sea did happen there; and that after leaving its bottom some time dry, the sea again came back, and covered it with great fury. The words of this author are of the most remarkable kind: we cannot think this heathen is writing in favour of revelation: he knew not Moses, nor says a word about Pharaoh and his host; but records the miracle of the division of the sea in words nearly as strong as those of Moses, from the mouths of unbiassed, undesigning pagans.

"Were all these difficulties surmounted, what could we do with the pillar of fire? The answer is,—We should not believe it. Why then believe the passage at all? We have no authority for the one; but what is for the other: it is altogether contrary to the ordinary nature of things: and if not a miracle it must be a fable."

The instrument employed by the Almighty for the division of the sea, is said to be 'a strong east wind.' But it is remarkable that there is no such thing as a natural east wind in all this country; the monsoon blows invariably half the year from the north, or north-north-west, and the other half from the opposite points.

Some authors have supposed, that Moses having lived long in the neighbourhood of the Red Sea, had become acquainted with the phenomena of its tides, and took advantage of the time of ebb to pass; while Pharaoh, less acquainted with them, rashly ventured in and was swallowed up. It was thus that the priests of Memphis explained the miracle. But this subterfuge falls at once to the ground, as the tides in this sea are exceedingly trifling; the difference between high and low water at Suez never being more, according to Niebuhr, than from three to four feet.

In the maps and descriptions accompanying Calmet's dictionary, the Israelites are represented to have crossed the gulf at Kolsum, or Suez, where Niebuhr places the passage. Baal-Zephon is made to be Suez; Migdol, Magdolos, far to the north in the isthmus; and Pi-hahiroth, the mouth of the gullet now filled up with sand. Without entering into any further discussion on the situation of these places than has already been done, there are two weighty arguments, in addition to those before advanced, against such an opinion. The first is,—That in this position the Israelites were in an open country, with no natural barriers by which they could have been said to have been so 'entangled in the land' as to be considered a certain and easy prey to the Egyptians; nor could the latter doubt but that their advance through such a country would be perceived by the Israelites, time enough to evade the pursuit, and to effect a retreat into the Desert, by resuming their tract, and rounding the head of the gulf. But the position twenty miles lower down, shut in on all sides by the sea and by mountains, except a narrow opening towards the north, precluded, in the eyes of the Egyptians (who made no attempt to pursue them, till informed of their critical situation), all possibility of escape, if they could reach unperceived the entrance to this defile, which, under cover of the long mountain barrier, on the west, acting as a screen, they were enabled to do.

The next objection to the above opinion is, that the gulf narrowing as it advances northwards, the point at which the passage is supposed to have been effected, is, according to the scale of the maps in question, scarcely a mile in width; which takes much from the sublimity at least of the miracle, if not from the reality of it. And if it be contended that the passage through a mile of water is no less a miracle than that of nine, which is not denied, or than that of the Jordan, of far less breadth, where without an equal miracle a passage could certainly not have been effected; it is replied, that we have not merely to seek a body of water, the division of which was sufficient to amount to a miracle, but an expanse, the returning surge of which could bury at once the numerous army of the Egyptians, consisting of 'six hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt,' with horse and foot, amounting no doubt to many thousands. It is impossible to estimate the number implied by ALL the chariots of Egypt; but if we may judge by those with which Shishak invaded Judea, they were not less than 1200: the proportion of horsemen to which was 60,000, with people on foot out of number. Even supposing the whole army not to have exceeded this number, it is impossible to conceive such a body, together with 1200 chariots with their horses, impacted in the closest order in which it is possible for an army to move on the line of march, and with every allowable extension laterally, should all be engulfed together in the waters of a sea a mile wide, and where, from the sandy and shelving nature of the beach on both sides, the centre only would afford sufficient depth. For it is to be observed, that the front of Pharaoh's army was still standing on the bed of the sea, when the rear had also entered it.

Nor does it appear that the original channel of the gulf, to the north of its present termination, has been filled up by sand, as supposed. There is a remarkable statement of Burchardt, when crossing this tract, which renders this supposition next to impossible. He observed the ground, about five miles north of Suez, and beyond the present high water mark in the marshy creek, covered with a saline crust, and traversed, in the direction of the ancient channel, with a layer of small white shells, about a quarter of a mile over; while still farther to the north are salt marshes. These are undoubted proofs that the sea once extended over this ground; and that the cause of its retreat is not the influx of sand, but the gradual recession of the sea itself—a phenomenon common to all inland seas. If the former had been the case, the shells which mark the true bed of the sea, which once covered them, as well as the saline crust, must have been buried also. But the inference from these discoveries, the most to our purpose in the present inquiry, is, that although this part was once covered by the waters of the gulf, the change has been effected by a very trifling subsidence of its level. If sand had been the agent employed in effecting this change it might be contended that the channel had been filled up to an indefinite depth; but the shelly bed refutes this idea, and shows that the present level of the ground was at some time or other the true bed of the estuary, which, it cannot be doubted, a rise of a few feet above the present level of the sea would again cover, as well as the marshes beyond it. To draw accurate conclusions from these premises it should also be known, by other marks, what the actual fall of the sea has been: but as the country for a considerable extent on both sides, is represented as a plain, and the saline crust is limited to a stripe in the centre, it may be inferred that the fall cannot have been great. The canal of Ptolemy Philadelphus also taking this direction, shows how little was the inclination of the ground.

All these difficulties are removed by fixing the passage where it has been placed above, namely, twenty miles below Suez, opposite the valley of Bedea: where every thing conspired at once to cover the advance of Pharaoh, and to render the escape of the Israelites impossible without a miracle; where the channel was sufficiently deep and broad to make that miracle worthy of its author and its object; and where without a second miracle, was sufficient space to receive the entire host of the Egyptians, so that they should be at once overwhelmed, without the escape of a single man.

The precise place of the transit may, then, with as much certainty as we can ever hope to arrive at, be fixed at the embouchure of the valley of Bedea, or about twenty miles below Suez; where, according to Bruce, the gulf is three leagues over, with fourteen fathoms of water in the channel; and where the division of the waters would indeed form 'a wall' of fearful aspect, on the right hand and on the left. It may also be added, on the authority of the same traveller, and as an additional corroboration, that the north cape of the bay, opposite the valley of Bedea, which marks the place of the ancient creek of Glysma, is called Ras Musa, or the cape of Moses.

Arrived on the opposite shore, the Israelites entered the desert of Etham; where is a sandy and gravelly plain, called by Niebuhr, Eti, and by Burekhardt, El Altha—both bearing sufficient vestiges of the ancient name of the country. In this wilderness they went three days' journey, which brought them to Marah; whose bitter waters were rendered sweet for their use. The position of Marah answers to that of the bitter well of Howara, about eighteen hours from Suez. Burekhardt says, that this is the usual, and, as it appears, the exclusive route to Mount Sinai. He says also that there is no other road of three days' march in the way; nor any other well absolutely bitter on the whole of this coast as far as Ras Mohammed, at the entrance of the gulf. Burekhardt, indeed, has adopted the error of Niebuhr in supposing the transit to have been near Suez, and reckons his three days to Howara accordingly. But his arguments with respect to this place will answer equally well if we deduct twenty miles, or about six hours, for the difference in the distance between Suez and the true place of passage. There will then remain twelve hours, or three days of four hours, equal to about twelve miles for each day's journey—a rate of progress which may be considered as sufficiently suited to the condition of a people who had just escaped from the presence of an enemy; who now could have no doubt of their perfect safety; and had nothing to impel them to the forced marches which they had made from Rameses to Glysma.

The next journey was to Elim; where were 'twelve wells of water, and threescore and ten palm trees.' Both Niebuhr and Burekhardt agree in placing Elim in the Wady Gharendel, distant three hours from Howara; which answers very well with the rate of march above assumed, in a country, too, where the position of the encampments must be regulated very much by the situation of water. In the wady or valley of Gharendel, which is about a mile broad, are date or palm trees, tamarisks, and acacias; and a copious spring. This single spring, unusually abundant for this arid country, may be considered rather as a confirmation of the opinion, than as an argument against it; as Niebuhr attests, that water may easily be obtained any where by digging for it, although the apertures will quickly be filled up again by the sands. To search, in fact, after a lapse of 3500 years, for the identical twelve wells of Elim, rudely constructed in a sandy soil, is little better than absurd. The wells of rocky countries, indeed, are perhaps the most durable of all the monuments of antiquity, and serve to fix with unerring certainty the scene of many a memorable event; but the case is widely otherwise on a moving surface of sand, where the shallow excavations, and the simple masonry of Arabs, would not require centuries to obliterate: or, which is frequently the case, the wells may have been wantonly destroyed in the dissensions of the tribes. It is sufficient that water exists here in abundance, and is to be obtained in as many wells as the traveller chooses to dig; while the accordance of this position with the next movement from Howara, and the absence of any other springs that could be relied upon for a distance of many hours in the same route, leave little doubt of its being that of Elim. Former travellers, indeed, amongst whom are Moucouys, Theve-not, Poccocke, and Shaw, considered a valley near Tor, where are date-trees and springs, to be Elim: an opinion which has been supported by Mr Bryant, who endeavours also to show that this position was the same with the Phenicon, or palm-grove, of Strabo and Diodorus, which it probably was; but it cannot, with strict attention to the route of the Israelites, be considered as Elim. In the first place, the distance from Howara to Tor is little less than a hundred miles; and as all the stations in this part of the journey appear to be laid down with great accuracy; as no mention is made of any between Marah and Elim; and as the Israelites were hastening to mount Sinai, we have no reason to conclude that any halt did actually take place; and with still less reason can we suppose this distance to have been performed in a single march. In the next place, if Elim be Tor, the four encampments between that place and Sinai will be crowded into a space which it is difficult to reconcile with any motive, or with any similar rate of progress in other parts of the march. After quitting Elim, the Israelites encamped by the Red Sea; then in the wilderness of Sin; then at Dophkah; then at Alush; then at Rephidim; and then in the wilderness of Sinai. Now the rocky region which constitutes the desert of Sinai, extends to within twenty miles of the coast; so that the four encampments, from that on the Red Sea, to Rephidim, at the edge of the desert, could not have been more than four or five miles apart: a series of petty movements across the barren plain of El Kaa, which, if they had been making their approaches to a fortress, might have had some object, but which, in the situation in which they were, must have been frivolous and vexatious, and without a parallel elsewhere. Nor is it likely, as Sinai was their destination, that they should have retrograded without any mention being made of such a course, or any cause assigned for it. Lastly, the position of Elim at Tor is incompatible with the situation of the desert of Sin. This desert is expressly said (Exod. xvi. 1.) to have been between Elim and Sinai; but it could only have formed a small part of the distance, as only one of the five intervening encampments took place within its limits. In Num. xxxiii. 10—12, it is said, that the Israelites 'removed from Elim, and encamped by the Red Sea; and they removed from the Red Sea, and encamped in the wilderness of Sin; and they took their journey out of the wilderness of Sin, and encamped at Dophkah.' Now the whole space between Tor and the encampment of the desert of Sinai, is a plain, bearing one name, and but of one day's journey, bounded every way to the north by the group of Sinai; so that the Israelites quitting the wilderness of Sin after a single encampment in it, must either have retraced their steps towards Elim, or have proceeded towards the eastern or Eleanitic gulf of the Red Sea, beyond Sinai altogether: of neither of which circumstances is any intimation given; on the contrary, both are at variance with the order of the route, and the destination of the people, which was Sinai, to receive the law. But in the natural and established route, the whole is conformable with the scripture narrative, and confirmed by the local knowledge we possess of the country.

From the desert of Etham to the second march beyond Elim, the road, as it does now, ran parallel with the gulf of Suez, and at no great distance from it. At the end of the first day's march from Elin, an indentation of the coast brought them at once upon the sea, where was the encampment mentioned. Towards the end of the second, the coast, which had hitherto inclined in a south-east direction, turning directly to the south, quite away from the direct road to Sinai, obliged them to quit the vicinity of the sea, which they had hitherto constantly had on their right hand, and to enter farther into the heart of the desert; which in that part bore the name of Sin. This is precisely the route pursued at the present day; and near the point where the road leaves the coast, at the south-west foot of the mountainous ridge called El Tyh, is the sandy plain of El Seyh, extending two days' journey eastward. The western extremity of this plain only would the Israelites have to cross, which they would soon traverse, and have only one encampment to make on its surface; when the remaining stations of Dophkah, Alush, and Replidim, would bring them, by marches of fifteen or sixteen miles, to the borders of the desert of Sinai.

Of Dophkah and Alush, we can only know the relative situations; and as nothing more is said of them than their bare mention as places of passage, it is of little consequence. But to Replidim much interest is attached. Here, or hard by, the miraculous supply of water took place; and here the Israelites were, for the first time, attacked by their implacable enemies the Amalekites. It is not a little curious, that a person of Mr Bryant's sagacity should have found it necessary, in order to explain this attack of the Amalekites, to carry Replidim far up to the northward, towards the borders of that people. There is nothing surely surprising in a people, who were probably apprized of the ultimate destination of the Israelites, wishing to carry the war from their own homes, and, by advancing on their enemy, to attack him at a disadvantage. But in Exod. xvii. 8, it is said, that Amalek 'came and fought with Israel at Replidim.' And in I Sam. xv. 2, 'Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way when he came up from Egypt:' that is, that he came down to Replidim, and took the Israelites by surprise. It could not have been represented in this way, if the latter had approached the territories of the Amalekites. To set this question at rest, however, the Israelites were encamped at Replidim when they were miraculously supplied with water from Horeb; consequently it must have been close to that mountain, or, in other words, on the edge of the desert of Sinai, where it has already been placed.

The next encampment, after that at Replidim, was in the desert of Sinai itself, where the people arrived in the third month, and where they remained encamped eleven months, during which time the law was delivered.

At length, on the 20th day of the second month, in the second year, the signal for removing from Sinai was given by the pillar of the cloud being removed from the tabernacle, and preceding the line of march into the wilderness of Paran; into which, or at least from their encampment in the desert of Sinai, the Israelites advanced for three days before a convenient resting-place, for any time, was found them, in all probability for want of water. The first station in this wilderness of Paran, 'that great and terrible wilderness,' which extended all the way from Sinai to the borders of Canaan, and in which they spent the greatest part of the time they were condemned to wander, was at Taberah, or Kibroth-hattaavah: the former name being given by Moses, because here many of the people were consumed by fire from heaven for their complaining; and the latter, because, at the same place, the people lusted for flesh, and many more died while the quails, which had been miraculously sent them, were yet in their mouths. From this place, the stations mentioned northwards are Hazeroth, Ritmah, Rimmon-parez, Libnah, and Kadesh-barnea, where the camp was fixed while the spies were sent to explore the promised land; from whose evil report the people were so intimidated, and so unmindful of the promises they had received, and the protection they were under, that, as a punishment for their ingratitude and disobedience, they were ordered to turn back, and 'get them into the wilderness, by the way of the Red Sea,' Numb. xiv. 25. This retrograde movement carried them back southwards, through the same wilderness of Paran, but by a more eastern route, nearer mount Seir, to Eziongeber, on the eastern gulf of the Red Sea. The stations enumerated in this route are, Rissah, Kehelathah, mount Shapher, Haradah, Makkeloth, Tahath, Tarah, Mithcah, Hashmonah, Moseroth, Bene-jaakan, Hor-lagidgad, Jot-bathah, Ebronah, and Ezion-geber. What space of time was spent in these several encampments is not mentioned. The cloud resting on the tabernacle was the guide for the people: when and where that moved, thither they followed, and rested where it rested; and 'whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, that the cloud tarried upon the tabernacle, remaining thereon, the children of Israel abode in their tents, and journeyed not; but when it was taken up, they journeyed,' Numb. ix. 22.

In the map of this route, in the last edition of Calmet's dictionary, it is made to extend westward, towards Egypt, instead of southward, towards the Red Sea. Libnah, stated in the description to be west of Mount Hor, is yet supposed to be the same Libnah which Joshua smote. (Josh. x. 29, 30.) This Libnah, which was evidently in the tribe of Judah, is placed by Eusebius and Jerom in the district of Eleutheropolis; and Lachish, the next place taken by Joshua, only seven miles south of that city. In fact, the places successively captured by Joshua in his march southwards after Makedah, were, first Libnah, then Lachish, then Eglon, and then Hebron; consequently both Libnah and Lachish were north of the last mentioned city. Rissah, the next place in the route, is supposed to be El Arish, and mount Shapher mount Casius, on the confines of Egypt; but this track along the coast of the Mediterranean would, with more propriety, have been termed "by the way of the Great Sea," than of the Red Sea. Besides, this route would have brought the Israelites again to the very edge of Egypt, and within reach of their incensed enemies, who may be supposed in this interval to have recruited their armies, and might have attacked them in this situation to much greater advantage than they did at Pi-lahiroth. But if no danger was to be apprehended from hostile attack, there was another of greater consideration. 'Let us,' said the Israelites just before, disheartened at their sentence of retrogradation, and wearied with the privations and monotony of the desert, 'Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt.'

A. M. 2514. A. C. 1450; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES. A. M. 3761. A. C. 1617. EXOD. xxxiv. 28—NUM. xviii.

This was their ready cry on all occasions; and it is not likely that God in his providence, or Moses in his policy, would have trusted them so near a country whose idols, and whose fleshpots, they were ever hankering after, and from which such mighty efforts and miracles had been employed to deliver them.

In the continuation of this supposed route, Moseroth is conjectured to be the present Mountains of Moses, so called, or Ain-el-Mousa, seven or eight miles from Suez. This would bring them again nearly into their old track in the desert of Etham or Shur; and it is strange that no mention should be made of these well-known places. But Moses says, that, after leaving Kadesh-barnea, 'they turned, and took their journey into the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea; and they compassed mount Seir many days,' Dent. ii. 1: plainly implying, that the retrograde route was not by the Mediterranean and towards Egypt, but towards the nearest point of the Red Sea in the route next designed for them; stretching along the western side of the desert of Sin and mount Seir to Ezion-geber. What is meant by the way of the Red Sea, is further distinctly told us in Numbers xxi. 4; where it is said, that the Israelites, departing from Mount Hor, 'journeyed by the way of the Red Sea, to compass the land of Edom;' or, in other words, to get to the eastern side of that mountainous country by crossing the plain of Elath and Ezion-geber. The whole of this scheme of the western route of the Israelites is, in fact, founded in a misconception of the true extent and position of mount Seir. It is true, that the precise situation of Libnah, or of either of the other stations in the desert after leaving mount Sinai, cannot be accurately known; but the general course of the route from Sinai to Kadesh-barnea, and from thence to Ezion-geber, is sufficiently indicated.

There is a curious anachronism in the above map. It was published in 1808; but has the route of Burekhardt in 1812 marked on it, without, however, adopting any of the improvements indicated by his discoveries. It retains, indeed, all the old errors; the insulated and northern position of Mount Hor—the double peak of a single mountain, representing Sinai and Horeb—the forked extremity of the gulf of Elak or Acaba—and the undefined position of the desert of Sin; while Mount Seir is laid down, by letters only, transversely across the desert of Paran. The labours of Burekhardt have enabled us to correct these errors; while the description of Moses directs us where to trace the course from Kadesh-barnea to Ezion-geber.

Thus far all is clear; but the ensuing part of the journey is, for the most part, but ill explained by commentators; nor has any map come within the inspection of the author, in which it is intelligibly laid down. The passage from the western to the eastern side of Mount Seir, round by Ezion-geber, is uniformly represented as one continuous route; Mount Seir itself is variously distorted from its true position; Mount Hor, an eminence of the former, is carried high up towards the borders of Moab, where it will be seen that it could not possibly have been; and very confused notions are entertained of the true situation of the desert of Sin. These inaccuracies have arisen, in part, from a strange inattention to the scripture narrative, and, in part, from the geographical errors more or less inseparable from the want of a correct knowledge of the true features of a country.

With respect to the first cause of error, it will be the author's fault, and not any want of precision in the scripture account, if this part of the journey be not rendered sufficiently perspicuous; and to obviate the latter, Burekhardt has furnished us with abundant information. It will be found, indeed, that, instead of a single passage through the plain of Elath and Ezion-geber, this plain was twice passed, or at least, that the places situated in it were twice visited; and that Mount Seir, instead of having been merely doubled by a straight course, down one side and up the other, was four times skirted at its southern extremity, well illustrating the passage which says 'Ye have encompassed this mountain long enough.' In Numbers xxxiii. 36, 37, after the Israelites are described as having descended to Ezion-geber from their long sojourn in the desert on the north, it is said, 'And they removed from Ezion-geber, and pitched in the wilderness of Sin, which is Kadesh, and they removed from Kadesh, and pitched in Mount Hor, in the edge of the land of Edom.' In chapter xx. 1, 22, it is said, 'Then came the children of Israel, even the whole congregation, into the desert of Sin, in the first month; and the people abode in Kadesh. And the children of Israel, even the whole congregation, journeyed from Kadesh, and came unto Mount Hor: where Aaron died, and was buried; and where a thirty days' mourning was performed for him. In chapter xxi. 4, it is said, 'And they journeyed from Mount Hor by the way of the Red Sea, to compass the land of Edom.' In other words, the children of Israel, from their first descent to Ezion-geber, ascended northwards, up the desert of Sin, to Kadesh; and from Kadesh to Mount Hor, 'in the edge of Edom;' where having buried Aaron, and paid the last respects to his memory, they turned again southwards, to the plain of Elath and Ezion-geber, to compass the land of Edom, and enter the plains of Midian.

In order to the better understanding of the relative position of these places, it will be necessary first to describe that of Mount Seir; which will form a key to the rest. Mount Seir of Edom is a mountain chain, which, under the modern names of Djebel Sherar, Djebel Hesima, and Djebel, extends from the southern extremity of the Dead Sea to the northern one of the eastern gulf of the Red Sea, about a hundred miles. On its western side, it rises boldly from a valley which accompanies its whole length; but sinks by an easier slope towards the east, into the elevated plains of Arabia Petrea. Its western border is so strong, as to be easily defended; so that the Israelites, when denied a passage by the king of Edom, dared not make any attempt to force one, but were compelled to return, and get round the mountain, by the plain of Ezion-geber. It was on a conspicuous eminence on this western border, called Hor, about forty miles north from the plain of Elath, that Aaron died, and was buried by the Israelites—an office in which, either not alarmed, or informed of their pious intention, the Edomites do not appear to have molested them. Tradition has preserved the situation of this mount; which is still visited as the tomb of Aaron, by both Mahometans and Christians.

This description of Mount Seir will facilitate that of the desert of Sin. There is, as was observed, a valley stretching along the whole western side of Mount Seir; which, like it, extends from the Dead Sea on the north, to the Red Sea on the south. This valley is a sandy plain, at a low level, having the chain of Mount Seir on the east, and a ridge of hills, of a lower elevation than those of Seir, on the west, and separating it from the desert of Paran. It is about five miles across; and is at present known in its northern part, by the name of El Ghor, and in its southern, by that of El Araba: it appears before the catastrophe of Sodom, to have afforded a course for the Jordan into the Red Sea. This can be no other than the desert of Sin, or Kadesh; with which it accords in all the required conditions. It had no water; neither is there any there now:—from hence messengers were sent to request a passage through the country of the Edomites: and from hence only, with any show of purpose, could such a request be sent:—from hence, also, the Israelites ascended Mount Hor; and from hence only could the ascent of that mountain be made without penetrating the whole breadth of Edom from the opposite side, where it is clear that they never yet had been:—and, lastly, into this desert it was that the Israelites entered from the plain of Elath and Ezion-geber; and this valley does strictly open from that plain, and is the only desert region answering to the name and the narrative into which they possibly could enter: they could not, in fact, move from their encampment at Ezion-geber in any other direction, without passing to the east of Mount Seir, which, as has been shown, they did not do till after their return from Mount Hor, or retracing their steps into the desert of Paran, which it is equally certain they did not do.

This desert was likewise called Kadesh; in which also was a place more particularly so termed, and situated in the ‘uttermost border’ of Edom, that is to say, at the very foot of the chain, bordering on the desert; from whence the Israelites sent messengers to the king of Edom to solicit a passage through his country. No situation can be allotted more probable as the position of this place, than that by which the modern road passes from Maan, on the east of Mount Seir, by the Wady Mousa, through the mountains, and across the valley of the Ghor or desert of Sin, to Gaza—the very route, in fact, of the Nabathæi from their capital Petra. As this is one of only two or three routes, at great distances, which penetrate the region of Seir; as it passes close by mount Hor; and as that mountain would be most easy of access by its means from the valley below; we cannot hesitate in fixing the position of Kadesh Proper at the point where the road, quitting the mountains, enters on that valley.

To recapitulate. The children of Israel having arrived at Ezion-geber from the desert of Paran, and at the southern foot of Mount Seir, made a detour northwards up the desert of Sin, or El Araba, on the western side of that mountain, and separated from the desert of Paran by a ridge of hills, but which formed no part of Mount Seir. This course they pursued to Mount Hor, ‘in the edge of Edom,’ a mountainous eminence rising abruptly from the eastern side of the desert of Sin, and standing on the western edge of Seir. Here they staid to bury Aaron, and to complete their mourning for his loss. The purpose for which they entered the desert of Sin was obviously to obtain a shorter and better passage across Mount Seir, or through the land of Edom, to Canaan. Defeated in this object, nothing was left for them but to return to the plain of Ezion-geber, and to make the circuit of the mountain on its southern side.

The next encampment mentioned, after the return from Mount Hor, is at Zahmonah. Where Zahmonah was is not known; but it was probably in or near the plain of Elath, as there was no water in Sin. This was a long march; but the people could not tarry in a region which was destitute of the most indispensable article of subsistence. Besides, the period of their wandering was now drawing to a conclusion; and they were hastening with confidence to the termination of their fatigues and privations in the promised land. The same reason led them, by stages of thirty miles, by Punon, Oboth, and Ije-abarim, to the brook Zared; where they arrived at the end of the thirty-eighth year from the time of their leaving Kadesh-barnea, and the fortieth from their departure from Egypt, and when all the adults then living were dead. This brook, which appears to be the Wady Beni Hammed, descends from the mountains of Kerek, and falls into the Dead Sea near the middle of its western shore. From the Zared, the Israelites made one march across the Arnon, the Modjeb of modern geography, to Dibon Gad; the ruins of which, under the name of Diban, are shown about four miles to the north of the river. From Dibon, the encampments of Beer, Ahnon-diblathaim, Mattanah, Nahaliel, and Bamoth, brought them to the mountains of Abarim, on the east of the Jordan; which mountains they crossed at Pisgah, a part of the chain, where Moses was indulged with a bird’s-eye view of the promised land, and where he died. Descending from these mountains, they pitched between Beth-jesimoth and Abel-shittim, on the banks of the Jordan^a itself; whose waters, deep and rapid, were divided for their passage, as those of the Red Sea had been. And thus this extraordinary journey of forty years terminated with a similar miracle to that with which it commenced.

There are two facts worthy of mentioning in this place. The first is, that the whole of the tribes, during their wanderings in the desert, had sustained a decrease of only 1820; their numbers being at this time 601,730, and before, 603,550. The other fact alluded to is, that as all the males above twenty years of age at Kadesh-barnea fell subsequently in the wilderness, none who crossed the Jordan, with the exception of Joshua and Caleb, could exceed fifty-eight; consequently the whole of the adult males may be considered as effective for the purposes of war.

The map, illustrative of the journeyings of the Israelites, has been carefully constructed, so as to exhibit the physical features of the country, as laid down by Burek-

^a The average breadth of this celebrated stream may be computed at thirty yards, and its depth about nine feet; but from the rapidity of its current, it discharges a much greater body of water than many rivers of larger dimensions: it rolls, indeed, so powerful a volume of deep water into the Dead Sea, that the strongest and most expert swimmer would be foiled in any attempt to swim across it at its point of entrance. Its banks are beautifully picturesque, being shaded by the thick foliage of closely planted trees, and so beset with tamarisks, willows, oleander, and other shrubs, that the stream is not visible, except on the nearest approach. Its waters are generally turbid, and its annual overflowing takes place in the first month, which answers to our March.

SECT. II.

CHAP. I.—From the Building of the Tabernacle to the Death of Korah, &c.

THE HISTORY.

For full forty days and forty nights, Moses continued upon Mount Sinai, as he had done before, without either eating or drinking; and when he came down from thence his face had contracted such a lustre, by his holding so long a conference with God, that the people were not able to approach him; and therefore, whenever he talked with Aaron, or any of them, he was accustomed to put a veil over his face, as long as the lustre lasted, but never made use of any when he went into the tabernacle to receive the divine commands.

While he was on the mount, God gave him the ten commandments, written in two tables, and withal full instructions in what manner the tabernacle, intended for his own habitation among them, and all its sacred utensils, were to be made; which he now communicated to the people, and at the same time exhorted them to bring in their several offerings to that purpose. This they did in such abundance, that he thought it convenient, by a public proclamation, to restrain their further liberality; and having thus made a sufficient collection of all kinds of materials, he gave them to Bezaleel and Aboliab, the two great artists in building, and all manner of workmanship, whom God had before made choice of.

In less than six months the tabernacle and all its rich furniture were finished, and on the first day of the first month, in the second year after the Israelites' departure out of Egypt, it was set up: when, as soon as this was done, the 'pillar of the cloud,'^a which is called 'the glory of the Lord,' covered, and quite filled it, so that Moses for some time was not able to enter in. However, when he entered in, he received instructions from ^a 'The glory of the Lord,' what the Jews call Shekinah, was a particular manifestation of the divine presence, appearing usually in the shape of a cloud, but sometimes breaking out into a bright and refulgent fire. For we must not suppose that the cloud and the glory of God were two different things, but one and the same, even as the pillar of the cloud and fire were; for outwardly it was a cloud, and inwardly a fire. And, in like manner here, the external part of it covered the tabernacle without, while the inward part of it shone in full glory within the house; in which sense the account of this appearance (Exod. xvi. 10.) is to be understood; the glory of 'the Lord abode upon Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it,' that is, covered the glory of the Lord, not the mount, 'six days;' for on the seventh day, this glory broke through the cloud, and appeared like a devouring fire in the sight of all the people, (Exod. xxiv. 17.) This wonderful appearance, whether occasioned by the presence of angels, or, as others imagine, by the residence of the second person in the ever blessed Trinity, took possession of the tabernacle, on the day of its consecration, and, as the Jews believe, passed into the sanctuary of Solomon's temple, on the day of its dedication, where it continued to the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by the Chaldeans; after which time it was never more seen.—Cabnet's Dictionary, under the word Shekinah; and Patrick's Commentary.

God, which he communicated to the people, in what manner, according to this new institution, he was to be worshipped by sacrifices and oblations: what festivals were to be observed, and how celebrated; what meats were forbidden; what the instances of uncleanness were; and what the degrees of consanguinity prohibited in marriage. And having appointed these and some other ordinances, he solemnly consecrated Aaron to the high priest's office; his sons, and in them their posterity, he made priests; and to these he adjoined the whole tribe of Levi, to serve in the tabernacle, with particular allowances for their subsistence, and some restraining laws, as to their persons, their conduct, and marriages.

Eight days after his consecration, Aaron offered his first burnt-sacrifice for himself and the people, which God was pleased to manifest his acceptance of, in the sight of all the people, by sending down fire from heaven, which, by consuming the offering, struck them with such reverence, that they all fell prostrate, in humble adoration, before the divine Majesty. The fire, thus miraculously kindled, was,¹ by the divine command, to be^b kept perpetually burning, and no other to be used in all the oblations that were made to God. But Nadab and Abihu, two unhappy sons of Aaron, unmindful of this command, took common fire on their censers, and so entering the tabernacle, began to offer incense; but by this their profane approach, they so offended God, that he immediately struck them dead with lightning; and to inject terror to the rest, ordered them to be carried forthwith out, and there buried without any mourning or funeral pomp. And much about the same time, he gave another instance of his severity against sin, in a certain person, the son of an Israelitish woman indeed, but whose father was an Egyptian, who, for his cursing and blaspheming the name of God, was by him directly ordered to be stoned to death; from which it became a standing law,^c though there was no express

^b If it be asked how this fire could be preserved, when both the tabernacle, and the altar whereon it burnt, were in motion? as they evidently were, when the Israelites journeyed in the wilderness, I see no reason why we may not suppose, that upon these occasions, there might be a certain portable conservatory of this sacred fire, distinct from the altar; and that there was some such vessel made use of, seems manifest from the ignemtion, that at such times 'the ashes should be removed from off the altar, and a purple cloth spread over it.' (Num. iv. 8.—Bibliotheca Bibliaica, vol. 4, Occasional Annotations 2.

^c The criminal, and his offence, are only thus recorded by Moses: 'The son of an Israelitish woman, whose father was an Egyptian, and a man of Israel, strove together in the camp, and the Israelitish woman's son blasphemed the name of the Lord, and cursed,' (Lev. xxiv. 11.) But the Jews, in explaining these words, have followed either that superstitious respect which they pay to the name Jehovah, or their wonted humour or supplying the silence of the sacred history, with circumstances nowhere to be found but in their own imaginations. In pursuance to their superstition, they fancy, that the crime of this blasphemer consisted simply in his pronouncing the name Jehovah, forasmuch as they suppose, that there can be no blasphemy without such pronunciation; and in pursuance to their humour or supplying the silence of Scripture, they have invented a genealogy for this blasphemer. For they tell us, that he was the son of one of those taskmasters who were set over the Israelites in Egypt, and of that very taskmaster, who, by perverting his husband, violated the chastity of the Jewish virgin Sodomoth, and was afterwards slain by Moses, for using the same husband with great barbarity; that the son, who is here mentioned, quarprecept to that purpose before, that whoever was guilty of the like offence, whether stranger or Israelite, was to undergo the same punishment.

Nay, and not long after this, another instance of the divine severity was upon a man, who by a post-fact-law was likewise adjudged to be stoned to death, for violating the Sabbath, which God had so strictly enjoined to be observed, by gathering some sticks on that day. There was no penalty annexed to the violation of this commandment; and therefore the people who brought him before Moses, were ordered to keep him in custody, until he should know the divine pleasure concerning Sabbath-breakers; and when he acquainted them, that such transgressors were to be punished with death,¹ they immediately led him out of the camp, and there stoned and buried him.

While the Israelites lay encamped in the wilderness of Sinai, God appointed Moses first^a to renew the ordinance of the passover, and then, with the help of Aaron, and the heads of each tribe, to make a general muster of the men that were able to bear arms; which accordingly was done, and the whole number, exclusive of the tribe of Levi, which were appointed to attend the service of the tabernacle, amounted to six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty men; and upon this muster, God appointed their encampment, ever after, to be in this manner.

The whole body of the people were disposed under four large battalions, so placed as to enclose the tabernacle, and each under^b one general standard. The relying with a man of the tribe of Dan, because he would not let him encamp in the same district, brought his cause before Moses; but that being condemned at his tribunal, he began, out of mere rage and madness, to blaspheme. Of all this, however, Moses himself says nothing, out of a scruple, as we may well suppose, to relate the circumstances of a crime which his very thoughts detested.—Saurin's Dissertations, 58.

^a During the sojourning of the children of Israel in the wilderness, they seem to have had a divine dispensation from observing the ordinances both of circumcision and the passover. Circumcision did not consist with their itinerant course of life, and for the celebration of the passover, they had not, in every encampment, all the materials that were necessary. But having now rested in the confines of the holy mount for almost the space of a whole year, after the tabernacle was set up, the high priest consecrated, and his first oblation honoured with a gracious acceptance, God thought it not an improper time to re-ordain the celebration of the passover, that so remarkable a deliverance, as their escape out of Egypt, which, by their repeated desires of returning thither, seemed, in a great measure, to have been forgotten, might not be altogether obliterated. And if it should be asked, whence they could have a sufficiency of lambs and kids for so vast a multitude to feast on; there is no reason to deny, even supposing they had not a supply of their own, but that they might traffic with the Ishmaelites, and ancient Arabs inhabiting these parts, for such a number of small cattle, and being not far distant from Midian, (Exod. iii. 1.) by the interest of Jethro, might from thence be furnished with such a quantity of meat for unleavened bread, as this one passover, as this was the only one they kept in the wilderness, may be presumed to require.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Pool's Annotations.

^b All the twelve tribes were distinguished from one another by particular standards, and each standard is supposed by some to have been of the colour of that stone in Aaron's pectoral, upon which the name of the tribe whereunto it belonged was written. The figures on the standards of the four principal tribes that we have mentioned, are these,—In that of Judah was borne a lion; in that of Ephraim, an ox; in that of Reuben, the head of a man; and in that of Dan, an eagle and a serpent in his talons; which standard of the camp of Judah was first. It consisted of the tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, the sons of Leah, which pitched on the east side of the tabernacle, towards the rising of the sun. On the south side was the standard of the camp of Reuben, under which were the tribes of Reuben and Simeon, the sons of Leah likewise, and that of Gad, the son of Zilpah, her maid. On the west side was the standard of the camp of Ephraim, under which were the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin. And on the north side was the standard of the camp of Dan and Naphtali, the sons of Bilhah, Rachel's maid, and that of Asher the son of Zilpah. Between these four great camps and the tabernacle, were pitched the four less camps of the priests and the Levites, who had their attendance about it. On the east side encamped Moses and Aaron, and Aaron's sons, who had the charge of the sanctuary. On the south side were the Kohathites, a part of the Levites descended from Kohath, the second son of Levi. On the west side were the Gershonites, another part of the Levites, descended from Gershon, Levi's eldest son; and on the north side were the Merarites, the remaining part of the Levites, who sprang from Merari, Levi's youngest son.

This was the order of the Israelites encamping; and in like manner, the method of their marching was thus,—Whenever they were to decamp, which always was when the pillar of cloud was taken up from the tabernacle, the trumpet sounded, and upon the first alarm, the standard of Judah being raised, the three tribes which belonged to it set forward; whereupon the tabernacle was immediately taken down, and the Gershonites and the Merarites attended the wagons, with the boards and staves of it. When these were on their march, a second alarm was sounded, upon which the standard of Reuben's camp advanced with the three tribes under it; and after them followed the Kohathites bearing the sanctuary, which, because it was more holy, and not so cumbersome as the pillars and boards of the tabernacle, was not put into a wagon, but carried upon their shoulders. Next followed the standard of Ephraim's camp, with the three tribes belonging to it; and last of all, the other three tribes under the standard of Dan brought up the rear.

After that the Israelites had, for some time, continued in ease and rest, not far from the skirts of Mount Sinai, the pillar of the cloud gave them a signal to decamp; but they had not marched above three days into the wilderness, before they began to complain of the weariness of their journey, and to murmur against God; which so provoked him, that he^c sent down fire, and destroyed the loiterers, and such as were found in the extreme parts of the camp; so that though, upon Moses' intercession, the fire ceased, the place never-are indeed the four most perfect animals, forasmuch as the lion is the most noble among wild beasts; the ox among beasts of labour; the eagle among birds; and the man among all other creatures.—Lamy's Introduction, b. 1.

^c The fire which God sent upon the Israelites, came either immediately from heaven like lightning, or did issue from the pillar of the cloud which went before the tabernacle; or, according to the conjecture of a learned commentator, that which is here called fire, might be a hot burning wind, in these desert places not unusual, and many times very pestifential, and on this occasion preternaturally raised in the rear of the army, to punish the stragglers, and such as, out of a pretence of weariness, lagged behind.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

theless obtained the name of Taberah, which signifies burning.

This fresh instance of the people's stubbornness made Moses apprehensive, that though he had certainly eased himself, in some measure, by constituting such magistrates as Jethro his father-in-law had advised him to; yet the work of governing so numerous, and so mutinous a people, would still be an overmatch for him; and therefore, by God's immediate direction, ^a he made choice of seventy of the chief of the elders of the people, men of renown for their wisdom and integrity, and every way fit to be erected into a supreme court.

To these God imparted a portion of the same spirit that he had given unto Moses, which enabled them to be highly assistant to him in the government of a people, which almost every day were discovering a spirit of discontent. For no sooner were they removed from Taberah, but they began to murmur at the manna they had so long ate, and to regret the flesh-pots of Egypt they had parted with; and hereupon they beset Moses' tent on all sides, and in a tumultuous manner demanded of him a supply of flesh, instead of manna; which, how unreasonable soever it was for them to request, God nevertheless promised Moses to perform; and accordingly caused the south wind to arise, which drove vast quantities of quails from the sea coast to within a mile of the camp where they lay, about a yard thick upon the ground. But while they were regaling themselves with these dainties, the anger of the Lord fell upon them, and smote a great number of them with a sore disease, whereof they suddenly died; in memory of which the place came to be called Kibroth-Hattaavah, that is, the graves, or sepulchres of lust and concupiscence.

From this place the people took their journey to Hazeroth, where another unhappy accident befell them. For Aaron and his sister Miriam, observing what great power their brother Moses had with the people, and that God chiefly made use of him in the delivery of his oracles to

^a It may be supposed, indeed, that Moses had no occasion for any more assisting magistrates after what had been constituted by the advice of Jethro, his father-in-law; but it is highly probable, that those of Jethro's advising were appointed to hear and judge only in smaller causes; whereas all weighty and difficult points, as well as last appeals in smaller matters, still were left upon Moses; and that it was to ease himself of this burden, that he made choice of these seventy, as men of superior capacity and understanding, and who were to be assisted by the Spirit of God in their judgments and determinations. This assembly of the seventy elders, not only the Jews, but even Grotius, and some other Christians, will needs have to be the same with that famous council which afterwards obtained the name of SANHEEDRIM. The rabbins have left no stone unturned to prove, that the Sanhedrim did constantly subsist ever since its first institution by Moses, and that the members of it always assembled themselves before the tabernacle, wherever that was set up, either in the wilderness, or in the promised land, till the erecting of the temple by Solomon, who, at the same time, built them a stately room or hall to convene in. They add farther, that this supreme court was continued in Babylon, during their captivity there, and that, at their return, it had the same place rebuilt in the second temple, and so continued till its total extinction under the Romans. But as they bring no authority for these, and many other particulars relating to this assembly, but merely their own traditions, they are justly rejected by the major part of Christians, who can find no footsteps of any such high court, either in the times of Joshua, of the Judges, or of the Kings, nor indeed after the Babylonish captivity, till the time of the Maccabees.—Calmel's Dissertation sur la police des Anciens Hebreux; and Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

them, began to envy him; but to give some colour to their quarrel, they pretended to fall out with him upon account of his marrying a foreigner, whom they called in contempt an Ethiopian. This Moses could not but perceive; but as it was a personal pique, he took no notice of it. God, however, would not suffer it to go off so; and therefore calling Moses, Aaron, and Miriam before the door of the tabernacle, he sharply rebuked the two latter. He gave them to understand the disparity ^b in point of divine revelation, between them and him, and, to leave a brand upon their contumaciously affecting an equality, he immediately smote Miriam ^c with a leprosy; and though, upon Moses' intercession, he promised to remove it, yet because the offence was public, he ordered her to be turned out of the camp for seven days, in the manner of any common leper, that others might be deterred from the like seditious practices. After several encampments, the people came at length to ^d Kadesh-Barnea, on the frontiers of Canaan, where Moses was commanded to choose twelve fit men, out of each tribe one, among whom were Joshua and Caleb, to take a view of the country: and accordingly, having received their instructions from him, to examine diligently into the strength of its cities and inhabitants, the nature and fer-

^b The Jewish commentators make the difference between Moses and other prophets, to consist in these particulars: 1st, That God spake to others by a mediator, that is, as they explain it, by some angel; but to him by himself, without the intervention of any other. 2dly, That they never prophesied, but their senses were all bound up, either in visions or in dreams; whereas he was perfectly awake as we are, when we discourse one with another. 3dly, That after the vision was over, they were oftentimes left so weak and feeble, that they could scarce stand upon their feet, (as appears from Dan. viii. 18;) whereas Moses spake with the divine Majesty without any consternation or alteration. And 4thly, That no prophet but he could know the mind of God when he pleased, because he communicated himself to them only when he thought proper; whereas Moses might at any time have recourse to God, to inquire of him, and receive an answer.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c A leprosy, as well as all other distempers, such as the scurvy, ring-worm, itch, &c., which bear resemblance to it, does proceed originally from a previous ill disposition both in the blood and juices, but the more immediate cause of it is an infinity of small imperceptible worms, that insinuate themselves between the flesh and skin, which first prey upon the scurf-skin and then upon the inner skin, and afterwards upon the extremities of the nerves and muscles, from whence arises a total corruption of the whole mass of blood, and all the other symptoms attending it. But the leprosy here inflicted upon Miriam was sudden and instantaneous. The juices of her body were not corrupted by a gradual decay, but turned at once into these corroding animals. And as this was a fit punishment for her pride and detraction, so by its being inflicted on her, and not on Aaron, it seems not improbable that she was first in the transgression, and drew Aaron, who seems in some instances to be a person of too much facility, over to her party. Aaron indeed, by his office, was appointed to judge of leprosy, which he could not have done had himself been infected with it; and as he was lately consecrated his high priest, God, for the preservation of his authority, might not think it proper to make him so soon become vile and contemptible in the eyes of the people, as this distemper was known to make men.—Calmel's Dissertation sur la Nature, &c., de la Lepre; and Patrick's Commentary.

^d Most commentators and geographers are of opinion, that whatever is said of Kadesh, in the travels of the Israelites, is to be understood of one and the same place; whereas the sacred history plainly makes mention of two places, of the same name, one adjoining to the wilderness of Paran, which is mentioned Num. xiii. 26, and the other lying in the wilderness of Sin, mentioned in Num. xx. 1, and xxxiii. 36.—Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

tility of its soil, and the like, they set out upon their progress, and finished it in forty days.

At their return they passed through a valley, which, for its fertility in vines, is called the valley of Eshcol, which signifies a cluster of grapes; and here they cut down a branch with but one cluster upon it, which, ^a by reason of its immoderate largeness, as well as to preserve the grapes from being bruised, they hung upon a pole, and carried between two men's shoulders. Nor was this the only product of that happy soil: the golden fig, and beautiful pomegranate, adorned the trees, and a variety of other fruits, of which they brought samples along with them, loaded the luxuriant branches.

Being at length happily arrived in the camp, they went and made their report to Moses and Aaron, in the presence of the elders, and of all the people. They began indeed with extolling the riches of the land, and showed them a specimen of some of the fruits which it produced; but when they perceived that this account had fired the people with a desire to become the happy possessors of it by a speedy conquest, ten of them then began to alter their tone, and to represent it as a thing impossible, both by reason of the strength of its fortified towns, and the valour and gigantic stature of its inhabitants.

Joshua and Caleb were the only two that remained true to their report, and gave them all imaginable encouragement that the enterprise was practicable; but the cowardly account of the other ten had got such a powerful possession of them, that they cried out, one and all, that they could never hope to overcome such powerful nations, in comparison of which they looked upon themselves as mere grasshoppers and reptiles; and their murmuring, in short, grew to such a height by the next morning, ^b that a return to Egypt was thought more advisable, than to face such an enemy. Nay, in the hearing of Moses and Aaron, of Caleb and Joshua, who endeavoured to dissuade them all they could, even to the hazard of being stoned by them, they were deliberating upon a proper person to reconduct them into the land of their former thralldom; when, all on a sudden, the glory of God appeared in a brighter lustre than ordinary, in the tabernacle, and from thence was heard to speak to Moses in such threatening terms as gave the people cause to fear that some speedy and terrible judgment would be the reward of their rebellion and ingratitude.

Here Moses was forced again, as at several other times, to become their intercessor, and made use of such powerful arguments, and expostulations, as did in some measure avert the divine vengeance; but, as their ingratitude and infidelity were become intolerable, notwithstanding God's constant care in providing against their wants, screening them from their enemies, and preserving them from all dangers, he solemnly declared, that none of that generation, above twenty years of age, except ^c Joshua and Caleb, who received his commendations for their fidelity, should enter into the promised land, but should wander from place to place in the wilderness, for the space of ^d forty years; and as for the false spies, the immediate authors of this rebellion, they were all destroyed by a sudden death, ¹ and became the first instances of the punishment denounced against the whole nation.

This severe punishment, joined with the sentence of exclusion from the promised land, gave the humours of the people soon another turn: for, supposing that their forwardness now would make some atonement for their former cowardice, they assembled themselves together next morning, and offered to go upon the conquest. Moses endeavoured what he could to dissuade them from so rash an enterprise, by telling them that it was contrary to God's express command, and therefore could not prosper; that, by their late undutiful behaviour, they had forfeited his assistance and protection, without which it was impossible for them to succeed; and that, as the Amalekites and Canaanites had gained the passes of the mountains before them, there was no fighting them

Num. xiv. 36, 37.

^a That there are vines and grapes of a prodigious bigness in those eastern and southern parts of the world, is a matter recorded by several writers. Strabo tells, that in Margiana, and other neighbouring countries, there were vines so very thick about, that two men could scarce fathom them, and that they produced bunches of grapes of two cubits long. Pliny informs us, that in the inland parts of Africa there are bunches of grapes bigger than young children. Olearius, in his travels into Persia, acquaints us, that not far from Astracan, he saw vines which a man could hardly grasp with both his arms, and a cluster which produced three Scotch gallons of wine; and the learned Huetius affirms that in Crete, Chios, and other islands in the Archipelago, there are bunches of grapes from ten to forty pounds in weight.—Quæst. Hist. b. 2., and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^b Though they might in their raging fits speak of returning into Egypt; yet it is an amazing thing, that they should continue in their madness, and deliberate about it, may actually appoint them a leader, as Nehemiah (ix. 17.) says they did. For how could they get thither without food, which they could not expect that God would send from heaven, when they had thus shamefully forsaken him? How could they hope to find their way, when the cloud which directed them was withdrawn from them, or think of coping with such nations as would oppose their passage, in case they should hit upon the right way? And after all, if they came into Egypt, what reception could they expect from a people, whose king, and princes, and first-born had lately been destroyed upon their accounts? Nothing can be said in answer to these questions, but that outrageous discontent infatuates men's minds, and will not suffer them to consider any thing but that which grieves them.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c Josephus introduces Joshua and Caleb, in order to pacify the tumultuous people, delivering themselves in words to this effect. "How is it possible for you, good people, to distrust the veracity and goodness of God, and at the same time to give credit to stories and amazements about the land of Canaan, that are propagated on purpose to abuse you? Why should not you rather believe and follow those who have taken so much pains to put you into the possession and enjoyment of the blessings you desire? What is the height of mountains, or depths of rivers, to men of undaunted spirits, and of honourable resolutions; especially when God is both their protector and defender? Wherefore let us advance and attack the enemy, without ever questioning the event. Only trust God for your guide, and follow us where we shall lead you."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 3. c. 14.

^d Moses here makes use of a round number, in allusion to the forty days of the spies searching the land; though it is plain, that the children did enter into the land of Canaan in less than thirty-nine years after this sentence was pronounced against their fathers. The truth is, Moses reckons the time past since they came first into the wilderness, which was a year and a half; so that the meaning of the sentence is,—That they should wander for forty years in all, before they went out of the wilderness; which, however, is not to be understood so precisely, as to want nothing at all of it: for since they came out of Egypt on the 15th day of the first month, and arrived in Canaan, and pitched their tents in Gilgal, on the tenth day of the first month, of the one and fortieth year after their departure out of Egypt, (Josh. iv. 19.) it is plain, that there wanted five days of full forty years.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.; and Patrick's Commentary.

upon the par. But all this admonition had no weight with them, notwithstanding the ark of the covenant went not with them, notwithstanding Moses their general was not at the head of them, yet out they marched to the top of the mountains, where the enemy surprised, defeated, and having slain many of them, pursued the rest as far as Hornah.

While the people continued in the wilderness, many remarkable occurrences befell them, and seditions almost innumerable were daily fermenting; but one in particular was hatched, with the utmost deliberation, in the breast of one of the chiefs of the tribe of Levi, and countenanced by some of the most considerable men in the whole camp.

^a Korah, the great grandson of Levi by his father Jahar, and consequently one of the heads of that tribe, impatient to behold Aaron and his family raised to the highest office in the priesthood, to which he thought himself had an equal title, was always caballing against him, until he had drawn a considerable number of eminent persons into his interest, and among these, Dathan, Abiram, and On, who were heads of the house of Reuben. As soon as things were ripe for an open rupture, Korah appeared at the head of the faction, and publicly upbraided Moses and Aaron with an unjust ambition, in usurping upon the liberties of the people, in engrossing all power into their own hands, and excluding every body else.

Surprised at the boldness of this accusation, Moses, for concern, fell prostrate upon his face; but when he rose again, he desired that the determination of their controversy might be left to God, and for that purpose appointed them to appear on the morrow at the door of the tabernacle, with every man his censer in his hand: and then addressing himself to Korah, and the rest of the Levites, he put them in mind of their ingratitude and arrogance, in not being content with the dignity and privileges which God had annexed to their tribe, without aspiring at the high priesthood, which he had reserved to Aaron and his posterity.

Dathan and Abiram were at some distance when Moses thus talked with the rest; and therefore supposing that they had been drawn into the conspiracy by Korah's insinuations, he sent privately to them, with a design to argue the case more calmly with them; but instead of a civil answer, he received a laughtful message, wherein ^a At what time, or in what encampment this rebellion of Korah and his adherents happened, the sacred history has not informed us; but as the general opinion is, that the cause of the mutiny was his resentment upon the advancement of Aaron and his family to the office of the high priest; so we find Josephus introducing him, as addressing himself to his accomplices in words to this purpose: "A scandal it is, and a thing not to be endured, for Moses to take upon him at this rate; to carry on his ambition thus, under the mask of holiness and religion, and by that means to raise himself a reputation to the wrong of other men. He gave lately the priesthood, and other dignities, to his brother Aaron, without any right or colour for it. No consent of the people was asked, nor any pretence of authority produced, save only his own arbitrary will and pleasure—for what has he to say for himself for so doing? If God has annexed the honour to the tribe of Levi, I myself may pretend a right to the preference, being of the same stock with Moses, and his superior both in riches and years: or if it be to pass by seniority, it belongs to the tribe of Reuben, viz. to Dathan, Abiram, and Phalt, who are the seniors of that tribe, and men of eminent credit every way among them."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 1, c. 2.

they upbraided him with a non-performance of his promise, and "that he had decroyed the whole nation from the rich and fertile land of Egypt, under the pretence of bringing them into a much better, but instead of that, had only detained them in a barren wilderness, there to domineer and tyrannize over them." At which message Moses was so highly provoked, that he appealed to God against the injustice of it, and at the same time requested of him not to regard the prayers and offerings of such ungrateful wretches.

Early next morning, Moses and Aaron went towards the tabernacle, whither Korah, at the head of his party, with each man a ^b censer in his hand, attended with a vast promiscuous multitude, which came in all probability to be spectators of this famous contest, failed not to repair. The first thing that drew their eyes was the amazing splendour which issued from the cloud over the tabernacle, from which God called to Moses and Aaron to withdraw from that rebellious crew, lest they should be swallowed up in the destruction which he was going to bring upon them. Hereupon Moses having first requested of him not to slay the innocent with the guilty, advertised the people, if they consulted their own safety, to separate themselves from the company of these wicked men; and then bespake the assembly to this purpose:—"That if these rebels died in the common way of nature, he would give them leave to call in question his divine mission; but that if the earth did immediately open itself in a miraculous manner, and swallow them up alive, he then hoped that they would look upon him only as an instrument in God's hand, and sufficiently authorized for all he did." And no sooner had he ended these words, but the earth clave asunder under their feet, and swallowed them up alive, together with their families, and all their substance; while at the same time, Korah, and his company, who stood with their censers before the court of the tabernacle, were all destroyed by a miraculous fire from heaven; and to perpetuate the memory of this judgment, as well as to deter, for the future, any but the sons of Aaron, from presuming to burn incense before the Lord, Eliezar was ordered to gather up the censers of the dead, and to have them beat into broad plates for a covering of the altar.

So terrible a punishment, one would think, might have been sufficient, for some time at least, to have kept the Israelites within the bounds of their obedience; but no sooner were they recovered from their fright, than they began to murmur afresh, and to accuse Moses and Aaron for having 'murdered the people of the Lord,' as they were not ashamed to call that seditious crew. Moses and Aaron were well aware of the unruly temper of the people, and therefore fearing to what degree of madness

^b The 250 princes had not as yet offered any incense, because they were prevented by death; however, it may be presumed, that they had lighted their censers at the holy fire, by which they obtained, at least in the opinion of the people, a kind of consecration; and therefore, to keep up among them a reputation and esteem for things consecrated, as well as to show the difference between his own institution and men's contrivances, God ordered all these brazen censers to be wrought into broad plates, and to cover the altar with them; that being polished bright, they might by their lustre put the people in mind of the offence of those who were once owners of them, and so caution others against the like offence.—Hawell's History of the Bible, b. 2.

and outrage they might proceed, they took sanctuary in the tabernacle; where they had no sooner entered, but God threatened to destroy all the rest of the congregation, as it were, in a moment, and had already sent out a plague amongst them; which Aaron, at his brother's directions, endeavoured to assuage by his interposing, with a censer of incense, between the dead and the living; but the plague, in this short time, had raged so violently, that no less than fourteen thousand and seven hundred persons, besides those that perished in the sedition of Korah and his company, were carried off by it.

This was enough, in all reason, to establish the authority, civil and ecclesiastical, in the hands of the two brothers: however, to put Aaron's claim beyond all manner of dispute, God was pleased to confirm it by one miracle more. Aaron, on the one side, and the heads of every tribe on the other, were ordered to bring each man his rod, with their respective names written upon them, and these were to be deposited in the tabernacle, until the next morning; by which time God would decide in favour of that family on whose rod some miraculous change should be seen. Accordingly, when they came to examine them next morning, ^a Aaron's rod alone was found not only to have budded, but blossomed likewise, and brought forth ripe almonds; in memory of which remarkable decision, God ordered the rod to be laid ^b

^a Some will needs have this rod of Aaron's to have been the same with that of Moses, wherewith he wrought so many miracles in Egypt and at the Red Sea; but there is this argument against them, that the miracle of its blossoming had not been a sufficient conviction to the Israelites, if so be that Aaron's rod had not been of the same kind of the rest. For whatever had come to pass, they might have ascribed it to the singular quality and virtue of the rod, especially had it been Moses' wonder-working rod, and not to the special hand of God interposing to establish the authority of Aaron; whereas, on the contrary, we find that the miracle had its intended effect, and silenced for ever the pretences of other people to the priesthood. It is presumed therefore by some learned men, that the rods which the several princes brought Moses, were neither their common walking staves, nor any such wands as were a badge of their power and authority in their respective tribes, but rather certain twigs that were cut of from some almond-tree, and not improbably from one and the same tree, that there might be no manner of difference between them. The difference, however, next morning, appeared in this:—That on the twig which bore Aaron's name, there was, in some places, an appearance of buds coming forth; in others, the buds were opened, and shot forth into blossoms; and in others, the blossoms were knotted, and grown into almonds.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^b It is made a matter of some inquiry, whether this rod of Aaron's was put within the ark of the covenant, or only by it. God commanded Moses to put it only in the tabernacle (Num. xvii. 1) to be preserved there; but St Paul in Heb. ix. 1, says, that it was placed within the ark, with a pot of manna, and the tables of the law. Others affirm, that it was not put within, but only by the side of the ark; and for their opinion they allege a passage in 1 Kings viii. 9, which seems to intimate, that there was nothing in the ark but the tables of the law; but then their adversaries contend, that St Paul, in that passage to the Hebrews, is to be understood literally; that there could be no hindrance for its being put into the ark, since the ark was five feet long, and could not be but of capacity enough to hold it; and therefore, when the Scripture says, that there was nothing in the ark but the tables of the law, they conceive that it may be understood with this limitation,—That nothing else was originally in it, because the ark was primarily intended for that use: but this need not hinder but that afterwards other things likewise might be put in it. How long this wonderful rod continued in this repository, is nowhere mentioned in Scripture. When the ark up in the 'ark of the covenant,' and gave an express prohibition, that none but the sons of Aaron should presume to come into the tabernacle, under pain of death.

CHAP. II.—Objections Answered and Difficulties Obviated.

In this state of our infirmity, indeed, we are obliged to repair the gradual decays of our bodies with a supply of daily food; but in that of a greater perfection, there will be no occasion for these weak supports of human nature. In the mean time we are assured, that ¹ 'man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God,' by whose command our natural perspiration may be so shut up, and the instruments of our digestion so retarded, as to make a small quantity of meat subsist us for a considerable time. Elijah, we read, had ² but 'a cake baked on the coals, and a cruse of water' for his whole repast, even when he was going to undertake a long journey; and yet we find, that both under the fatigue of body, and expense of spirits, which travelling must necessarily occasion, he was enabled to 'go in the strength of that meat forty days and forty nights.' And for the like reasons we may suppose, that Moses being now received within the cloud on Mount Sinai, might find no uneasy cravings of appetite during his stay, and long conversation with God.

The Jews have a proverb, with relation to this long fasting of his, ³ which tends to this purpose, that above, where there is neither eating nor drinking, Moses staid eighty days, namely, at two different times, and became like the angels; and below, where men do eat and drink, ministering angels come down and eat and drink like them." Whereby they seem to impute this alteration of appetite in both to a change of climate, rather than a miracle. But whether the climate contributes to it or no, it is certain, that God, by influences and emanations from himself, can support a man as long as he thinks fit, and keep up his spirits in their just height, without the common recruits of any kind of aliment.

It is another notion of the Jews, ⁴ that as eating and drinking are actions which prejudice the understanding, God, who intended to prepare his servant for the reception of the revelations he was going to communicate, withheld all meat and drink from him, that by depressing his bodily faculties he might exalt his intellectual. In the case of Daniel, it is certain, that in order to dispose him for the heavenly vision, ⁵ 'he did eat no pleasant bread, neither came flesh or wine in his mouth, for three whole weeks together,' as himself testifies; and therefore, considering the many wonderful things which God intended to impart to Moses, there seems to be a propriety at least, if not an absolute necessity, of his being was brought into Solomon's temple, (1 Kings viii. 9.) there is no notice taken of it; and yet it seems reasonable to think, that it should have been preserved for some considerable time, and preserved in that very verdure, wherein it now appeared, with its buds, blossoms, and fruit, for the conviction of posterity.—Coburn's Dictionary, under the word Rod.

St Paul is supposed to speak of himself, though modesty makes him conceal it, when he expresses his visions in these words:—¹ 'I knew a man in Christ, above fourteen years ago, (whether in the body I cannot tell, or whether out of the body, I cannot tell, God knoweth,) such an one caught up to the third heaven; and I knew such a man, (whether in the body, or out of the body I cannot tell, God knoweth,) how he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words which it is not lawful, or, as the marginal note has it, 'not possible for man to utter.' Now wherever the divine presence is, there is paradise, and there is heaven: and therefore, if St Paul, when he was in a vision, and thought himself translated to the regions above, in the contemplation of the wonderful things he saw and heard there, lost all sense of his body, and perception of its affections; why may we not suppose, that the joy and ecstasy wherewith Moses was transported, upon the like occasion, made him never think of once eating or drinking?

A man must be a stranger to deep study and meditation, who has not experienced in himself a total forgetfulness for some time, not only of the nimble minutes, as they passed away, but of the necessities of nature likewise, as they came upon him; and even found, at length, that his recollection, and sensation of these things, proceeded from an imbecility of his mind, which was not able to endure a continued intention, or stretch of thought, more than any natural call, which seems to have been suspended as long as his superior faculties were thus agreeably employed. With much more reason, therefore, we may conclude, that in the presence of God, where the mind might be impregnated with a power to sustain the fatigue of close perpetual thinking, the variety of objects which presented themselves would be so great, and the entertainment of its intellectual faculties so very strong, as would quite absorb all corporeal desires and appetites.

Had Moses therefore been employed in no farther capacity, than barely in contemplating the many amazing wonders of God's infinite being, which the irradiations from his beatific presence must have transfused upon his mind, this had been enough to suspend all other operations, and engross, as it were, the whole complex of his faculties. But besides this, the Scripture informs us, that ² he took a review of the model of the tabernacle, and its furniture, which God had showed him when he was with him before, and, as we may suppose, received fresh instructions from God. This could not but take up some portion of his time; as most of the remainder of it seems to have been spent in ³ prayer and intercession with God for the people, that he would restore them entirely to his favour, and bring them, in his good appointed time, to their inheritance.

Upon the whole, therefore, it appears, that as Moses was in the presence of God all the while that he continued on the mount; had a full employ for his mind and thoughts during that time; and by the divine influence, had his spirits sustained in their proper height, and his animal part preserved without wasting; he could have no leisure to think of eating and drinking, or that, had he thought thereon, he could find in himself no call or occasion for it.

The word karav, which our translators have made shining, is by the Vulgate rendered cornutus, or horned; and from this misapplication of ideas, painters very probably have been induced to draw Moses with a pair of horns branching, as it were, out of his forehead; whereas the proper representation of him should be with a glory covering his head, in the manner that the saints are painted in the Roman church: for it is not improbable, that the hair of his head was interspersed with rays of light, at the same time that a certain beauteous lustre proceeded from his face, and dazzled the eyes of its beholders.

Moses was certainly in this, as well as many other things, an eminent type of our Saviour Christ, and the change of his countenance an emblem of our Lord's transfiguration upon the mount, when ⁴ 'his face (as the evangelist relates the matter) did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light.' In both cases, it was the glorious being ⁵ within the cloud, that transfused this radiant splendour around his Son and servant; but the reason why Moses, at his first time of being upon the mount, and conversing with God, did not contract this wonderful brightness, seems to be this,—That he had not then seen the divine Majesty in so great a splendour as he did now. He was obliged then to keep at a more awful distance from the tremendous throne of God, and not come within the circle of its refulgency; but now, upon his humble petition, God was pleased to vouchsafe him such a sight of his glory as his human nature could bear. So that, by being permitted to come within the circumference of it, he carried off, though unknown to himself, ^a such a beamy lustre from the divine refulgency as, like the lambent fires wherewith the poets adorn the temples of their heroes, played about his head and face, and there was permanent for some considerable time; for Moses being now to bring down the tables of the covenant from the mount, that the people might not suspect him of any fallacy or collusion, or think that his pretence to a correspondence with the Deity, as that of some subsequent lawgivers proved, was vain and fictitious, God was pleased to send along with him this testimony, as it were, of his having held communion with God. For the miraculous radiancy wherewith he was adorned, showed in what company he had been during his absence; confirmed his message to the people; and in every respect carried new credentials in it.

It may seem a little strange, indeed, why a people so immediately under the guidance of God, should every day stand in need of so many new credentials, and upon every little emergency, fall a murmuring and rebelling against the God of Israel, and his servant Moses. St

^a It was a custom amongst the ancient heathens, and probably derived from what here befall Moses, to represent the gods with a beamy glory around their heads, to carry rays about their heads, as Lucian De Deo Syria has it. And hence it was, that the Roman emperors, who were honoured as a sort of deities, were thus represented, as appears from the testimony of Pliny, among many more, who, in his panegyric to Trajan, makes the radiationis pavoribus cepit the subject of some banter.—*Paræsis. A. M. 2514. A. C. 1191; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3764. A. C. 1647. EXOD. xxxiv. 28—NUM. xviii.

Stephen, in quoting the prophet Amos, has let us into the cause of this people's frequent prevarications: 'O ye house of Israel, have ye offered to me slain beasts and sacrifices, by the space of forty years in the wilderness? Yea, ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch,^a and the star of your god Remphan, figures which ye made to worship them.' By Moloch, the learned are pretty well agreed, that we are to understand the image of the sun, and by Remphan, that of the planet Saturn; and that the worship of these idols was a common thing among the Israelites, in the time of their sojourning in the wilderness, is manifest from that passage of the prophet, where he introduces God thus complaining of the perverseness of that people: 'In the day that I chose Israel, and lifted up my hand unto the seed of the house of Jacob, to bring them forth out of the land of Egypt, unto a land that I had espied for them, flowing with milk and honey, then said I unto them, "Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes, and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt: I am the Lord your God." But they rebelled against me, and would not hearken unto me; they did not every man cast away the abominations of their eyes, neither did they forsake the idols of Egypt.' Nay, so far were they from forsaking the idols of Egypt, that we find them adopting strange gods from every other neighbouring nation, which occasioned that severe condemnation in God: 'I will set my face against that man, and will cut him off from among his people, because he hath given his seed unto^b Moloch, to defile my sanctuary, and to profane my holy name.' And if any one fail to punish this idolater, 'then will I set my face,' says God, 'against that man, and against his family, and will cut him off; and all that go a whoring after him, from among their people.'

Now, if idolatry was a practice which the Israelites retained, and in some instances improved, after their departure out of Egypt, there is great reason to presume that these idolaters were the very murmurers also who infected the camp with their infidelity. They might believe, because they saw so many manifestations of it, the residence of a God among them, but then it is not unlikely, that they thought of him, as most of the heathens thought of their gods, that he was a local and limited deity, who had done something for them indeed, but could not do all they wanted; who had brought them into the wilderness, but had not the power to conduct them into Canaan.

In this manner it is, that the Psalmist represents them reasoning with themselves. 'Shall this God of ours prepare us a table in the wilderness? He smote the stony rock indeed, that the water gushed out, and the streams flowed withal; but can he give bread also, and provide flesh for his people? Many of these miracles they saw wrought before their eyes; but then they might look upon Moses who did them,^c to be no more than a mere magician, though perhaps of a better sort than those of Egypt; and consequently might be apprehensive that upon every new turn and exigence, his art would fail him; and therefore having no better notions of God, and so gross a conception of their leader, it is no manner of wonder that they ran into murmuring and discontent, into riot and disorder, upon every little difficulty that pressed them.

Two times we find them complaining for the want of such food as they desired; once^d in the wilderness of Sin, a few days after their passage of the Red Sea, and again at the encampment^e of Kibroth-Hattaavah, not long after their departure from Mount Sinai; and at both of these times God thought proper to send them quails; not out of any destitution or scarcity of other provision, 'for^f all the beasts of the forest are his, and so are the cattle upon a thousand hills; he knows all the fowls upon the mountains, and the wild beasts of the field are in his sight,' but for this very reason,—that how willing soever he might be to supply his people's necessities, he had no design to pamper their appetites with a needless variety, or to multiply miracles without any just occasion. And therefore, as both these events happened in the spring, when quails, which are found in great quantities upon the coasts of the Red Sea, are accustomed to pass from Asia into Europe, God caused a wind to arise, which in their flight drove them towards the camp of the Israelites, and,^g as the eastern tradition has it, was so very violent, that it broke their wings, and made them fall at a convenient distance, and in proper condition to be taken up.

^a Thus the Seventy, from whom St Stephen took this passage in Amos, translate it; but the import of the Hebrew text is this, 'Ye have borne the tabernacle of your kings, and the pedestal (so the word Chimn signifies) of your images, the star of your gods, which ye read to yourselves.' So that it seems very probable that the LXX read Rephan or Revan, instead of Chimn or Chewan, and thereby mistook the pedestal for a god. Kircher, however, and Salmasius assert, that Kilon is Saturn; that his star is called Kiran among the Persians and Arabians, and that Remphan, or Rephan, signified the same thing among the Egyptians; and therefore they suppose, that the Septuagint, who made their translation in Egypt, changed the word Chimn into that of Remphan, because they had the same signification. Remphan is generally supposed to have been an Egyptian god; and Hammond, in his notes upon Acts vii. 43, is of opinion, that this was the name of a certain king of Egypt, who, after his death, was deified by his subjects; but of what make and figure the image of this idol was, or in what manner he was worshipped, we can nowhere learn.—Calmel's Dictionary, under the words Chimn and Remphan.

^b The rabbins assure us, that the idol Moloch, which was the same as Baal, the sun, or Lord of heaven, worshipped by all the people in the east, had its image made of brass, sitting upon a throne of the same metal, having the head of a calf, adorned with a royal crown, and his arms extended as it were to embrace any thing; but what the children's passing through the fire means, they are not so well agreed. Some of them are of opinion, that parents, in the worship of this idol, did not actually burn their children, but only caused them to leap through fire that was lighted before it, or to pass between two fires placed opposite to each other, by way of lustration; but the expressions of David are a little too strong to admit of this interpretation. For when he tells us, that 'they sacrificed their sons and daughters unto devils, and that they shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and daughters, whom they sacrificed to the idols of Canaan,' Ps. cvi. 37, 38, we cannot but infer, that they did actually murder their children in this execrable way. When any infants were to be sacrificed, the idol was made hot by kindling a great fire in the inside of it; and when it was heated to a most intense degree, the miserable victim was put into its arms, and soon consumed by the violence of the heat; but that the cries of the children might not be heard in their extremities, the people were wont to make a noise with drums and other instruments about the idol.—Calmel's Dictionary, and Dissertations.

That quails among us are very excellent food, cannot be denied; but the same tradition informs us, that these birds in Arabia Felix, do vastly surpass all others, and as our author expresses it, have neither bones, veins, nor sinews in them, that is, are very fat and tender, something like our fig-peckers and ortolans. And, therefore, though God refused to gratify their palates with a profuse variety of dainties, yet is there no fault to be found with his provision, since the food he sent them was delicious in its kind, and a whole year had now intervened between the former and latter flight of quails, to whet their appetites, and prevent any danger of being cloyed with the same dish.

Something, however, there was in their behaviour, which provoked God in this their latter, more than their former complaint for want of flesh, to punish them so severely. ¹ The desire of flesh for food is in itself but natural, and, absolutely speaking, far from being criminal, or provoking to the Author of nature, who created every appetite of man, as well as his understanding: but when this breaks out into murmuring, mutiny, and disorder, the case is then entirely altered. In the former of these cases, the people were in want of bread, and really pinched with hunger; but in the latter, they had bread from heaven in abundance, and may therefore be said to complain not out of need but wantonness. Their discontent in the former case was expressed, comparatively, in modest terms; but here their tone is, ² 'Who shall give us flesh to eat? We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely, the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick; but now our soul is dried away; there is nothing at all besides this manna before our eyes.' This same contempt of the manna, which God so miraculously sent from heaven, especially in persons so well instructed in the divine will, was such an instance of baseness and ingratitude, as justly deserved the punishment it met with.

In the former time of their complaining, God winked at their ignorance, and pitied their distress; he had not then given them his laws for the rule of their actions and appetites; and therefore, never looking to reap, where he had not sowed, he was not so extreme as to mark what they had done amiss; but after he had published his precepts from the holy mount, and many more instructions from the tabernacle, he then expected that their obedience should keep pace with their knowledge, and was more provoked at their backslidings than before, because they proceeded not from the ignorance of their minds, but the perverseness of their wills: for this was the true and the just cause of their ³ 'condemnation, that even when light was come into the world, they loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil.'

In the 11th chapter of the book of Leviticus, we have a catalogue of the beasts, fishes, and fowls, which God either permitted, or prohibited the Israelites to eat. From his first making choice of them, God's purpose was to distinguish them from other nations, and more especially from the Egyptians, among whom they had long lived, had contracted their manners, and were too tenacious of their customs; and therefore, in opposition to these, he enjoined them to eat such creatures as were worshipped in Egypt, which would be an effectual means to render the pretences of these sham deities contemptible; as, on the contrary, he ordered them to abstain from those that were held in the greatest delicacy among them. And because the Egyptians would have nothing to do with such animals as had hoofs and horns, the Jews were allowed to eat none but what parted the hoof, as well as chewed the cud.

It is to be observed farther, that in the very make and nature of some animals, there are certain qualities which prejudice mankind against them, and seem as it were to desecrate their use; that some, for instance, are monstrously big, others very ugly and deformed; some come from heterogeneous mixtures, others feed upon dead bodies, and to others most men have an inbred antipathy; so that, in the main, what the law forbade the Jews in this regard, was nature's aversion before: but then the question is,—Why the things which they were naturally averse to, and would have refrained without it, were made the matter of a divine interdiction?

Now, if we trace the history of this people, we shall find, that they had their seasons of affliction and scarcity as well as of prosperity and plenty. At the very time when these prohibitions were given them, they were travelling, and were to continue travelling for many years in a waste and barren desert, which being destitute of the conveniences, and necessaries of life, might tempt them to make experiment upon the flesh of some of those animals that they naturally abhorred, but upon this occasion, as they thought, might innocently make use of: and therefore, to set a stronger guard upon human nature, God thought proper to confirm this their innate aversion, by the sanction and establishment of laws, which were to last beyond the term of their continuance in the wilderness.

The truth is, this people, by their gross impieties, and prevarications with God, brought frequently upon themselves famines, and sieges, and other calamities, wherein they suffered very grievously. To pass by the famines, which happened ⁴ in Judea, ⁵ in the times of the Judges, and ⁶ in David's days; in the reign of Ahab there was ⁷ a dreadful one in Samaria, when an 'ass's head sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of doves' dung (it should be rendered pulse) for five pieces of silver; ⁸ and, what is more lamentable still, when mothers entered into compact about eating their own children. But the most tragical account of all, is that which their own historian has recorded of them, at the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, when wives snatched the necessaries of life from their husbands, children from their parents, and parents from their children; ⁹ when mothers were forced, for their own support, to defraud their infants of the little milk which was in their breasts, while the infants were dying in their arms for want of it; when hunger and necessity turned every thing into victuals, and, what is shocking to human nature but barely to think on, ⁹ made one Jewish lady of quality eat her own child.

Now the use that I would make of this melancholy part of their history, is this,—That as to God's presence, were present from everlasting all the wickednesses and rebellions of this people; so were those penalties and judgments which his infinite wisdom determined to be most suitable to them. For what method can be thought more proper to make an impression upon those that forsake God, than that he should forsake them, that is, so far at least, as to withdraw the succours of life from them? And considering his prohibition of certain animals for food under this view, it was certainly a kind and generous warning to his people, not to bring themselves, in consequence of these provocations, (which he foreknew, and against which he had so strictly cautioned them,) into such circumstances, as would oblige them either to forbear the very last means of sustaining life, or to break more of God's commandments than they had done before.

But there is a farther reason arising from the quality of animals, why God might enact a discrimination of meats, and that is,—to give his people therein a mystical system of morality. Thus the birds which were allowed to be eaten, the pigeon, the dove, the partridge, for instance, were either tame, or of gentle nature, feeding on grain or pulse; whereas all the species that lived on prey, and such as gorge themselves with flesh and blood, were utterly forbidden, thereby to bring into reputation justice and mercy, and moderation, and at the same time to discountenance the contrary disposition to rapine, oppression, and cruelty. It is a noted allegory, that in Homer, of Circe's changing Ulysses' friends into hogs. By Circe, the poet intends that we should understand sensual pleasures; by Ulysses, reason and discretion; and by his retinue, the inferior faculties and powers; and in like manner, the prohibition of swine's flesh, was designed to restrain the Jews from such lusts as war against the spirit, as pollute and debase human nature, like that creature's wallowing in the mire: for, as a learned author observes,¹ the Jewish law was more remarkably strict in its prohibitions of things that were sordid and slovenly; wherein it seems to have had an especial aim to the training and forming of a people that had lived uncultivated, by reason of their long slavery in Egypt, and their dirty work in clay and bricks, and an elegance and politeness of manners, as well as a detestation of all filthy and brutal lusts, 'that being set free from sin,' as the apostle expresses it,² 'they might glorify God in purity and holiness, both in their bodies, and in their spirits, which were his.'

The same apostle, in his epistle to the Hebrews, has informed us, 'that³ the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope, by which we draw nigh unto God, did.' The Jewish high priest was a type of our blessed Saviour, and his entrance into the holy of holies, of our Lord's ascension into heaven, after his resurrection. The sacrifices which were offered under the Levitical law, were previous representations of the death of Christ; and the redemption of mankind by the effusion of his blood was exhibited every day in the several oblations in the tabernacle: 'for if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer, sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh; how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God, purge the conscience from dead works, to serve the living God?' Now, besides the arguments which might be drawn from the grossness of the Jews' understanding, and their incapacity to receive a more spiritual dispensation, God might have this farther design in setting before them the mystery of man's redemption under such typical representations, namely, that thereby he might excite their industry, and give a fuller scope to the exercise of their faith. For that the faith, and hope, and other graces of the patriarchs and devout Jews, were more effectually proved by the exhibition of things ambiguous and obscure, than if they had been altogether opened in the fullest and plainest propositions, is a matter that can hardly be contested. To rest assured, that God would bring to pass what he had expressly and circumstantially foretold, showed indeed a sincere and true faith in general; but to be persuaded, that faint resemblances, and the remotest hints were pregnant with certainty and solidity, and would, in their proper time, be gloriously completed, how unintelligible soever they might be at present, was, if we may so call it, a special advance of heroic faith, and rendered their dependence and resignation as complete as possible. And accordingly the apostle, having enumerated several ancient worthies, who by faith extended their views, and looked upon the dispensation they were under, as no more than a system of types and shadows of the good things to come, concludes their character in the following manner: '⁵ And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise: God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made so perfect.' So that the Jewish religion and worship was, in some respects, adapted to the capacity and genius both of the learned and ignorant: of the ignorant, as being made up of pomp and show enough to attract their attention; and of the learned, as abounding with shadows and emblems of higher matters, enough to exercise their deepest contemplation.

What the sin of 'offering strange fire before the Lord was,' and upon what account it raised the divine indignation against Nadab and Abihu, the two sons of Aaron, will best appear by attending a little to the probable occasion of it. After the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priestly office, we are told, that a miraculous 'fire from the Lord,' that is, a fire which either came immediately down from heaven, or out of the cloud which covered the tabernacle, consumed the first victim which Aaron offered for a burnt-offering; that God had expressly commanded, that '⁶ the fire which was upon the altar should not be suffered to go out,' which, according to the consent of most interpreters, signifies, that the said miraculous fire which had confirmed the installation of Aaron and his sons after so surprising a manner, should be kept alive, and burning with the utmost care; and that, as at this very fire, Aaron was '⁷ required to light the incense which he offered to God in the most holy place, on the great day of expiation; so may we take it for granted, that the like injunction was imposed on the inferior priests, with relation to the incense which they were to offer every day before God in the holy place. We have indeed no mention made of such a law; but the history we are commenting upon gives us a strong presumption, that the use of this fire only was permitted; and therefore the words ¹ in the text, 'which he commanded them not,' is thought to imply an express prohibition of any other.

The crime then of Nadab and Abihu consisted in their kindling the incense, which their office of priests obliged them to offer every morning and evening, with fire different from that which was continually on the altar of burnt-offerings; and consequently different from what God ordered them to use. ² Other offences indeed have been laid to their charge. Some pretend, that they endeavoured to intrude into the most holy place, which was not permitted them to enter; because immediately after the recital of the manner of their death, Moses, in another place relates, that God commanded him to speak unto Aaron, ² 'That he should not come, at all times, into the holy place, within the veil, before the mercy-seat, that he died not;' but others insinuate, that they were guilty of intemperance, at the entertainment made at their installation, because after the account of their fatal end, Moses, by God's order, gives this injunction to Aaron, and the remainder of his sons: ³ 'Do not drink wine, nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die. It shall be a statute for ever through your generations, that ye may put difference between holy and unholy, between unclean and clean.' But these are no more than bare surmises, that have no proper foundation in the foregoing texts; nor is there any occasion to hunt out for passages to augment these offenders' crime.

Nadab and Abihu had not only been admitted, in common with the rest of their brethren, to the honour of the priesthood, which among the Jews was a dignity of no small esteem; but had particular motives which the others had not, to the observance of all God's commandments, as having had the privilege of seeing the symbols of the divine presence, on the formidable mount from whence his laws were promulged, without being consumed. The higher therefore their station was, and the more distinguishing the favours they had received, the more provoking was their affront, in attempting to adulterate an ordinance of God's institution. Common fire, they thought, might serve the purpose of burning incense, as well as that which was held more sacred: at least, in the gaiety, or rather naughtiness of their hearts, they were minded to make the experiment, even in opposition to the divine command, and therefore ⁴ it was just and requisite in God, especially in the beginning of the priesthood, and when one alteration of a divine precept might, in process of time, be productive of many more, to inflict an exemplary punishment, that others might 'hear, and fear, and not commit the like abomination.'

And for this reason, namely, the injection of terror into others, Moses is commanded to make no lamentation or funeral pomp for them; which among the Jews, who, of all other nations, were so very sumptuous in their obsequies of their deceased friends, was accounted a sore judgment. In the case of Jehoiakim the king of Judah, the commination of God is thought very terrible. ⁵ They shall not lament for him, saying, Ah! my brother, or ah! sister: they shall not lament for him, saying, ah! lord, or ah! his glory. He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn, and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.' Temporal judgments, however, are not always sure indications of the final condemnation of the persons on whom they fall; and therefore Aaron had no occasion utterly to despond: on the contrary, he might presume that the justice of God being satisfied with the present punishment of his sons, might be appeased with relation to their eternal state; and that though their ⁶ 'flesh was destroyed, yet their spirits might be saved in the day of the Lord.' He knew too, how much himself had offended in the matter of the golden calf, and might justly think, that God had called his sin to remembrance in the destruction of his two sons. He acknowledged, therefore, the righteousness of God, in all that he had brought upon him, and in the phrase of Scripture, ⁷ 'was dumb, and opened not his mouth, because it was the Lord's doing.'

What the occasion of the difference between Moses and his brother Aaron, and sister Miriam was, is not so very evident. The history indeed tells us, that ⁸ 'they spake against Moses, because of the Ethiopian or rather Arabian woman, whom he had married.' The generality of interpreters suppose this woman to be Zipporah, the daughter of Jethro, whom he married in Midian; for those who imagine her to have been another, can hardly get over this difficulty,—Why Moses should set so bad an example as to marry, at two several times, a foreigner, rather than one of the daughters of his people. The first time, indeed, that he did so, was when he lived in a state of exile, but was nevertheless kindly received in a family of the best distinction in the place, which might be inducement enough for his matching himself with one of the daughters, since no express precept against matches of this kind was then in force. But now that he was set at the head of a people, who were to be separated from the rest of mankind, and was conducting them into a country, with whose inhabitants they were to have no matrimonial intercourse, for fear of introducing idolatry, it would have been highly indecent and unpopular, an affront upon his own countrywomen, as well as a dangerous inlet to impiety, for him to have married into an idolatrous nation; nor would his brother and sister have been the only persons to clamour against him, but the whole congregation would have risen up in arms, upon so notorious a provocation. Since, therefore, we hear of no such commotion, we may reasonably conclude, that this Cushite, or Arabian woman, was the same Zipporah, whom he had married some forty years before. But then why they should quarrel with him upon her account, at this time, and no sooner, is the difficulty.

^a The author of the Connexion so often cited, supposes another kind of innovation to have been the occasion of their untimely death. God as yet, says he, had given no law for the offering of incense in censers: all that he had been commanded about it, was that Aaron should burn it upon 'the altar of incense' every morning and every evening; but these men took upon them to begin, and introduce a service into religion, which was not appointed, and which if it had been suffered, would have opened a door to great irregularities: and therefore God, by an exemplary judgment upon the first offenders, put an effectual stop to it.—Shuckford, vol. iit. b. 11.

Now, to resolve this, we must observe, that when Jethro, his father-in-law, was in the camp, it was by his advice that Moses¹ instituted judges to determine lesser causes; and that he found his son Hobab so very serviceable to him in the capacity of a camp-master-general, that ^a he earnestly entreated him to continue with him, and received him, no doubt, into great confidence. It is to be observed farther, that in the foregoing chapter, we have an account of the creation of the office of the seventy elders to assist in the administration, and that these elders were nominated by Moses, without ever consulting Aaron or Miriam. As therefore this story of their quarrelling with him is immediately subjoined, it seems very likely, that taking themselves to be neglected, in so great an alteration made in the government without their advice, they were very angry; but not daring to charge Moses directly, they fell foul upon his wife, giving her opprobrious names, and complaining to the people, very probably, that she and her brother had too much power and influence over Moses.

Josephus, in his Jewish history, makes no mention of this family difference, as thinking that it might reflect discredit upon his nation; but Moses was an author of more veracity than to conceal any action which was proper for mankind to know, even though it tended to the lasting disgrace of his own family. For he does not affect to aggrandize the thing, or to make his family appear more considerable, when he introduces God as arbitrating the difference between them; but purely to acquaint us, that as the Israelites lived then under a theocracy, God himself being their immediate King, undertook to decide the controversies depending upon such of his chief ministers as were not accountable to any other judge; nor was the divine Majesty any more debased in condescending to make this decision, than any earthly prince would be, by interposing his authority to determine a controversy between two of his great and powerful subjects.

^a Moses' words to Hobab are these: 'Leave us not, I pray thee, forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness, and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes.' (Num. x. 31.) But if the being which resided in the miraculous cloud was their guide, what need was there for Hobab's stay? Now the design of the cloud was to direct the people when to decamp and where to encamp again; but for the securing of their camp against all hostile force, they were left to human means; and therefore Hobab, having lived long a borderer upon the wilderness, was well acquainted with every part of it, and the better able to advise them, both whence to provide themselves with such things as they wanted, and how to secure themselves against any neighbouring powers that should attempt to assault them; and for these reasons Moses was so pressing for his staying with him; though the Septuagint understand the passage as if he desired him to continue to be what he had hitherto been in the wilderness, namely, a good adviser, like his father Jethro, and withal assured him, that he would look upon him as an elder.—Patrick's Commentary.

Moses indeed inserts a passage to show that the occasion of this family quarrel was not from him; that he was a man of a meek and peaceable disposition; and therefore not addicted to strife and contention, especially with those of his own kindred; and why might he not insert this, when it was no more than what was due to his character, and perhaps at that time necessary for his own vindication? St Paul, to clear himself from some aspersions which the malice of his enemies had cast upon him, enters upon his own commendation, though it be with some reluctance, and to give it a better gloss, tries all the powers of eloquence in working it up. ² 'Whereinsoever any is bold,' says he, 'I speak foolishly, I am bold also. Are they Hebrews? So am I. Are they Israelites? So am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? So am I. Are they ministers of Christ? I speak as a fool, I am more: In labours more abundant, in stripes above measure: In prisons more frequent: In deaths often.—In perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by my own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren: In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often; in hunger and thirst, in fastings often; in cold and nakedness; besides those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches.' These are the words of our apostle, setting off the faithful discharge of his ministry; and yet no one ever suspected the genuineness of this his epistle to the Corinthians upon that account: as little reason have we, therefore, to call in question the authenticity of this book of Moses, because we find a passage or two that speaks favourably of him.

That all historians, both ancient and modern, when they come to speak of the part and concern they had in such and such actions, are commonly accustomed to speak in the third person; and that the most modest man upon earth may sometimes see occasion to magnify his office, or vindicate himself, without deserving the imputation of vanity or arrogance, cannot be denied. Now, considering what share it was that Moses himself bore in the facts which he relates, and that the narrations, laws, and admonitions which he recorded, were not designed for that age only, but directed to all succeeding generations of the world; and withal considering, that the seditious and turbulent behaviour of his brother and sister at that time obliged him to justify and clear himself; there was no imaginable way more proper for him to express himself in, than that which he made use of, even had it been a matter of his own study and contrivance: but then, if we suppose that he wrote by divine inspiration, the commendation that is given of his natural lenity and good nature, must be looked upon rather as the Holy Ghost's testimony concerning Moses, than Moses' testimony concerning himself.

Though Moses was certainly a good-natured man, and therefore could not live long at variance with his brother Aaron, yet we can hardly suppose, that his love and affection for him would ever prevail with him to enter into any fraudulent measures, in order to raise him to the pontificate. The rod which gave Aaron the preference, was not, as we noted before, Moses' wonder-working rod, but, in all probability, one of the same tree from whence the princes of the other tribes cut theirs. All these rods, with the names of the several tribes engraved upon them, were delivered to Moses in the face of the whole congregation, and by him were instantly carried into the tabernacle: and that he did not palm upon the people, when his back was turned, and put an almond twig into the place of Aaron's rod, is evident from what is related of it, namely, that it had leaves, buds, blossoms, and ripe fruit upon it, all at one time, which no tree of any kind ever was known to have before.

Some of the vulgar, and less curious, might perhaps, at a cursory review, have been imposed upon by a sham appearance of these things painted on Aaron's rod; but Moses knew very well, that he had the heads of each tribe to deal with; men of sagacity and observation, and who were too nearly concerned in the experiment to let any pretence to a miracle go unexamined: and therefore we may very well imagine that when he brought forth all the rods the next morning, they surveyed every one very carefully, and made diligent search into the alteration which had passed upon that which belonged to Aaron; and had they found any deception in it, would have exposed the two brothers to contempt and ridicule, or rather have deposed them from all rule and power for the future, as a couple of vile and impious impostors. But instead of that, we find that this miracle silenced all cavils for ever after against Aaron and his family; confirmed the authority of Moses; and made the people, when he told them, that by God's appointment, he had laid up Aaron's rod to be a witness against them, that if they murmured any more, they should most certainly be destroyed, break out into this doleful complaint: ¹ "Behold we die, we perish, we all perish, and shall be consumed with dying:?" for they began now to believe God's threatenings, and to fear, that at one time or other they should experience some heavy and severe punishment, as by this new sign he had convinced them that they had justly deserved it.

Thus I have endeavoured to answer most of the material objections which have industriously been raised against the sacred history of this period; and were it any farther confirmation of its truth and authority, I might add, ² that the whole matter of Korah, how he rebelled against Moses, and made a defection among the people, for which he suffered the very judgment that the Scripture relates, was doubtless of standing tradition in the east, which the Mahometans have borrowed, and given us at second hand: that the consumption of Aaron's sacrifice, ³ "by the fire which came from the Lord," raised the report, "that, in ancient times, men did not kindle fire upon their altars, but called it down from heaven by prayer, and that the flame was produced by the deity to whom the sacrifice was offered: that the irradiation of Moses' face, when he came down from the mount, introduced the custom among the heathens, of adorning the images of their gods and heroes with a beamy glory about their heads: that the veneration paid to his wonder-working rod, established an usage which prevails almost every where, ⁴ for the great ministers of state to carry in their hands wands, as ensigns of their office, whenever they appear at court: and that the budding of his brother Aaron's rod, in all probability, gave rise to ⁵ the fable of Hercules' club, when left in the ground, striking root downward, and so reviving and repopulating. But I choose rather, in this place, to remark the great affinity between the divine and human laws, so far as they relate to what we call the decalogue, inasmuch, that whatever the ancient heathen lawgivers have enacted about these matters, seems little more than a transcript from the ten commandments, which Moses delivered to the Jews.

Thus the unity of God, and the folly of making any image of him, which constitute the two first commandments, was an ⁶ institution of Numa, which he took from Pythagoras, who maintained, that there was only one supreme Being, and that, as he is perfectly spiritual, and the object of the mind only, no visible representation can be made of him. The reverence of God's holy name, which is the subject of the third, was recognised by the heathens in all their solemn contracts, promises, and asseverations; and for this reason Plato, in his book de Legibus, acquaints us, that "it is ⁷ an excellent lesson, to be very cautious and tender, in so much as mentioning the very name of God." The setting apart one day in seven, and the observation of it for religious purposes, was a practice so general in the pagan world, that, according to Philo, this seventh day was truly called Ἡραρτή πανδημοῦς, or the universal festival, and by the Athenians, according to the laws then in force, was observed with the utmost strictness, and such as admitted of no servile work. The honour and respect due to parents was secured by that excellent law made by Solon, which declares, ⁸ "that if any one strike his parents, or do not maintain them, and provide them a dwelling, and all things necessary, let him be utterly disregarded, and banished from all civil society." The prohibition of murder is confirmed by the laws of Athens, which make its punishment capital, when wilfully committed: banishment, when by chance medley: and for every main designedly given, imposes both a confiscation of goods, and a proscription from the city where the injured person dwells. The prohibition of adultery was sufficiently enforced by Solon, when he left the guilty persons, when deprehended in the fact, to the mercy of the injured husband, who, if he suffered them to escape with their lives, had license to handle the man very roughly, ⁹ and to divorce the woman, who for her crime was excluded from all places of public concourse, and reduced below the condition of a slave. The prohibition of theft was supported by a law of Draco's, which made felons of what denomination soever lose their lives for their crime; but this being thought too severe, Solon's institution was, that every petty larceny should be punished with double restitution, and sometimes imprisonment, but every greater robbery, to the value of fifty drachms, with death. The prohibition of false witness was,¹ ratified by the Athenian laws, which not only punished the offenders with fines, confiscation of goods and banishment, but degraded them likewise from all dignity, as persons extremely ignominious, and who, according² to the law of the twelve tables, deserved to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock. The prohibition of covetousness of all kinds, which is the tenth and last commandment, nowhere occurs in the edicts of any ancient legislator; for, as³ a pious bishop well observes, "all the laws that were ever made by our governors upon earth, respected only the words and actions, or the outward carriage and behaviour of their subjects. None ever offered to give laws to the minds or hearts of men, what they should think, or love, or desire, or the like; and it would have been ridiculous and absurd to have done it, because they could never have known whether such laws were observed or no;" so proper is the question, which their great lawgiver puts to the Jews,⁴ "What nation is there so great that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?" So just the commendation which the royal Psalmist gives of it: "The law of the Lord is an undefiled law, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, and giveth wisdom unto the simple. Moreover by them is thy servant taught, and in keeping of them there is great reward."

CHAP. III.—Of the Jewish Tabernacle, &c.

FROM the very first beginning of time, God had always some place appropriated to the solemn duties of religious worship.⁵ Even during the small space of his continuance in paradise, Adam had⁶ where to present himself before the Lord; and after his expulsion from thence, his sons in like manner, had⁷ whither to bring their oblations and sacrifices. The patriarchs, both before and after the flood, used⁸ altars, and⁹ mountains, and¹⁰ groves, for the self-same purpose. Here they had their proscuchæ, or places for prayer, which were certain plots of ground, encompassed with a wall, or some other enclosure, and open above. But since the first place of this kind, that made any considerable figure, was the tabernacle which God ordered Moses to erect in the wilderness, as an habitation for his majestic presence to reside in, it may not be improper, in this place, to give some account of it, and the other holy things appertaining to it.

The tabernacle was a tent covered with curtains and skins, but much larger than other tents. It was in the form of an oblong square, thirty cubits in length, and ten in height and breadth, and was properly divided into two parts, namely, the holy place, and the holy of holies.

The holy place was twenty cubits long, and ten wide, where stood the table of shewbread, the golden candlestick, and the altar of incense. The holy of holies, which was likewise called the sanctuary, was ten cubits long, and ten broad, contained the ark of the covenant, and was separated from the holy place by a veil, or hanging, made of rich embroidered linen, which hung upon four pillars of shittim or cedar wood, that were covered with plates of gold, but had their bases made of brass; and at the entrance of the tabernacle, instead of a door, there was a veil of the same work, sustained by the like pillars, which separated it from the outward court.

The boards or planks whereof the body of the tabernacle was composed, were in all forty-eight, each a cubit and a half wide, and ten cubits high. Twenty of them went to make up one side of the tabernacle, and twenty the other, and at the west end of it were the other eight, which were all let into one another by two tenons above and below, and compacted together by bars running from one end to the other; but the east end of it was open, and only covered with a rich curtain.

The roof of the tabernacle was a square frame of planks, resting upon their basis; and over these were coverings or curtains of different kinds. Of these the first, on the inside, was made of fine linen, curiously embroidered in various colours of crimson and scarlet, and purple and hyacinth; the next was made of goats' hair neatly woven together; and the last of sheep and badgers' skins, (some dyed red, and others of azure blue,) which were to preserve the rich curtains from wet, and to protect the tabernacle itself from the injuries of the weather.

Round about the tabernacle was a large oblong court, an hundred cubits long, and fifty broad, encompassed with pillars overlaid with silver, and whose capitals were of the same metal, but their bases were of brass. Ten of these pillars stood towards the west, six to the east, twenty to the north, and twenty to the south, at five cubits distance from each other; and over these hung curtains made of twined linen thread, in the manner of net-work, which surrounded the tabernacle on all sides, except at the entrance of the court, which was twenty cubits wide, and sustained with four columns, overlaid with plates of silver. These columns had their capitals and bases of brass; were placed at proportionable distances, and covered with a curtain made of richer materials.

In this court, and opposite to the entrance of the tabernacle, stood the altar of burnt-offerings in the open air, that the fire, which was kept perpetually upon it, and the smoke arising from the victims that were burnt there, might not spoil the inside of the tabernacle. It was five cubits long, as much in width, and three cubits high; was placed upon a basis of stone work, and covered both within and without with brass plates. At the four corners of this altar there was something like four horns, covered with the same metal, and as the altar itself was hollow, and open both at top and bottom, from these horns there hung a grate made of brass, fastened with four rings and four chains, whereon the wood and the sacrifice were burnt; and as the ashes fell through, they were received below in a pan. At a very small distance from this altar there stood on the south side, a brazen vessel, which, on account of its extraordinary size, was called the brazen sea, in which the priests were used to wash their feet, whenever they were to offer sacrifice, or to go into the tabernacle.

In that part of the tabernacle which was called the holy place, there was on the north side, a table made of Shittim or cedar wood, covered with gold, two cubits long, one in breadth, and one and a half in length. About the edge of it was an ornament, or border made of gold, together with a crown of gold in the middle, and at each end was placed the offering of the shewbread, namely, six loaves in a pile to represent the twelve tribes. The bread was changed every Sabbath-day, and not allowed to be eaten by any one but the priests.

Over against this table, on the south side, stood the candlestick, which was made of pure gold, upon a basis of the same metal, and had seven branches on each side, and one in the middle. These branches were at equal distances, adorned with six flowers like lilies, with as many knobs like apples, and little bowls like half almond shells, placed alternately; and upon each of these branches there was a golden lamp, which was lighted every evening, and extinguished every morning.

Between the table and the candlestick, was placed the altar of incense, which was but one cubit in length and breadth, and two cubits high; but was covered with plates of gold, and had a crown of gold over it. Every morning and evening, the priest in waiting for that week, offered incense of a particular composition upon this altar, and to this end carried a smoking censer, filled with fire, which he took from the altar of burnt-offerings into the tabernacle, and so placing it upon this other altar, retired.

The persons appointed to officiate about holy things were of three kinds, the high priest, priests, and Levites; and what is very remarkable, in the first of this order, is the singularity of his vestments, which were the breastplate, the ephod, the robe, the close coat, the mitre, and the girdle. The ephod, the robe, and the close coat were all of linen, and covered the whole body from the neck to the heel. Over these was a purple or blue tunic, which reached not so low, but was curiously wrought all over, and at the bottom of it had pomegranates, and bells, intermixed at equal distances. The pomegranates were made of blue, purple, and crimson wool, and ^a the bells of gold.

^a What the number of bells worn by the high priest was, the Scripture is silent, and authors are not so well agreed; but the sacred historian has let us into the use and intent of them in these words: 'And it shall be upon Aaron to minister; and his sound shall be heard when he goeth into the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh out, that he die not.' The kings of Persia are said to have the hem of their robes adorned, like the Jewish high priest, with pomegranates and gold bells. The ladies who are about his person, and whose business it is to please and divert him, have little gold bells fastened to their legs, their neck, and elbows, and when they dance, the sound of these make a very agreeable harmony. The Arabian princesses wear large hollow gold rings, which are filled with little flints, and make a sound like little bells when they walk; and besides these, they have abundance of little flat bobs fastened to the ends of their hair; which make a noise as often as they stir, and give notice that the mistress of the house is going by, that so the servants of the family may behave themselves respectfully, and strangers retire, to avoid seeing the person that is passing. It was therefore in all probability, with a design of giving notice, that the high priest was passing by, that he too wore little bells on the hem of his robe; or rather it was, as it were, a kind of public notice, that

The ephod was a kind of girdle, made of gold thread, and other threads of divers colours, which being brought from behind the neck, and over the two shoulders, was put cross upon the stomach; then carried round the waist, and brought back again about the body, did gird the tunic like a sash, and so fell down before, and hung as low as the feet. Upon that part of the ephod, which came upon the high priest's shoulders, were two large precious stones, whereon were engraven the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, on each stone six; and where the ephod crossed the high priest's breast, there was a square ornament, called the pectoral, or rational, wherein were twelve precious stones set, with the names of the twelve tribes engraven on them, on each stone one. The mitre was of fine flax; it covered the head; and on the forehead was a plate of gold, whereon were engraven these words, HOLINESS TO THE LORD, which was tied behind the head with two ribbons fastened to its ends.

These were the chief of the solemn ornaments which belonged to the high priest. The other priests had only a simple tunic, a linen mitre, and a girdle; but they all of them wore linen or cotton breeches, which covered their legs and thighs, and reached up to their waist. The Levites had no peculiar habit in the ceremonies of religion; but about the sixty-second year of Christ, they obtained of king Agrippa leave to wear a linen tunic, as well as the priests.

The high priest was at the head of all religious affairs, and the ordinary judge of all the difficulties which related to them. He only had the privilege of entering into the sanctuary once a year, which was on the day of solemn expiation, to make atonement for the sins of the whole people. The ordinary priests attended the service of the tabernacle: they kept up a perpetual fire upon the altar of burnt-offerings; lighted and extinguished the lamps of the golden candlestick; made the loaves of shewbread; offered them on the golden altar in the sanctuary; changed them every Sabbath-day; and every day, at night and morning, carried in a smoking censer of incense, and placed it upon the golden table, which, upon this account, was likewise called the altar of incense.

But the chief business of the priests was to offer sacrifices, of which there were four kinds. 1. The burnt-offering, which was totally consumed by fire upon the altar, after that the feet and entrails had been washed. 2. The peace-offering, whereof the inward fat, or tallow, made up with the liver and kidneys, was only burnt upon the altar; the breast and right shoulder was the perquisite of the priests, who were obliged to eat them in the holy place; and the remainder belonged to the person who offered the sacrifice. 3. The sacrifice for sin, committed either wilfully or ignorantly; and in this the priest took some of the blood of the victim, dipped hi he was going into the sanctuary; for as in the king of Persia's court, no one was suffered to enter the apartments, without giving notice thereof by the sound of something; so the high priest, out of respect to the divine presence, residing in the holy of holies, did, by the sound of little bells, fastened to the bottom of his robe, desire, as it were permission to enter, that the sound of the bells might be heard, and he not punished with death, for an unmannerly intrusion.—Cabnet's Dictionary under the word Bell.

finger in it, and sprinkled it seven times towards the veil of the sanctuary. The same parts of the victim were burnt on the altar in this as in the former sacrifice. The rest, if the sacrifice was offered for the sin of the high priest, or for the people, was carried without the camp, and there burnt; but if it was for a private person, the victim was divided, as we said before, between the priest and the offerer. 4. The sacrifice of oblation was either fine flour, or incense, cakes of fine flour, and oil baked, or the first-fruits of new corn. Oil, salt, wine, and frankincense went always along with every thing that was offered. All the frankincense was cast into the fire; but of the other things the priest only burnt a part, and the rest he reserved to himself.

Thus we have taken a cursory view of the Jewish tabernacle, and its utensils; of the Jewish priesthood, and its offices; and have nothing more to do, but to inquire a little for what ^a ends and uses God was pleased to institute these things. To this purpose St Paul informs us, that the Jewish law was an imperfect dispensation from the very first, and ¹ 'added only because of transgressions, until the seed should come, to whom the promise was made:' that in great condescension, it was adapted to the weakness of the Jewish people, whom he compares to an heir under a tutor or governor; for these are his words: ² 'I say then, that an heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all: Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage, under the elements of the world;' so that ³ 'the law was our schoolmaster, to bring us unto Christ,' and ⁴ 'having only a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, it could never, with those sacrifices which were offered, year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect.' In order therefore to illustrate this point, namely, that the Jewish religion was, in a great measure, intended to typify and prefigure the more perfect dispensation of the gospel, we shall instance in some of its particulars already enumerated.

Thus the tabernacle itself was a type of the Redeemer dwelling in our nature; for so St John tells us, that ⁵ 'the Word was made flesh, and ἐσκήνωσεν ἐν ἡμῖν, dwell among us,' as in a tabernacle. The altar of burnt-offerings in the court, pointed out the death and sacrifice ⁶ of our Lord, by the shedding of whose blood our sins are pardoned, and we received into mercy and favour. The altar of incense within the holy place denoted our Lord's powerful intercession for us, in his exalted state of glory; and the 'ark of the covenant in the holy of holies,' was an eminent emblem of him, from whose mouth we received a law, 'founded upon better promises;' by whose intercession we have access to the 'throne of grace with all boldness;' and whose satisfaction to the divine justice is our true propitiatory or mercy-seat.

What a manifest type the Jewish high priest was of our Lord and Saviour, the author to the Hebrews has declared in more instances than one. The Jewish high priest was the only man who was permitted to enter into the 'holy of holies;' and ⁷ 'we have such an high priest,' says the apostle, 'who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man.' The Jewish high priest offered a solemn expiatory sacrifice once a year; our Lord ⁸ 'appeared once in the end of the world to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.' After the expiatory sacrifice, the Jewish high priest went into the holy place, there to offer incense on the golden altar; our Lord, when he had purged our sins, ⁹ sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high, there ¹⁰ 'to appear in the presence of God,' and by the incense of his merits, to make continual intercession for us.

In like manner, whether we consider the several qualifications of the sacrifices under the law, or the several sorts of them, we shall find them to be types and prefigurations of Christ. The conditions of a Jewish sacrifice were,—That it should be without blemish, publicly presented before the congregation, substituted in the sinner's room, and the iniquities of the sinner laid upon him. With relation to these properties, our Saviour is said to be 'holy, harmless, undefiled, and separated from sinners.' That he might 'sanctify his people,' he is said 'to have ¹¹ suffered without the gate, bearing our reproach;' and that ¹² 'he, who knew no sin, became sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.'

And so, if we look to the several sorts of sacrifices appointed under the law, we shall soon perceive that these equally lead us to Christ. For he was the trespass-offering, in that 'he was made sin for us;' the peace-offering because ¹³ 'he made peace by the blood of his

^a Josephus, having treated of the tabernacle, and the several things appertaining to it, makes the use and design of them a little too mystical and allegorical. "Let but a man consider," says he, "the structure of the tabernacle, the sacerdotal vestments, and the holy vessels that are dedicated to the service of the altar, and he must of necessity be convinced, that our law-giver was a pious man.—For what are all these but the image of the whole world? The tabernacle consisting of thirty cubits, and being divided into three parts, whereof two are for the priests in general, and of free access, resembles the earth and the sea; while the third, where no mortal, except the high priest, is permitted to enter, is an emblem of heaven, reserved for God alone. The twelve loaves of shewbread upon the table, signify the twelve months in the year. The candlestick, which is made up of seventy pieces, refers to the twelve signs of the zodiac, through which the seven planets take their course; and the seven lamps, on the top of the seven branches, bear an analogy to the planets themselves. The curtains with the four colours that are wrought in them, represent the four elements.—By the high priest's linen garment is designed the whole body of the earth; and by the violet colour, the heavens. The pomegranates answer to lightning; and the noise of the bells to thunder. The four-coloured ephod bears a resemblance to the very nature of the universe, and the interweaving it with threads of gold, to the rays of the sun, which give us light. The pectoral or rational, in the middle of it, intimates the position of the earth in the centre of the world; the girdle about the priest's body, is the sea about the globe of the earth; the two sardonyx stones, on the shoulders, represent the sun and moon; and by the twelve other stones on the breast, may be understood either the twelve months, or the twelve signs of the zodiac." But all this is too light and fanciful, one would think, for so grave an author as Josephus, had not this way of allegorizing things been the prevailing custom of the age.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 3. c. 7.

cross;’ the meat and drink offering, for ¹ ‘his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed;’ the scape-goat, for he hath carried away our sins, ² never to be more remembered against us; the paschal lamb, for ³ ‘Christ, our passover, is sacrificed for us; the great sacrifice of atonement,’ for ⁴ ‘Jesus Christ the righteous is both our advocate with the Father, and a propitiation for our sins:’ and in fine, ⁵ ‘his blood, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself to God, without spot, is more effectual than the blood of bulls and goats, to purge our consciences from dead works, to serve the living God.’

Thus it appears, that the chief end of the several institutions relating to the ceremonial part of the Jewish worship, was to prefigure the person and transactions of our blessed Saviour, ⁶ ‘when the fulness of time was come that God should send forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem those that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.’ And therefore, since the ceremonies of the Jewish law could never be of any esteem in the sight of God, any otherwise than as they promoted this end, and prepared men’s minds for the reception of a more perfect institution of religion, it is manifest, that when this more perfect institution was once settled, the former and more imperfect was, of course, to cease; ⁷ ‘there being necessarily a disannulling of the commandment going before, for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof.’

And from hence we may finally infer, that though the essence of religion be eternally and immutably the same, yet the form and institution of it may be, and often has been, changed. ⁸ The essence of all religion is obedience to that moral and eternal law, which obliges us to imitate the life of God in justice, mercy, and holiness, that is, ‘to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.’ This is the sum of all natural religion, as appears from the discourses of those wiser heathens, who were freest from prejudice and superstition. This was the sum of the Jewish religion, as appears from the frequent and earnest protestations of God to that people by his servants the prophets; and this likewise is the sum of the Christian religion, as the apostles everywhere inculcate. But though religion itself is thus immutably the same, yet the form and institution of it may be different.

When natural religion, by reason of its obscurity, in this corrupt estate of human nature, proved ineffectual to make men truly religious, God left them no longer to the guidance of their reason only, but gave them first the patriarchal, and afterwards the Mosaic dispensation; and when, through the incumbrance with so many ritual observances, this latter proved ineffectual to the same great end, God abolished this form of religion likewise, and instituted the Christian. In all which proceeding, there is no reflection at all upon the immutable nature of God. For as the divine nature is, in the truest and highest sense, unchangeable; so religion itself, in its nature and essence, is likewise unchangeable. But as the capacities, the prejudices, and the circumstances of men are different, so the institution and outward form of that religion, which in its essence is always the same, may, with the good pleasure of God, be changed; even as a careful nurse, to use a scripture comparison upon this occasion, adapts the diet to the strength and constitution of the person she attends: ‘For every one that useth milk,’ as the elements of the Jewish dispensation were, ‘is unskilful in the word of righteousness, for he is a babe; but strong meat,’ or a religion of a greater perfection, as the Christian is, ‘belongeth to them that are of full age; even those, who, by reason of use, have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil.’

SECT. III.

CHAP. I.—From the Death of Korah, to the Israelites’ Entrance into Canaan; in all, 38 years.

THE HISTORY.

AFTER the establishment of the high priest’s office in Aaron, and his family, the Israelites moved about from place to place, in the deserts of Arabia, but chiefly about the mountains of Idumæa, until God, ⁹ ‘shortening the period of human life, had taken away almost all that generation,’ ⁹ ‘of whom he had sworn in his wrath,’ as the Psalmist expresses it, ‘that they should not enter into his rest.’ And indeed, good reason had he to be angry with them, since during the remainder of their peregrination they were guilty of many more murmurings and idolatries than Moses has thought proper to record, which are nevertheless mentioned, with no small severity, ¹⁰ by other inspired writers.

As the time, however, for their entrance into the Holy Land now drew near, from Ezion-geber they advanced towards Kadesh in the wilderness of Sin, designing very probably to enter the country through those narrow passages, which, at that time were called, ‘the ways of the spies;’ but ¹¹ they were repulsed by the king of Arad, who coming out against them with a strong force, slew a considerable number, and took from them much booty. In their second attempt, however, they succeeded better; for they defeated the king’s army, sacked some of his towns, and vowing at another opportunity (¹² which happened in the time of ¹² Joshua) the utter destruction of a After the many judgments and calamities sent upon Israel, by reason of their rebellions against God, Moses, perceiving the divine threatenings to be daily accomplished by the frequent deaths of those who came out of Egypt, and ‘whose carcasses were to fall in the wilderness,’ composed the ninetieth psalm, wherein he mentions, the reduction of human life to the term of years wherein it has ever since stopped, and makes several wholesome reflections thereupon: ‘The days of our age are threescore years and ten; and though men be so strong, that they come to four-score years, yet is their strength thin but labour and sorrow; so soon passeth it away, and we are gone. O teach us therefore to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.’—Ver. 10, 11.

b The Jews have a tradition, founded on an express text in Deuteronomy, (chap. xx. 10, &c.) that the Israelites were obliged to send an herald to offer peace in their name, to every city and people, before they attempted to conquer them by the sword; that in case they accepted it they only became tributaries to them; the whole nation, they took their route for the present another way, and so arrived again at Kadesh.

Here it was that Miriam, the sister of Moses and Aaron, (^a who was older than either of them,) in the hundred and thirty-third year of her age died, was buried with great pomp, and by the Israelites lamented for the space of a whole month. Here it was that the people fell again into their old way of murmuring for want of water, which God ordered Moses to supply, by speaking only to a certain rock; but some way or other he deviating from his instructions, either through impatience or dilidence, offended God to such a degree, as to deserve a denunciation, that neither he, nor his brother Aaron, who seems to have been equally in the offence, should be permitted to enter into Canaan. Hence likewise it was, that Moses sent an embassy to the king of Edom, desiring a free passage through his country, and promising to commit no hostilities, nor give the least molestation to any of his subjects. But the haughty Edomite was so far from granting his request, that he came out with a strong army to oppose him; which Moses, no doubt, would have resented as the thing deserved, had not God, whom he consulted upon this occasion, ordered him, for the present, not to engage with the Edomites: so that decamping from Kadesh, he came to Mount Hor, not far from the borders of Edom, where God gave Aaron notice of his approaching death, and not long after, commanded Moses to take him and Eleazar his son, who was to succeed him in the office of the high priest, to the top of the mount, and there to strip Aaron of his sacerdotal robes, and put them upon his son: which when Moses had done, Aaron ^b died on the top of Mount Hor, being an hundred and twenty-three years old; and when the people understood that he was dead, ^c they bewailed him thirty days.

As soon as the days of mourning were over, they removed, and encamped at Zalmanah, which took its name from the image of the serpent, which Moses caused to be set up there. For the Israelites, being tired with the length of their journey, the narrowness of their passes, and the barrenness of the country, began to relapse into their old humour of murmuring and repining, which provoked God to send great ^d swarms of fiery out if they refused their offer, they were then to be vowed to destruction. Maimonides has taken great pains to prove, that all those nations which were cut off by the Israelites, owed their destruction to their choosing to try the fortune of war, rather than accept of peace upon such terms. There is one objection however, which seems to stand a little in his way, and that is,—the stratagem which the Gibonites made use of to obtain peace from Israel, which would have been needless, had the latter been obliged to offer it before they began any hostilities: but to this the learned Rabbi answers,—That the reason of the Gibonites' policy was, that they had in common with their neighbours, refused the first offer of peace, and were consequently doomed to the same fate with them: and that, for the prevention of this, their ambassadors feigned themselves to come from a country vastly distant from any of the other seven, and by that means obtained the desired peace.—Maimon. ap. Canaan; et Euseb. Rep. Heb. vol. i. b. 2. c. 20.

^a Miriam was older than either Aaron or Moses. Moses was the youngest: and when he was born she might probably be about twelve years of age, because when he was exposed upon the banks of the river Nile, she, we find, had address enough to offer her service to Pharaoh's daughter, to go and fetch her a nurse, which can hardly be supposed of one younger. Some of the ancient fathers are of opinion that she died a virgin, and was the legislative or governess of the Jewish women, as Moses was of the men; but the more probable opinion is, that she was married to Hur, a man of chief note in the tribe of Judah, and on several occasions a person of great confidence with Moses; but it does not appear that she had any children by him. She was buried, as Josephus tells us, with great solemnity, at the charge of the public, and her sepulchre, as Eusebius reports, was extant in his time at Kadesh, not far distant from the city Petra, the metropolis of Arabia Petrea.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7: and Cabinet's Dictionary.

^b The Mount Hor was on the coast of the land of Edom, towards the east, in some part of that tract, which was afterwards denoted by the Mount Seir. In Deuteronomy (ii. 12.) we are told expressly that the Horims dwelt in Seir before-time; and according to we read (Gen. xiv. 6.) that Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, with his confederates, smote the Horites in their Mount Seir. Now it seems very probable, that as places at first were wont to take their names from their inhabitants, both this place, and the people might derive their names from one Hor, whom they descended from, and who in the early ages of the world, inhabited this country: and that though, in process of time, the name of Mount Seir came to be used to denote the same tract, yet the old name of Mount Hor was preserved in that part of it, where stood the mountain here so called by Moses, and on which Aaron died. There seems to be however no small difficulty in reconciling this passage in Numbers xx. 23—28, with what we read in Deuteronomy x. 6. That 'the children of Israel took their journey from Beeroh, of the children of Jaakan, to Mosera: there Aaron died, and there he was buried.' So that Moses seems to have forgot himself, when in one place he tells us, that his brother Aaron was buried on Mount Hor, and in another in Mosera. To reconcile this, some have supposed that Mount Hor was so near to Mosera, where the Israelites had their encampment when Aaron died, that either place might, with propriety enough, be called the place of his death and his interment. It seems, however, from the account which we have of their encampments, in Numbers xxxiii. very plain, that Mount Hor and Mosera were two distinct places; and therefore others have maintained, that the sixth and seventh verses in the tenth chapter of Deuteronomy, in the common Hebrew text, have been extremely corrupted by the ignorance of some transcribers, because the Hebrew Samaritan or old Hebrew text, makes the account in Deuteronomy x. 6, 7, exactly agree with the order of the encampments, mentioned in Numbers xxxiii. 52, 58, and there it is said that Aaron died, and was buried in Mount Hor.—Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. ii.

^c The author of Ecclesiasticus, having given us a long commendation of Aaron, and his vestments, comes at last to tell us, that "God chose him out of all men living, to offer sacrifices to the Lord, incense, and a sweet savour, for a memorial, and to make reconciliation for his people: that he gave unto him the commandments and authority in the statutes of judgments, that he should teach Jacob the testimonies, and inform Israel in the laws; that strangers conspired together against him, and malign'd him in the wilderness—this the Lord saw, and it displeas'd him, and in his wrathful indignation, they were consumed.—But he made Aaron more honourable, and gave him an heritage, and divided unto him the first-fruits of the increase: so that he did eat the sacrifices of the Lord, which he gave unto him and to his seed," &c. He died in the arms of Moses his brother, and Eleazar his son, and successor in the high priesthood. They buried him in some cave belonging to Mount Hor, and kept the place of his interment from the knowledge of the Israelites, perhaps from an apprehension that in after ages they might pay some superstitious worship to him; or rather, that the Arabians, among whom they then dwelt, might not at any time take it in their heads to violate the sanctity of his grave.—Ecclesi. xlv. 13, &c.

^d Some authors are of opinion, that these serpents were only little worms, which bred in the skin, and were of so venomous a nature, that they immediately poisoned those who were infected by them. But it is very evident, that not only the original words, neeshim seraphim, signify a burning or winged serpent, but that these creatures are very common both in Egypt and Arabia, insomuch, that there would be no living in those countries, if these serpents had not by Providence been debarred from multiplying as other serpents do. For the Arabians tell us, that after serpents among them; but after the death of several, and upon the humiliation of the rest, he commanded Moses to cast a ^a brazen serpent, of the same size and figure with those that infested them, and to fix it upon a pole, situate on some eminent ground, that as many as were bitten by the living serpents, might look up to the brazen one, and be healed. Which accordingly was done, and had its intended miraculous effect.

Several were the marches and encampments which the Israelites, without committing the least hostilities, made between the countries of Moab and Ammon, till they came at length to the country of the Amorites. And from hence Moses ^b sent ambassadors to Sihon their king, demanding a passage through his country, and offering to pay for all manner of necessaries, without giving him the least disturbance. ^c But the Amorite that they had coupled together, the female never fails to kill the male, and that her young ones kill her, as soon as they are hatched. Herodotus, who had seen several of these serpents, tells us, that they very much resemble those which the Greeks and Latins call hydræ; and Bochart has quoted a great number both of ancient and modern authors to prove that they really are the hydræ. They are but short, are spotted with divers colours, and have wings like those of a bat. The his is their mortal enemy; and Herodotus tells us, that at Batos in Egypt, he had seen a vast quantity of their skeletons, whose flesh these birds had devoured. They love sweet smells, frequent such trees as bear spices, and the marshes where the aromatic reed, or cassia, grows; and therefore, when the Arabians go to gather the cassia, they clothe themselves with skins, and cover all their heads over, except their eyes, because their biting is very dangerous.—Bochart de Animal. Sacr. part 2, b. 3. c. 13.

^a The brazen serpent continued among the Jews above 700 years, even to the time of Hezekiah, king of Judah; but when it came to be made an object of idolatry, and the people for some time had paid their incense and adoration to it, that pious prince caused it to be broken in pieces; and by way of contempt, called it nehustan, that is to say, a brazen handle, or trifle. At Milan, however, in the church of St Ambrose, they pretend to show you a serpent made of brass, which they tell you is the same with that of Moses. But every one may believe of this as he pleases.—Calmel's Dictionary, under the word Serpent.

^b It may here be proposed as a difficulty, how Moses came to offer the Amorites terms of peace, considering that the Israelites were commanded to destroy them, and to take possession of their country. But to this it has been answered by some learned men, that notwithstanding God had expressly doomed this people to an extermination, yet Moses thought himself at liberty to indulge his usual meekness, and to begin with gentle and amicable measures, though he might at the same time be persuaded, that they would avail nothing; and this probably at the suggestion of God himself, to cut off all occasions or pretence of complaint from the Amorites, as if they had not been honourably and fairly dealt with, and that the equity and righteousness of God's proceeding with a prince of so savage and obstinate a temper, might appear in a stronger light, when the consequence of his refusing a free passage to the Israelites, and bringing his army into the field against them, should happen to be his own defeat and destruction.—Bibliotheca Biblica on Num. xxi. 21.

^c Grotius, in his second book on the Right of War and Peace, c. 2. sect. 13, is of opinion, that according to the law of nations, the highways, seas, and rivers of every country, ought to be free to all passengers upon just occasions. He produces several examples from heathen history of such permission being granted to armies, and thence he infers, that Sihon and Og, denying the Israelites this privilege, gave a just ground of war; nor does he think that the fear which these princes might conceive is any excuse at all for not granting the thing, because no man's fear can take away another man's right, especially when several ways might have been found out to have made their passage safe on both sides. But when all is said, it seems not clear that all men have such a right as this great man thinks they may claim. No man, we know, can challenge a passage through a prince, not thinking it safe to receive so numerous a people into the heart of his kingdom, not only denied them a passage, but, accounting it better policy to attack, than to be attacked, gathered what forces he could together, and marched out to give them battle. But not far from Jahaz, where the engagement was, the Israelites overthrew him; and having made themselves masters of his country, put all, both man, woman, and child to the sword: and not long after this, Og, ^d king of Bashan, ^e a man of a prodigious gigantic size, attempting to obstruct their passage, underwent the same fate. For they seized his country, and utterly destroyed the inhabitants thereof, reserving only the cattle, and spoils of the cities, as a prey to themselves, as they had done before in the case of Sihon.

Encouraged by these successes, the Israelites marched to the plains of Moab, and encamped on the banks of the river Jordan, opposite to Jericho. This put Balak, who was then king of Moab, into a terrible consternation; for supposing himself not able to engage the mighty force of Israel, he had not only made a strong alliance with the Midianites and Ammonites, his neighbours, in order to stop their progress, but thought it advisable likewise, before he began any hostilities against them, to try how far the power of Balaam's enchantments (a noted magician in Pethor, a city of Mesopotamia) might go, in turning the fortune of the war towards his side.

To this purpose he despatched a select number of his nobles, with costly presents to ^f Balaam, entreating him private man's ground without his leave; and every prince has the same dominion in all his territories that a private man has in his land. As for the examples, therefore, of those who had permitted armies to pass through their kingdoms, they are examples of fact rather than of right, and of such as were not in a condition to refuse what was demanded of them. For the thing is notorious, that several countries have suffered very grievously by granting this liberty; and therefore no prince, who consults his subjects' safety, is to be blamed for not granting it; nor was the war with the Amorites founded upon this reason, as we shall see hereafter.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d The land of Bashan was one of the most fertile cantons of Canaan, which reached on the east to the river Jordan, on the west to the mountains of Gilead, on the south to the brook Jabbock, and on the north to the land of Geshur. The whole kingdom took its name from the hill of Bashan, which is situate in it, and has since been called Battanea. It had no less than sixty walled towns in it, besides villages. It afforded an excellent breed of cattle, and stately oaks, and was, in short, a plentiful and populous country.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^e The description of this gigantic king, who was the last of the race of the Rephaim, or vast prodigious men, we have in Deuteronomy iii. 11, and from the size of his bed, which was preserved a long time in the city of Rabbath, the capital of the Ammonites, we may guess at his stature. It was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad, that is, fifteen feet four inches and a half long, and six feet ten inches broad. But the Jewish doctors, not content with such pigmy wonders, have improved the story to their own liking. For they tell us, that this bed of nine cubits could be no more than his cradle, since himself was six score cubits high, when full grown; that he lived before the flood, and that the waters of it, when at the highest, reached only up to his knees; that, however, he thought proper to get upon the top of the roof of the ark, where Noah supplied him with provision, not out of any compassion to him, but that the men who came after the deluge, might see how great the power of God was, who had destroyed such monsters from the face of the earth.—Calmel and Munster in Deut. c. 3.

^f In 2 Peter ii. 15, Balaam is said to be the son of Boser, according to our version; but as the words, 'the son,' are in the king's name to come, and curse him a people who were arrived upon the borders of his territories; but God for that time, would not permit him to go: whereupon Balak, supposing either, that the number and quality of his messengers did not answer Balaam's ambition, or the value of the presents his covetousness, sent messengers of a more honourable rank, with larger proposals, and promises of high promotion, if he would but gratify him in this one thing.

With this permission he set forward with the princes of Moab; but as he was on the road, an angel met him, whom, though he perceived him not, his ass plainly saw, and therefore turned aside into the field to avoid him. With much ado, Balaam beat his ass into the road again; but when the angel stood in a narrow passage between two walls, which enclosed a vineyard, the ass for fear ran against one of the walls, and crushed Balaam's leg, which provoked him so, that he beat her again. At last, the angel removed, and stood in a place so very narrow, that there was no possibility of getting by him, whereupon the ass fell down under her rider, and would go no farther. This enraged the prophet still more; and as he was beating and belabouring the poor creature most unmercifully, God was pleased to give the ass the faculty of speech, wherein she expostulated the hard usage she had met with; and as Balaam was going to justify himself, he was likewise pleased to open the prophet's eyes, and let him see the angel standing in the way with a naked sword in his hand, which so terrified him, that he fell down upon his face, asked pardon for his trespass, and offered to return home again, if so be his journey was displeasing to God.^a not found in the original, but were inserted by the translators, to supply the sense, as they imagined, the word Bosor may denote a place as well as a person; and accordingly Grotius understands St Peter's words, not as if Bosor was the father, but the city of Balaam; for what was anciently called Pethor, the Syrians in after ages called Bosor, by an easy change of two letters, which is a thing not unusual.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^a Num. xxii. 31. ' Then the Lord opened the eyes of Balaam, and he saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way.' There are several instances to be found, both in the scriptures and in profane authors, where the eyes have been opened by a divine power to perceive that which they could not see by mere natural discernment. Thus the eyes of Hagar were opened, that she might see the fountain, Gen. xxi. 19. Homer also presents us with an example of this kind. Minerva says to Diomedes,

Go, while the darkness from thy sight I turn,
That thou alike both God and man discern.—Sothely.

And in Virgil, Venus performs the same office to Æneas, and shows him the gods who were engaged in the destruction of Troy.

Now cast your eyes around: while I dissolve
The mists and fogs that mortal eyes involve, Purge from your sight the dross, and make you see
The shape of each avenging deity. Dryden.

Milton seems likewise to have imitated this, when he makes Michael open Adam's eyes to see the future revolutions of the world, and the fortunes of his posterity.

— Then purged with euphras and rue
The visual nerve, for he had much to see,
And from the well of life three drops instill'd.

Paradise Lost, b. 11. ll. 114. E. P.

That his journey was displeasing to God, he himself could not be ignorant, because, in his first address, God had expressly interdicted his going. Being resolved, however, out of the man's wicked inclination, to raise some kind of advantage, and to make him, who was hired to curse, the instrument of pronouncing a blessing upon his people, God gave him now free leave to proceed. When Balak understood that Balaam was on the road, himself went to receive him upon the confines of his dominions; and having, in a friendly manner, blamed him for not coming at his first sending, which Balaam excused upon account of the restraint which God had laid on him, he conducted him to his capital city, and there entertained him publicly, with his' princes and nobles that day; and the next morning carried him to the high places consecrated to ^b Baal, that from thence he might take a view of the extremity of the Israelitish camp. Whilst they were here, the prophet ordered ^c seven altars to be erected, ^d and seven oxen, and seven rams to be got ready; and having ^e offered an

^b The word Baal signifies Lord, and was the name of several gods, both male and female, as Selden (De Diis Syris, c. 1.) shows. The god of the Moabites was Chemosh, but here very probably is called by the common name of Baal. And as all nations worshipped their gods upon high places, so this god of Moab, having more places of worship than one, Balak carried Balaam to them all, that from thence he might take the most advantageous prospect of the Israelites. These high places were full of trees, and shady groves, which made them commodious both for the solemn thoughts and prayers of such as were devout, and for the filthy inclinations and abominable practices of such as affected to be wicked.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c According to the account which both Festus and Servius give us of ancient times, the heathens sacrificed to the celestial gods only upon altars: to the terrestrial, they sacrificed upon the earth; and to the infernal, in holes digged in the earth. And though the number seven was much observed among the Hebrews, even by God's own appointment, Lev. iv. 6, yet we do not read of more than one altar built by the patriarchs, when they offered their sacrifices, nor were any more than one allowed by Moses; and therefore, we may well suppose, that there was something of heathen superstition in this erection of seven altars, and that the Moabites, in their worship of the sun, who is here principally meant by Baal, did at the same time sacrifice to the seven planets. This was originally a part of the Egyptian theology; for as they worshipped at this time the lights of heaven, so they first imagined the seven days of the week to be under the respective influence of these seven luminaries. Belus, and his Egyptian priests, having obtained leave to settle in Babylon, about half a century before this time, might teach the Chaldeans their astronomy, and so introduce this Egyptian notion of the influence of the seven ruling stars, which Balaam, being no stranger to the learning of the age and country he lived in, might pretend to Balak to proceed upon in his divinations and auguries.—Le Clerc's Commentary in locum, and Stuckford's Connection, vol. 3. b. 12.

^d Num. xxiii. 1. ' Build me here seven altars, and prepare me here seven oxen and seven rams.' The ancients were very superstitious about certain numbers, supposing that God delighted in odd numbers.

Around his waxen image first I wind
Three woollen fillets, of three colours joined;
Thrice bind about his thrice devoted head,
Which round the sacred altar thrice is led.
Unequal numbers please the gods.

^e In the text it is said, that Balak and Balaam ' offered on every altar a bullock and a ram,' Num. xxiii. 2. But though it was customary, in those early days, for kings to officiate as priests, yet it is rather to be supposed, that Balak only presented the sacrifices, and that Balaam performed the office of sacrificing them; but then it may be made a question, to whom the sacrifices were offered. And to this it may be answered, that they might both have a different intention; that Balak might suppli-ox and a ram on each altar, he left Balak to stand by the sacrifices, while himself withdrew to consult the Lord; and upon his return, acquainted the king, "How impossible it was for him to do the thing that he might expect from him, namely, the cursing of a people who were so signally under the protection of heaven; and so magnifying their prosperity and increase, he concludes with a wish, that his fate might be theirs, both in life and death."

Balak, at these words, expressed no small surprise; but still not discouraged, he hoped that the change of the place might possibly produce some better luck; and therefore taking Balaam to the top of Mount Pisgah, he tried whether he might not be permitted to curse them from thence. But all in vain. The same number of altars were erected, the bullocks and rams were offered, and the prophet withdrew to consult God, as before; but still he returned with no better news: for the purport of his declaration was, "That God was fixed and immutable, in his favour to the Israelites; that he would not suffer any bloody designs, or any frauds or enchantments to prevail against them, but would finally make them victorious wherever they came."

This was so great a mortification to Balak, that to silence Balaam, he forbade him either to curse or bless; but he soon changed his mind, and desired him to make a further trial at another place. Accordingly another place was made choice of. Fresh altars were raised, and fresh sacrifices offered; but all to no purpose: Balaam perceiving that God was resolved to continue blessing Israel, without retiring, as aforesaid, under pretence of consulting God, at the first cast of his eye upon the tents of the Israelites, brake out into ejaculations of praise; and then, in proper and significant metaphors, foretold their extent, fertility, and strength, and that "those that blessed them, should be blessed, and those that cursed them, should be cursed."

By this time Balak, enraged to hear Balaam, whom he had sent for to curse the children of Israel, thus three times successively bless them, could no longer contain himself, but smiting his hands together, he bade him haste and be gone, since, by his foolish adherence to God's suggestions, he had both abused him, and defrauded himself. ^a Balaam had recourse to his old excuse, ate Baal, while Balaam was making his addresses to the Lord, though with such superstitious ceremonies, as it is likely, were used by the worshippers of Baal. Or why may not we suppose, that Balaam, telling Balak, that he could effect nothing without the Lord, the God of Israel, persuaded him to join with him at that time in his worship, that they might more powerfully prevail with him to withdraw his presence from the Israelites? For there is no reason to imagine, that Balaam would go to inquire of the Lord, immediately after he had sacrificed to other gods. — Patrick's Commentary.

^a Josephus brings in Balaam making his apology for himself, in order to pacify Balak's rage, for his having blessed the Israelites, instead of cursing them. "And does king Balak think, that where prophets are upon the subject of fatalities, or things to come, they are left to their own liberty, what to say, and what not, or to make their own speeches? We are only the passive instruments of the oracle. The words are put in our mouths; and we neither think nor know what we say. I remember well, says he, that I was invited hither with great earnestness, both by yourself and by the Midianites: and that it was at your request I came, and with a desire to do all that in me lay, for your service. But what am I able to do against the will and power of God? I had not the least thought of speaking one good word of of not daring to transcend the divine commands; but being willing to gratify the king, and in compliance to his covetous temper, to gain some reward to himself, he offered to advertise him of what the Israelites would do to his people in subsequent ages; but still, against his own inclination, he bestowed blessings on Israel, and prophesied, 'That a star ^b should come forth from Jacob, and a rod from Israel;' that it should smite the chiefs of Moab, and destroy the children of Seth; that Edom should fall under its power; and that the Amalekites and Kenites should be extirpated: in fine, that the western nations, the Greeks and Romans, should vanquish the Assyrians, destroy the Hebrews, and perish themselves.

After these predictions, as if vexed at his own disappointment in missing the reward he expected, and with a purpose to revenge himself on the Israelites, as the occasion of it, he instructed the Moabites and Midianites in a wicked ^c device; which was to send their daughters the Israelites' army, or of the blessings which God hath in store for them; but since God has decreed to make them great and happy, I have been forced to speak, as you have heard, instead of what I had otherwise designed to say." — Jewish Antiquities, b. 4. c. 6.

^b Num. xxiv. 17. 'There shall come a star out of Jacob.' This prophecy may possibly in some sense relate to David, but without doubt it belongs principally to Christ. Here the metaphor of a sceptre was common and popular, to denote a ruler, like David; but the star, though, like the other, it signified in prophetic writings a temporal prince or ruler, yet had a secret and hidden meaning likewise. A star in the Egyptian hieroglyphics denoted God. Thus God in the prophet Amos, reproving the Israelites for their idolatry on their first coming out of Egypt, says, 'have ye offered unto me sacrifices and offerings in the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel? but ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chium, your images, the star of your god which ye made to yourselves;' Amos v. 25, 26. The star of your God is a noble figurative expression to signify the image of your god; for a star being employed in the hieroglyphics to signify God, it is used here with great elegance to signify the material image of a god; the words, the star of your god, being only a repetition of the preceding, Chium, your image; and not, as some critics suppose, the same with your god star. Hence we conclude that the metaphor here used by Balaam of a star was of that abstruse, mysterious kind, and so to be understood, and consequently that it related only to Christ, the eternal Son of God. (Warburton's Divine Legation, b. iv. sec. 4.) — Bishop Newton, however, is of opinion, that the literal meaning of the prophecy respects the person and actions of David. — Dissertations on the Prophecies, vol. 1. p. 139. — Ed.

^c Though Moses makes no mention of this contrivance, where he describes the interview between Balaam and Balak; yet in the 31st chapter of Numbers, ver. 16, he lays the whole blame upon Balaam: and Josephus accordingly informs us, that after he had gone as far as the river Euphrates, he bethought himself of this project, and having sent for Balak, and the princes of Midian, he thus addressed himself to them. "To the end that king Balak," says he, "and you the princes of Midian, may know the great desire I have to please you, though, in some sort, against the will of God; I have thought of an expedient, that may perhaps be for your service. Never flatter yourselves that the Hebrews are to be destroyed by wars, pestilence, famine, or any other of these common calamities; for they are so secure under God's special providence, that they are never totally to be extinguished by any of these depopulating judgments; but if any small and temporary advantage against them will give you any satisfaction, hearken to my advice. Send into their camp a procession of the loveliest virgins you can pick up; and to improve nature, dress them up with all the ornaments of art, and give them their lessons how to behave themselves upon all occasions of courtship and amour. If the young men shall make love, and proceed to any importunities, let them threaten immediately to be gone, unless they will actually renounce their country's laws, and the honour into the camp of the Israelites, in order to draw them first into lewdness, and then into idolatry, the sure method to deprive them of the assistance of that God who protected them. This artifice succeeded; (for the very next account we have of the Israelites is, that they lay encamped at Shittim, where many of them ^a were deluded by these strange women, not only to commit whoredom with them, but to assist at their sacrifices, and worship their gods, even ^b Baal-peor,) which was a crime so detestable to God, that he punished it with a plague, which, in a short time, carried off ^c about 24,000 of the offenders. This, however, was not the only punishment which God exacted; for he commanded Moses ^d to erect a court of

of that God who prescribed them, and finally engage themselves to worship after the manner of the Midianites and Moabites. This, says he, will provoke God, and draw vengeance upon their heads."—Jewish Antiquities, ibid.

^a The Jewish doctors tell us, that on a great festival, which the Moabites made in honour of their god Baal-peor, some Israelites, who happened to be there, casting their eyes upon their young women, were smitten with their beauty, and courted their enjoyment; but that the women would not yield to their motion, upon any other condition than that they would worship their gods. Whereupon pulling a little image of Peor out of their bosom, they presented it to the Israelites to kiss, and then desired them to eat of the sacrifices, which had been offered to him. But Josephus, tells the story otherwise, namely, that the women, upon some pretence or other, came into the Israelitish camp, and when they had enamoured the young Hebrews, according to their instructions, they made a pretence as though they must be gone; but upon passionate entreaties, accompanied with vows and oaths on the other side, the subtle enchantresses consented to stay with them, and grant every thing that they desired, upon condition that they would embrace their religion.—Patrick's Commentary, and Josephus, ibid.

^b The Jewish doctors are generally of opinion, that this Baal-peor was the same with Priapus, the idol of Turpitude; and that the worship of him consisted in such obscene practices, or postures at least, as were not fit to be named. Others have asserted that this god was the same with Saturn, a deity adored in Arabia; nor is it unlikely, that the adventure related of Saturn, and his castration by his own son, may have introduced the obscenities that are practised in the worship of this idol. But others, with great assurance maintain, that Peor was the same with Adonis, whose feasts were celebrated in the manner of funerals, but the people who observed them at that time, committed a thousand dissolute actions, particularly when they were told that Adonis, whom they had mourned for as dead, was returned to life again. However this be, it is very probable that as Peor was the name of a mountain in the country of Moab, the temple of Baal stood upon it, and thence he was called Baal-peor.—Cabnet's Commentaries and Dissertations; Patrick's Commentary; and Sellen De Diis Syriis.

^c St Paul, in his observation upon the judgments which befell the Israelites in the wilderness, tells us expressly, that the number of those who were cut off in this plague was no more than 23,000, (1 Cor. x. 8.) Whereas Moses makes them no less than 24,000. But this difference is easily reconciled, if we do but consider, that in the 24,000, which Moses computes, the thousand who were convicted of idolatry, and thereupon were slain with the sword, 'in the day of the plague,' (Num. xxv. 5, 18,) are comprehended; whereas the apostle speaks of none but those that died of the pestilence.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d According to our translation, the command which God gave Moses, runs thus,—'Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up before the Lord, against the sun, that the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned away from Israel,' (Num. xxv. 4.) But unless we can suppose that the heads of each tribe were guilty of this lewdness and idolatry, the sentence here denounced would have been highly unjust: and what others allege, that they were guilty of a shameful neglect in not opposing the growing mischief, and punishing the offenders; this might be very probably out of their power, since even Moses himself, very frequently found them too headstrong for him. It was somewhat strange, the judicature consisting of the heads of all the families, and to try and hang all that had been guilty of this whoredom and idolatry, without respect to friendship or kindred; which was accordingly done, and about 1000 more were in this manner put to death.

By this time, the greatest part of the people being come a little to themselves, were bewailing their folly and wickedness, at the door of the tabernacle; when they were surprised with ^e an instance of the most unparalleled boldness in one of the chiefs of the tribe of Simeon, named Zimri, who, in the sight of Moses, and the whole congregation, had brought a young Midianitish princess, whose name was Cozbi, into the camp, and was leading her into his tent. Their impudence, however did not go unpunished; for Phinehas, the son of Eleazar the high priest, fired with a just indignation and holy zeal, followed them into the tent, with a javelin in his hand, where, in the very act of whoredom, ^f he thrust fore, that our translators should take the passage in this sense, when the Samaritan copy, the Jerusalem Targum, most of the ancient translations, and several later commentators of great note, have made the word otam, that is, them, not to refer to the heads of the people, but to such as had joined themselves to Baal-peor: and so the meaning of the command will be, that the heads of the people should divide themselves into several courts of judgment, and examine who had committed idolatry, and, after conviction, cause them to be hanged, that is, hanged after they were stoned: for among the Hebrews none were hanged alive, but in the cases of idolatry or blasphemy, were first stoned, and then hanged up against the sun, that is, publicly and openly, that all the people might see, and fear to sin.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e When the Israelites, at the instigation of the strange woman they had received into the camp, were fallen from lust into idolatry, Moses, according to Josephus, perceiving that the infection began to spread, called the people together, and, in a general discourse, reminded them how unworthy a thing it was, and how great a scandal to the memory of their ancestors, for them to value the gratifying of their lusts and appetites above the reverence they owed to their God, and their religion; how incongruous a thing, for men that had been virtuous and modest in the desert, to lead such profligate lives in a good country, and squander away that in luxury which they had honestly acquired in the time of their distress; and thereupon he admonished them to repent in time, and to show themselves brave men, not in the violation of the laws, but in the mastery of their unruly affections. This he spoke without naming any one: but Zimri, who took himself to be pointed at, rose up, and made the following speech:—"You are at liberty, Moses," says he, "to use your own laws: they have been a long time in exercise, and custom is all that can be said for their strength or credit. Were it not for this, you would, to your cost, have found long since, that the Hebrews are not to be imposed upon; and I myself am one of the number, that never will truckle to your tyrannical oppression. For what is your business all this while, but under a bare pretext, and talk of laws and God, to bar us not only from the bare exercise, but the very desire of liberty? What are we the better for coming out of Egypt, if it be only in exchange for a more grievous bondage under Moses? You are to make here what laws you please, and we are to abide the penalties of them, when at the same time, it is you only that deserve to be punished for abolishing such customs as are authorized by the common consent of nations, and setting up your own will and fancy against general practice and reason. For my own part, what I have done, I take to be well done, and shall make no difficulty to confess and justify it. I have, as you say, married a strange woman. I speak this with the liberty of an honest man; and I care not who knows it. I never meant to make a secret of it, and you need look no farther for an informer. I do acknowledge too, that I have changed my way of worship, and reckon it very reasonable for a man to examine all things, that would find out the truth, without being tied up, as if it were in a despotic government, to the opinion and humour of one single man."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 4 c. 6.

^f Upon this fact the Jews found what they call the judgment them both through the body, and by this action, not only obtained an high commendation from God, but an establishment likewise of a the Aaronical priesthood in him, and his posterity, for ever after.

As soon as this disorder was quieted, and the offenders punished, Moses began to bethink himself of revenging the indignity which the Moabites and Midianites had put upon Israel; and to this purpose commanded a detachment of 12,000 choice men, that is, b 1000 out of every tribe to go against them; among whom was the gallant c of zeal, which authorized such as were full of this holy fervour, to punish any violent offenders, those, to wit, who blasphemed God, or profaned the temple, &c., in the presence of ten men of Israel, without any formal process. But this example of Phinehas countenances no such practice; nor can this action, done upon an extraordinary occasion, by a person in a public authority, moved thereto by a strong divine impulse, and (what is a circumstance that some people add) in a commonwealth not perfectly settled, be made a precedent for private men, under a different situation, to invade the office of a magistrate, and with an enthusiastic rage, to persecute even those that are most innocent; as we plainly find it happened among the Jews, when, in the latter times of their government, they put this precedent in execution; of which St Stephen whom they inhumanly stoned, and St Paul whom they vowed to assassinate, without any form of justice, are notorious instances.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

a This, however, is to be understood with a certain limitation; because it is manifest, that after some successions in the line of Phinehas, the priesthood came, for a while, into the family of Eli, who was descended from Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron. The reason of this interruption is not mentioned in Scripture; but some great sin, it is reasonable to suppose, provoked God to set aside the line of Eleazar for some years, till Eli's sons likewise became so wicked, that the priesthood was taken from them, and restored, in the days of Solomon, to the posterity of Phinehas, with whom it continued as long as the priesthood lasted. And this is enough to verify the promise of an everlasting priesthood, since the words everlasting, perpetual, and the like, in a general and indefinite sense, denote no more than a long duration. But there is another way of solving this difficulty: God had, before this time, limited the priesthood to Aaron and his descendants, and to them it was to be 'an everlasting priesthood throughout their generations,' (Exod. xl. 15.) upon this account it might properly enough be called, as limited to that family, 'the everlasting priesthood.' So that God does not here promise Phinehas, and his seed after him, an everlasting grant of the priesthood, as some commentators take it; nor a grant of an everlasting priesthood, as our English version renders it, but rather a grant of the everlasting priesthood, that is, of the priesthood limited to Aaron and his descendants by that appellation.—Selden de Success. Pontif. b. 1. c. 2. Shuckford's Connection, vol. 3. b. 12.

b The Scripture gives us no account of the order of battle between these two armies; but, in all probability, they were disposed according to the method of the ancient people of Asia; and therefore we may range the Israelites upon one line, formed of twelve corps, consisting of a thousand men each, at the head of which was the 'ark of the covenant,' surrounded by the priests and Levites, whose business it was to sound the charge, as well as defend the ark. The Midianites, we may suppose, were, in like manner, ranged in a phalanx, upon one line, and as the Israelites were doubtless much inferior in number to their enemies, they made much larger intervals between the corps of a thousand men each, in order to penetrate the enemy's line in different places. This was the constant practice of the Jews, whenever they were inferior in number to their enemies.—Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Midianites.

c Whether this Phinehas was sent to command the troops which were appointed by God to take vengeance on the Midianites, or whether he went along with the army only to perform such sacred offices as should be required by the general, who, with more probability perhaps, is thought to be Joshua, are questions arising from the silence of Scripture concerning the chief commander. Phinehas, indeed, was a man of great courage, Phinehas, who took with him the ark, and what was reposed therein, together with the sacred trumpets, to blow in the time of action, in order to animate the men. The Jewish army was but small in comparison with the vast numbers they marched against; but God, who put them upon the expedition, blessed them with such success, that they slew five kings, and, among them, the wicked prophet Balaam: put every one to the sword, except women and children; and returned to Moses with a very considerable booty: one fiftieth part of which he ordered to be given to the priests, another fiftieth to the Levites, and the rest to be divided among the soldiery.

The remembrance, however, of what damage the Midianitish women had done, by alluring the Israelites to idolatry, made him think it unsafe to spare their lives; and therefore, he ordered all those that had ever known man, as well as all the d male children to be and had lately performed a singular piece of service, which had gained him great reputation, and from hence some have imagined that he was the fitter person to be sent with an army 'to avenge the Lord of Midian;' as it is certain, that in after ages, the Maccabees, who were of the family of the priests, were appointed chief commanders. But then it must be considered, that these Maccabees were the supreme governors of the people, and as such, had a right to the military command: that in the war with the Amorites, Moses had sent the forces under Joshua's conduct: and that Phinehas, in short, had another province appointed him, which was to take care of the holy instruments: but what these instruments were, is another question. Several interpreters are of opinion, that they were the Urim and Thummim which Phinehas might take along with him, in order to consult God, in case of any difficulty that might arise in the management of the war; and to countenance this, they suppose that Eleazar was superannuated, and his son substituted in his room. But it may be justly doubted whether Phinehas, being the only son of the high priest, and not yet capable of that office, could be substituted to perform this great charge, which belonged to the high priest alone: nor do we find any warrant for consulting the Lord by Urim and Thummim, but only before the tabernacle. It seems, therefore, much more likely, that by the holy instruments, Moses means the ark of the covenant, and what was included in it, which, in the following ages, was went to be carried into the field, when the people went to fight against their enemies. Nay, Joshua himself, not long after this, ordered the ark to be carried with priests blowing trumpets before it, when he surrounded Jericho, (Josh. vi. 1, &c.); and therefore, since the holy instruments are here joined with the trumpets, it looks very probable that they should signify the ark. Nor can we apprehend that Moses ran any risk in venturing the ark upon this occasion, because God had assured his people, that they should obtain a complete victory over the Midianites. It must be confessed, however, that the ark is never thus expressed in any other part of Scripture; and therefore, perhaps they give us true a sense of the words as any, who make the holy instruments and trumpets to be one and the same thing, and the latter no more than an explanation of the former; which trumpets the priests were commanded to take with them, that they might sound a charge when the engagement began, according to their direction, (Num. x. 8, 9) and as the practice was in future ages: (2 Chron. xiii. 12.)

d Moses ordered the male children to be slain, that thereby he might extirpate the whole nation, as far as lay in his power, and prevent their avenging the death of their parents, in case they were suffered to live to man's estate. For it is no hard matter to conceive how dangerous such a number of slaves, conscious that they were born free, and had lost their liberty with the massacre of their parents, might have proved to a commonwealth, every where surrounded with enemies. Why he was so severe against the women, we need not wonder, if we do but consider, that either by prostituting themselves or their daughters, they had been the chief instruments of drawing the Israelites into idolatry.—'Though no illustrious fame is got by taking revenge on a woman, and such a victory is attended with no praise. yet immediately despatched, and none ^abut virgins to be saved alive; and yet, what shows the greatness of the victory, the virgin captives amounted to 32,000, and the plunder of cattle and flocks consisted of 675,000 sheep, 72,000 oxen, and 61,000 asses, besides a great quantity of rich goods and ornaments: and, what makes the victory still more miraculous, not ^bone man on the Israelites' side, as appears from the report of the officers made upon the muster, was lost in this engagement.

The officers of the army were very sensible, that in saving the captive women alive, they had transgressed their commission; and therefore ^cthey presented a great quantity of jewels, and other rich spoils, both as an expiatory offering to atone for their offence, and for a gratulatory offering, in acknowledgment of God's goodness, in giving them so great and signal a victory.

The Israelites, by this time, had made themselves masters of the country that lay on the Midianitish side of Jordan: and the tribes of ^dReuben and Gad, together with the half tribe of Manasseh, observing that the country was fertile, and stored with good pasturage, desired of Moses that they might be permitted to settle there, as a place very commodious for them, who had large stocks of cattle; which, upon condition that they should go over Jordan, and assist their brethren in the conquest of the land of Canaan, Moses consented to. And as they were now in the neighbourhood of Canaan, and just ready to enter upon the possession of it, he took this opportunity to appoint the limits of what they were to conquer, and the distribution of it by ^eway of lot, which he committed to the management of Joshua and Eleazar, at the head of the chiefs of each tribe.

Joshua was appointed by God to succeed Moses in his commission; and therefore, to prevent any contest after his death, he first laid his own hands upon him, and then presented him to Eleazar the high priest, who in a solemn form of admission, and in the presence of all the people invested him with the office of being the leader and general of all Israel, after Moses had given him several directions relating to his office, and one more especially, which concerned his consulting of God by way of Urim and Thummim upon every great emergency. In the division of the country, Moses assigned eight and forty cities, together with their suburbs, for the Levites to live in, and withal ordered, that six of these should be made cities of refuge, whither ^fthe innocent man-shall I be praised for having put an end to what is base, and inflicted deserved punishment."—Virg. Ann. b. 2. v. 583, &c. Bibliotheca Biblica, and Le Clerc's Commentary on Num. xxxi. 17.

^a The Jews have a tradition, that in order to find out who were real virgins, the young women were placed at a proper distance with other women, and all commanded to fix their eyes upon the high priest's mitre; whereupon those who had known man turned instantly as pale as ashes, and those that had not became as red as fire. But there seems to be no great occasion for this miracle, when either the appearance of an unqualified age, or the examination of some select matrons, might determine the matter as well.—Bibliotheca Biblica on Num. xxxi. 18.

^b In the fifth chapter of the 1st book of Maccabees, we have an account of another victory of the like nature, when Judas, after having several times defeated Timotheus, the heathen general, assaulted the city of Ephron a whole day and a night, and all without the loss of a man. For 'they went up to mount Sion with joy and gladness, where they offered burnt-offerings, because not one of them was slain, until they had returned in peace.' And, if other historians may be credited, the like has happened among other nations. After the famous and bloody battle of Leuctra, the Lacedaemonians and Arcadians had a very sharp engagement, in which the latter lost many thousands of men, and the former not one; and in a sea engagement, between the Portuguese and the Indians, Osorius Lusitanus tells us, that the Portuguese admiral, Pacheco, succeeded so well, that he killed above 1500 of the infidels, without the loss of one man. (De Rebus Emman. b. 3.) But whether this had any thing miraculous in it, or was only the effect of God's ordinary providence, we shall not pretend to determine.—Bibliotheca Biblica on Num. xxi. 49.

^c The Jerusalem Targum supposes, that when these officers made their offerings, they addressed themselves to Moses in the following manner. 'Forasmuch as the Lord has delivered the Midianites into our hands, and we have subdued the country, entered into their chambers, and seen their fair and charming daughters, took their crowns of gold from off their heads, their rings from their ears and fingers, their bracelets from their arms, and their jewels from their necks and bosoms; therefore far be it from us to have turned our eyes towards them. We had no manner of concern or conversation with them, lest we should thereby die the death of the wicked in Gehenna. And let this be had in remembrance on our behalf, in the day of the great judgment, to make a reconciliation for our souls before the Lord.'

^d In the division of the country, which the Israelites took from Sihon and Og, two vanquished kings that lived on the east side of Jordan, and whose dominions extended from the river Arnon even as far as mount Hermon, (Deut. iii. 8.) Moses gave to the tribe of Reuben the southern, or rather the south-west part of the country, so that they were bounded to the south with the river Arnon; to the west with Jordan, and to the north and east with the tribe of Gad. In this tribe stood Heshbon, the capital city of the kingdom of Sihon, situate on the hills over against Jericho, about twenty miles distant from the river Jordan. The tribe of Gad was bounded with the river Jordan to the west; with the half tribe of Manasseh to the north; with the Ammonites to the east; and with the tribe of Reuben to the south. In this tribe stood Ashtaroth, the capital city of the kingdom of Og, which very likely obtained its name from an idol, which was much worshipped in those times and parts. How the half tribe of Manasseh came to choose to stay on the east side of Jordan, the sacred history makes no mention; but it is reasonable to suppose that after they found that the tribes of Reuben and Gad had succeeded in their petition, they likewise might represent to Moses the great stock of cattle which they had; that the country would be equally commodious for them, and was over large for two tribes alone to occupy; nor is it to be doubted, but that Moses was inclinable to listen to their allegation, because the sons of Machir the son of Manasseh, had by their valour subdued a great part of the country, where they settled; which was bounded by the tribe of Gad to the south; with the sea of Cimmereth, afterwards called the lake of Gennesareth, or the sea of Galilee, together with the course of the river Jordan, from its head to the said sea to the west; with Mount Lebanon, or more peculiarly Mount Hermon, to the north and north-west; and with the mountains of Gilead to the east.—Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

^e Nothing could more prudently be contrived, than this partition of the country by lot, and making Joshua and the high priest superintendents of it; since it was the only one that could effectually prevent all murmurings and quarrellings among such an obstinate people as the Jews were. However, as the lots were to bear a proportion to the bigness of each tribe and family, it is supposed from what followed, that every tribe first drew its lot for its own canton, and that then there were proper persons appointed to measure out a quantity of land for each family, according to their bigness; but whether this last was done by this or any other method; whether the subdivisions between the families were likewise carried on by lot or otherwise, sure it is, that we read of no broils or jealousies that it ever occasioned among them.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^f The person, who without any premeditated malice, killed his neighbour accidentally had the best provision imaginable made for his escape. For the ways that led to the cities of refuge, were to be made very plain and broad, and kept in good repair. Two students of the law were to accompany him, that slayer, who had killed his neighbour by chance, might betake himself and live; though at the same time he made all proper provision, that the wilful murderer should certainly be put to death; but in this, and all other capital cases, he made it a law, that none should be convicted upon the evidence of one single person.

The nearer that Moses approached his death, the more he expressed his concern for the welfare of the people; and therefore, on the first day of the eleventh month, which answers to our January, and in the fortieth year from their departure out of Egypt, being then encamped on the plains of Moab by the banks of the river Jordan, he called them all together, and at different times made two very tender and pathetic speeches, wherein he briefly related to them all that had befallen their fathers, since the time they left Egypt; the gracious dealings of God with them; their continual murmurings and rebellions against him; and the many severe judgments that had followed thereupon, even to his own exclusion from the promised land. He gave them a summary of all the laws which the divine goodness had calculated for their happiness; and having repeated the decalogue almost word for word, he reminded them of the solemn and dreadful manner in which it was delivered from mount Sinai, and of the manifold obligations they lay under to a strict observance of it. He encouraged them to be faithful to God, by assuring them, that if they kept his commandments, they should not fail of having innumerable blessings heaped upon them, and by threatening them with all manner of calamities, if so be they departed from them. He renewed the covenant which their fathers had made with God at Horeb; commanded them to proclaim on "the mountains of Gerizim and Hebal beyond Jordan, blessings to those that observed, and curses to those that broke this covenant; and to erect an altar there, whereon they were to ^b write, in a legible character, the terms and conditions of it.

if the avenger of blood should overtake him before he got to the city, they might endeavour to pacify him by wise persuasions; and that he might not miss his way to the place, whither he intended to flee, there were posts erected, where two or three ways met, with the word Miklat, that is the city of refuge, inscribed on them, to direct him into the right road that led to it.—Patrick's Commentary on Num. xxxv. 13.

^a These two mountains are situate in the tribe of Ephraim, near Shechem, in the province of Samaria, and are so near to one another, that nothing but a valley of about two hundred paces wide parts them; so that the priests, standing and pronouncing the blessings and curses, that were to attend the doers or violators of the law, in a very loud and distinct manner, might well enough be heard by the people that were seated on the sides of the two hills, especially if the priests were advanced upon pulpits, as Ezra afterwards was, (Neh. viii. 4.) and had their pulpits placed at proper distances.—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentary in Deut. xxvii.

^b In this twenty-seventh chapter of Deuteronomy, the Israelites were commanded to write upon certain stones, all the words of the law very plainly, ver. 8. How many these stones were, the Scripture makes no mention; but some are of opinion, that they were twelve, according to the number of the pillars which Moses employed (Exod. xxiv. 4.) when he made the covenant between God and his people. Knew we for certainty the number of the stones, we might better guess what part of the law it was which Moses ordered to be engraven upon them, since, by reason of this uncertainty, some will have it to be the whole Pentateuch; others, no more than the decalogue; some, that summary of the laws which is contained in this book of Deuteronomy; and others, the curses which follow from Deut. xxvii. 15. to the end of chap. xxviii. which seems to be more likely, because they con-

These, and several other directions relating to their future conduct in the land of Canaan, Moses not only delivered to the people by word of mouth, but ordered to be written in a book which he committed to the care and custody of the Levites, who, by God's appointment, laid it up on the side of the ark, there to remain a witness against the children of Israel, in case they should rebel. And that they might never want a proper fund of devotion, he composed a song, or poem, which he not only repeated to the people, but gave orders likewise that they should all learn it by heart: for therein he had expressed in a very elegant manner, the many benefits and favours of God to his people; their ingratitude and forgetfulness of him; the punishments wherewith he had afflicted them; and the comminations of greater judgments, if they persisted to provoke him by a repetition of their follies.

Such was the care and concern of the Jewish lawgiver for the welfare of the people after he was gone: and therefore, perceiving that the time of his dissolution was now at hand, he called them together; and having taken a solemn farewell of them, in a prophetic blessing, which he pronounced upon each tribe, as Jacob had done just before his death, he went ^c up to the top of Pisgah, over against Jericho, from whence he might take a full view of the country which God had promised to Abraham's posterity. For though he was an hundred and twenty years old, yet his natural strength and vigour was not impaired, nor had his eyesight in the least failed him; so that he was able to survey the beauteous prospect, which the delightful town and plains of Jericho, and the fair hills and lofty cedars of Lebanon afforded him; and having done this, he resigned his soul into the hands of seraphim, who were waiting to convey it into a happier Canaan than what he had been surveying; and to prevent the danger of the people's idolizing him when he was gone,^d tain select precepts, and the last of them seems to comprise the whole law, ver. 26. and Josh. viii. 34. But however we understand this, it is certain, that before the use of paper was found out, the ancients, particularly the Phœnicians and Egyptians, were wont to write their minds upon stones, as several authors mentioned by Huetius (Demonstrat. Eran. prop. 4. chap. 2.) do abundantly testify. Nay, he observes, that this custom continued long after the invention of paper, especially if men desired that any thing should be publicly known and transmitted down to posterity.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 3. b. 12, and Patrick's Commentary.

^c The mountains of Abarim were a ridge of hills between the two rivers Arnon and Jordan. One part of these mountains was distinguished by the name of Nebo, as it appears from Deut. xxxii. 49; and comparing this with Deut. xxxiv. 1. we shall find that Nebo and Pisgah were one and the same mountain, and that if there was any distinction between the names, it was probably this, that the top of the mountain was more peculiarly called Pisgah, because it comes from a root which signifies to elevate, or raise up, and so may very properly denote the top or summit of any mountain. Not far from Nebo, was Beth-peor, which very probably was so called from some deity of the same name, that was worshipped there. But of all these mountains it must be observed, that though they are said to be in the land of Moab, yet they really stood in the territories of Sihon, king of the Amorites, however they retained their old names, because once they belonged to the Moabites.—Num. xxi. 26.

^d This very reason we have in R. Levi Ben Ger-shon. "Future generations," says he, "might perhaps have made a god of him, because of the fame of his miracles; for do we not see how some of the Israelites erred in the brazen serpent which Moses made? And what then would they not have done, had they but known where his remains were laid?" For this reason,

God himself took care to bury his body in so secret a manner, in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor, that the place of his ^a sepulchre was never yet discovered.

very likely it was, that how much soever Moses was in love with Canaan, he did not desire to be carried thither to be buried with his ancestors, as Joseph did; because his interment in that country might have proved of dangerous consequence, if in their distress, especially in the captivity of the land, the children of Israel should have run to his sepulchre, and begged of him to pray for them, whose prayers and intercession, in their behalf, they had found in his lifetime so very prevalent.—Patrick's Commentary on Deut. xxxiv. 6.

^a But notwithstanding all this precaution of God, the Christians boast, that they have discovered the sepulchre, which has been kept secret for so many ages. For in the year 1655, some goats that were separated from the rest of the flock, went to feed in a certain place, in the mountain Nebo, and returned from thence so odoriferous and perfumed, that the shepherds, astonished at so wonderful a prodigy, ran presently to consult with the patriarch of the Maronites, who sent thither two monks from Mount Lebanon, and they discovered a monument, on which was this inscription, "Moses, the servant of the Lord." But there is too much reason to think that this is all a fiction, on purpose to raise the reputation of the Maronites, as Basnage in his history and religion of the Jews has sufficiently proved.—B. 4. c. 17.

^b Nothing can be plainer from the text, than that Moses did die, and was really buried; nay, Josephus tells us, that the Scripture affirms that he died lest people should think, because of the excellency of his person, that he was still alive, and with God. And yet, notwithstanding this, some of the Jewish doctors do positively affirm, that he was translated into heaven, where he stands and ministers before God: and of those who admit of his death, and that his soul and body were really separated, the major part will not allow that he died a common death; for their notion is, that his soul departed with a kiss, because he is said to die al pi, at the mouth (as it is literally in the Hebrew, that is, according to the word) of God; but if there be any sense in the expression, it must be that he parted with his soul with great cheerfulness and serenity of mind.—Hitsius' Miscel. Sacra.

^c The commendation which the author of Ecclesiasticus gives Moses, is conceived in these words:—"Moses was beloved of God and men, and his memorial is blessed. The Lord made him like to the glorious saints, and magnified him so, that his enemies stood in fear of him, and by his word he caused the wonders to cease, and he made him glorious in the sight of kings, gave him ordinances for his people, and showed him part of his glory. He sanctified him in his faithfulness and meekness, and chose him out of all men. He made him to hear his voice, and brought him into the dark cloud, and gave him commandments before his face, even the law of life and knowledge, that he might teach Jacob his covenant, and Israel his judgments," chap. xlv. 1, &c. The character which Josephus gives him is to this effect:—"He was a man of admirable wisdom, and one that made the best use of what he understood: an excellent speaker, and no man better skilled in moving the affections of the people than himself; and so great a master of his passions, that he lived as though he had none, or as if he only knew them by their names, or by observing them in others. Never was there a greater captain, nor a prophet equal to him; for all his words were oracles." So true is the character which the sacred writer has given of him. "There arose not a prophet since in Israel, like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, in all the signs, and the wonders, which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all the land, and in all that mighty hand, and in all that great terror which Moses showed in the sight of all Israel," Deut. xxxiv. 10, &c. "Nor was he less famous to posterity for his writings, than he was to the age he lived in for his actions." For besides the Pentateuch, which is all of his own composition, except the conclusive chapter, the ancients generally thought, that he was author of the book of Job, and of eleven psalms, which begin at the 90th, and end with the 100th; as there were once other books, as his Lesser Genesis, the Revelation of Moses, the Ascension of Moses, the Assumption of Moses, and the mysterious books of Moses, cited by some ancient writers, which were likewise ascribed to him. And though they have long since lost their authority, and been of God; and when the people of Israel came to understand that he was dead, with great solemnity, they lamented for him for the space of thirty days. ^d

CHAP. II.—Objections Answered and Difficulties Explained.

BOTH Philo and Josephus are of opinion, that the account of Moses' death and burial, of the mourning which the Israelites made for him, and of the character which, in the conclusion of Deuteronomy, we find recorded of him, was penned by Moses himself, in consequence of the presence which God was pleased to communicate to him: and the reason ¹ which Josephus gives for his thus relating the circumstances of his death beforehand, is, that the people, out of the great veneration they had for his person, might not imagine that he was translated.

But suppose this account to have been written after the death of Moses, by Joshua, Eleazar, or the seventy elders, or, as some imagine, much later, by Samuel, or even by Ezra himself, who, after the Babylonish captivity, made a revival of the sacred books; suppose it, I say, to have been written by any other hand whatever, yet this can no ways affect the authority of the rest of the Pentateuch, or imply that Moses was not the writer of it, unless we will be so perverse as to say, that the addition of some few lines, or even of a whole page, as an appendix to another man's book, makes the book no longer his.

There is another opinion, which seems very consonant both to reason, and matter of fact, and that is, that the last of the books of Moses, namely, the book of exploded as spurious; yet are they still an argument of the greatness of his name, when so many authors, to recommend their own performances, were so ambitious to assume it."—Josephus' Antiquities, b. 4. c. 8., and Calmet's Dictionary under the word Moses.

The noblest trait of his moral character, was his patriotic disinterestedness. He twice refused the tempting offer of the aggrandizement of his own family, when God threatened to reject the Israelites for their rebellions, and make of him 'a great nation' in their stead. And he left his sons without rank or patrimony, as private Levites, to subsist on the national bounty in common with their brethren! And, melancholy to relate, his grandson, 'Jonathan the son of Gershom,' and his family, became idolatrous priests to the Danites, until the capture of the ark by the Philistines, Judges xviii. 30; where the Masorette doctors to hide the disgrace to his memory, changed 'Moses' into 'Manassus,' by interpolating the letter N in the present copies of the Hebrew text. The posterity of his son Eliezer, were numerous in Solomon's time, and some of them high in office. 1 Chr. xxiii. 14—17; xxvi. 24, 25—Hales' Analysis, vol. 2. p. 256, 8vo edition.—Ed.

^d It was usual in the east to mourn for such persons as were absent from home when they died, and were buried at a distance from their relations. Irwin relates, (Travels, p. 254,) that one of the inhabitants of Ghinnah being murdered in the desert, gave birth to a mournful procession of females, which pressed through the different streets, and uttered dismal cries for his death. Josephus expressly declares it was a Jewish custom, and says, that upon the taking of Jotapata it was reported that he (Josephus) was slain, and that these accounts occasioned very great mourning at Jerusalem. It was after this manner that the Israelites lamented the death of Moses. He was absent from them when he died, neither did they carry him to the grave, but they wept for him in the plains of Moab.—Harmer, vol. 3. p. 392.—Ed.

Deuteronomy, ended with this prophetic blessing a upon the twelve tribes, 'happy art thou, O Israel! Who is like unto thee, O people, saved by the Lord,' &c. ? and that what makes now the last chapter of Deuteronomy, was formerly the first of Joshua, but thence removed and adjoined to the other by way of supplement.

Before the invention of sections, and other divisions, or so much as of pauses, and points of distinction; and when sometimes several books were connected together and following each other upon the same roll, as the ancient method of writing was, it is no hard matter to conceive, how easily the beginning of one book might be transferred to the end of another, and, in process of time, make that to be reputed the conclusion of Deuteronomy, which was originally intended for the introduction to the book of Joshua. And if this be the case, it is no wonder that we meet with several passages in this introduction which were in reality wrote by a later hand than Moses. But then, by whomsoever, or at what time soever, these passages were wrote, whether before or after the destruction of the first temple, they can no way invalidate the authority of the other parts of the book of Deuteronomy, to which imprudently, and by way of mistake perhaps, they came to be annexed: nor can the canonicalness of these very passages be called in question; since it is agreed on all hands, that they were written by a person of a prophetic spirit, and had in all ages the sanction of the great synagogue.

But whoever was the author of this additional chapter in Deuteronomy, it cannot well be accounted an impossible thing for God to show Moses the compass of the land of Canaan, from the top of Mount Nebo. The Jews indeed have a notion, that God laid before him a map of the whole country, and showed him therein how every part of it was situate; where each valley lay, each mountain stood, each river ran, and for what remarkable product each place was renowned: but if this had been all, we cannot see for what reason Moses was ordered to go upon the highest part of the mount, since in the lowest plains of Moab, he might have given him a demonstration of this kind every whit as well.

It was for some purpose, therefore, that the sacred historian has informed us, that though Moses was 120 years old, 'yet his eyes were not dim:' and if we suppose that upon this occasion God strengthened them with a greater vigour than ordinary, to enable him to take a larger prospect of the country, so that from this eminence, he might see Dan and Momit Lebanon, to the north; the lake of Sodom and the city of Zoar to the south; the Mediterranean sea to the west; and, as the town and country of Jericho were just at hand, he might easily discern the land of Gilead to the north-east. This indeed may be a compass above the stretch of human sight; but if God was pleased to assist his visive faculties a little, the matter might easily have been done; and accordingly ² some of the Jewish doctors have been wise enough in putting together both the natural clearness of Moses' eyes, and the additional strength which God at this time vouchsafed to give them: "For God showed him," say they, "the whole land as in a garden-plot; and gave his eyes such power of contemplating it, from the beginning to the end, that he saw hills and dales, what was open and what was enclosed, remote or nigh, at one single view or intuition."

The Talmudists have a very odd conceit, that the great sin for which Moses was hindered from going into the land of Canaan, was, because he called the people of God ³ rebels; and from thence they have formed a maxim, that "he who treats the church, which ought to be honoured, with contempt, is, as if he blasphemed the name of God." But in opposition to this, it should be considered, that Moses on this occasion, uses the very same language that God himself does, when he bids him ⁴ 'lay up the rod of Aaron, as a token against the rebels;' and that if this was the thing wherein he offended God, he not long after committed the same thing, which he would hardly have done, considering already that it had cost him so dear, when he told the people plainly, ⁵ 'Ye have been rebellious against the Lord, ever since I knew you.'

Several Christians, as well as Jewish expositors, think, that the transgression of Moses lay in suiting the rock, when his instructions only were to speak to it; and for the support of this, they allege that God is an absolute sovereign, expecting an absolute obedience, and exacting punishment even of his greatest favourites, when they pretend to vary from his commands, or to mix their own conceptions with his directions: and that there was some such prevarication in the conduct of Moses and Aaron, seems to be implied in God's remonstrance, which immediately follows; ⁶ 'because ye believe me not,' or, as it should be translated, because 'ye were not faithful to me, to' (sanctify and) 'glorify me in the eyes of the children of Israel; therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them.'

It is granted, indeed, that God ordered Moses to take his rod with him, and why should he take it, unless it were to strike the rock, as he had done before? But the Israelites perhaps began now to entertain a superstitious fancy of the virtue of this rod, which had been the instrument of so many miracles wrought before them; and therefore God was minded to give Moses an opportunity of convincing them of their folly, by making it appear, that neither himself, nor Aaron, nor the rod, was of any importance; that he alone was the worker of miracles, which he was able at any time to do, by a word's speaking. This had been doing justice to the honour of God, but instead of this Moses spake and acted ⁷ unadvisedly, that is, he spake and acted of himself, and what he had no commission to do, and thereby gave the Israelites an opportunity to imagine, that the supply of water might come from him, from his power and ability to procure it. The truth is, the divine writers, who have touched upon this history, have made mention of two defaults in Moses, namely, his impatience and his infidelity; and therefore we may suppose, that (the water now ceasing at the time, ⁸ when his sister Miriam died) he was exceedingly troubled on both these accounts; that unexpectedly assaulted by the people, who ought to have paid him more reverence, especially in a time of mourning, he fell into a greater commotion of anger and indignation, than was usual in him; and that this anger gave such a disturbance to his mind, and so disordered his thoughts, that when God bade him 'take his rod, and go, and speak to the rock,' he fell into some doubt, whether the divine goodness would grant the people the same favour he had done before; that therefore he struck the rock with diffidence, believing it improbable that such worthless and rebellious wretches should deserve a miracle; and that the water not issuing out at the first stroke, his diffidence increased into unbelief, and a settled persuasion that they should have none at all.

There is one conjecture more of a very learned¹ man, which I shall but just mention, namely, that Moses began to distrust God's promise of entering into the land of Canaan at the end of forty years, and to imagine, that if he brought water again out of the rock, it must follow them as long as the other had done, and engage them again in the like wanderings; and therefore the comment which he makes upon Moses' words is this:—'What, ye rebels, must we bring water out of the rock, as we did at Horeb? Are all our hopes and expectations of getting out of the wilderness come to this? We never fetched water out of the rock but once, and that was, because we were to stay a long time in the wilderness; and must we begin our abode here again, when we thought we had attained to the end of our travels? And with that he smote the rock in a passion twice; whereas God had commanded him only to speak to it. But whichever of these conjectures we are inclined to think most plausible, there are few writers who are not disposed to extenuate the fault of Moses, as not deserving so severe a punishment, had not God, in passing the sentence of exclusion upon him, considered the eminence and dignity of a person in his station, in whom a transgression of any kind could not but be far more grievous and inexcusable, than in an ordinary man.

For this reason we may observe, that when Moses has related the wickedness and punishment of Zimri, he takes care to inform us² of his family, his titles, and his high station in life. He was the prince of a tribe, the head of thousands in Israel, and one of the renowned men of the congregation. In this capacity he had a right to be an assessor with Moses and Aaron, and the other rulers in the government of the people; and consequently could not regularly be brought under the sentence of those judges who were inferior to him. This he knew full well; and therefore, in defiance of the laws, and in contempt of all authority,³ while 'the children of Israel were weeping before the door of the congregation in the sight of Moses, and in the sight of all the people, he brought a Midianitish woman into his tent. Moses had ordered the⁴ 'judges to slay every one his men that were joined to Baal-peor;' but we hear of none that were punished for this wickedness, except this Zimri, and those that afterwards died in the plague: the transgression was become too universal to be corrected by a judiciary proceeding, and the example of so leading a man was enough to bear all down before it, and make the infection spread. God had already ordered, that the persons who committed this great offence should⁵ be punished in a very exemplary manner: in regard to God, therefore, Zimri was under sentence of condemnation, and as his guilt was too glaring and notorious to need conviction, and the judges were found timorous and remiss in the execution of their office, there was certainly wanting, on this important occasion, a proper person to supply their place.

Now, that the act of Phinehas in slaying Zimri was not the effect of zeal, and warm resentment only, but of a divine impulse and instigation so to do, I think is evident from the testimony of God himself, when he declares to Moses, 'that Phinehas,' by the death of Zimri, 'had made an atonement for the children of Israel.' For what atonement could he pretend to make, unless God had appointed him? 'No man taketh this honour upon himself,' neither can any one perform this office to good purpose, 'but he that is called of God, as was Aaron.' And therefore, there is no propriety in the words, unless we suppose that God ordered Phinehas to make a propitiatory sacrifice of the blood of the offenders; and for the confirmation of this, we find God requiring of Moses to say to the people, 'Behold I give unto him my covenant of peace;' or, as it should more truly be rendered, 'Behold it was I who gave unto him my covenant of peace:' the intent of which declaration is to inform the congregation, that Phinehas had not done a rash action out of his own mere motion and warmth of heart, but that he had the immediate direction and appointment of God for what he did; that God had made a previous covenant with him to that purpose; and given him positive assurance, that upon the death of Zimri and Cosbi, slain by his hands, the wickedness that had been committed in the camp should be forgiven. And therefore we find God espousing the deed, and in a kind of exultation, declaring⁶ 'Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, the priest, in being thus zealous for my sake, hath turned away my wrath from the children of Israel.' In this view of the fact all is clear; nor can this example lay any foundation for a dangerous imitation, because it will in no wise prove that an illegal action, though proceeding from a most upright heart, zealously affected in a good thing, is ever to be justified, unless God, by an express and well-attested revelation from heaven, declares his patronage and acceptance of it.^a

The Jews, who love to magnify miracles sometimes beyond their proper bounds, have a current tradition that the clothes grew bigger according as the children themselves increased in bulk and stature: but there is no occasion for any such supposition as this; since the younger, in their proper degrees, might succeed to the vestments of the elder, and the miracle still remain wonderful enough, that God should preserve these vestments from decaying, or their feet, by so long travelling in hot and stony places, from swelling, or being callous, as some translate it, for the space of forty years. Some, indeed, will have the phrase to denote that their feet

^a It may be remarked, that God had pronounced sentence of death against all who had offended, or should offend, as Zimri had done, (ver. 3, 5); and that Phinehas in slaying him, did nothing but what it was the duty of any man to do, who had courage to undertake it.—Ed.

were not sensible of any uneasiness or fatigue, through the whole vast length of their journey; but this construction is plainly repugnant¹ to the Scripture account we have of their travels; and therefore the easier interpretation will be, if, by way of metonymy, we take the shoe for the foot, and so make the latter agree with the former part of the verse, and bring the whole to this meaning, namely, "that as their clothes which covered the whole body, did not become useless through age, so neither did their shoes decay, or burst, or grow out of shape, (for in all these senses may the original word be taken,) though they were engaged in so tedious a march."

It is to be observed, however, that the Hebrews wanted neither flocks nor herds in the wilderness; and the hangings, and other works belonging to the tabernacle, sufficiently show that they were no strangers to the art of weaving. But supposing they did not manufacture their own clothes, they might, however, purchase them from the Arabians, and other neighbouring nations, and could therefore be under no want of a sufficient supply of this kind of necessaries. And, from these considerations,² a learned commentator concludes, that the sense of the words, 'thy raiment waxed not old upon thee,' must be—That in the deserts of Arabia, the Israelites had so great a plenty of clothes, and so many changes of raiment, that they were under no more necessity to wear them tattered, or threadbare, than if they had lived in one of the most plentiful, rich, and cloth-working countries. And thy feet did not swell, or grow callous, as poor people's feet are wont to do, when the soles of their shoes are worn out, and they forced to tread upon the hard ground; for so it is explained in another place,³ 'thy shoe did not wax old upon thy foot,' that is, thy poverty did not oblige thee to wear thy shoes (as poor people do) until they were old, and grown so very thin, that in hard and stony ways they hurt thy feet, and made them swell. Poverty, we know, necessarily occasions a meanness of apparel; but men of large fortunes have a variety of suits, and commonly cast their clothes off before they are too far worn: and, in like manner, the historian's design is, in this instance of raiment, to signify to us, that the Israelites, while they abode in a barren wilderness, lived like men of affluence; ⁴ 'for the Lord their God was with them,' as he tells us elsewhere, 'and they lacked nothing.'⁵

⁴ Deut. ii. 7.

^a The common opinion, that the raiment and shoes of the Israelites were not, is certainly absurd. That they had carvers, engravers, silversmiths, and jewellers among them, plainly appears from the account we have of the tabernacle and its utensils; and that they knew how to spin and weave, is evident from Exod. xxxv. 25, 26. The meaning therefore is, that God provided them with all sufficient clothing. On any other supposition he would require, not one miracle, but a chain of the most astonishing miracles ever wrought to account for the thing; for as there were not less than 600,000 males born in the wilderness, it would imply that the clothes of the infant grew up with the increase of his body to manhood, which would require a miracle to be continually wrought on every thread, and on every particle of matter of which that thread was composed. And this is not all: it would imply that the clothes of the parent became miraculously lessened to fit the body of the child, with whose growth they were again to stretch and grow, &c. No such miraculous interference was necessary.—Ed.

But how well soever God might provide for the Israelites in this, and all other instances of his paternal care, yet we cannot think with some predestinarians, that, like an over-fond parent, he was blind to their faults. The word aven, which we translate iniquity, and the word amal, which we render perverse-ness, do both very frequently signify in Scripture the highest kind of wickedness, that is, idolatry; and so the reason which Balaam assigns why God had blessed the Israelites, and would not curse them, is, that they had not as yet incurred the sin of idolatry.⁶ Some private men might perhaps be guilty of it, but it was not yet become national and epidemical; nor were there any hopes that God would ever deliver them into the power of their enemies, unless, some way or other, they should be seduced into that sin; and therefore Balaam advised the prince of Moab, by the allurements of some beautiful women, to entice them into it, as the likeliest way to deprive them of the divine protection.

Others take the words in a common sense, to denote sin, or wickedness in general; but then, by the words see, or behold, they understand such an observation of this wickedness as marks it out for punishment. According to this observation, they make the meaning of the phrase to be, that "though the Israelites were confessedly guilty of many great crimes, yet since they were not universally so, God would have more regard to his own promises than to the sins of some particulars; because he is a God of perfect veracity, and the unbelief and impiety of ill men shall not have force enough with him to recall and annul his promises to the good."

There is another signification of the word, which we render behold, and that is, 'to look upon with pleasure and approbation:' and ⁵ therefore, as the particle both does frequently signify against, as well as in, and ⁶ so occurs in several parts of Scripture, the sense of the words will naturally run thus, "God does not approve of any wicked designs or practices against Jacob;" for the words which we render iniquity and perverse-ness, do equally signify outrage or oppression, deceit, or machinations of any kind, which God declares he would not suffer to be attempted against his people. And therefore Balaam, upon a review of the many blessings and deliverances which God had vouchsafed them, breaks out into this reflection, and therewith concludes his pro-

^b Boothroyd, following the Samaritan and Syrian versions, translates the verses here referred to (Num. xviii. 20, 21.) thus:—

Behold! I have received a command to bless;
For God hath blessed, and I cannot revoke it.
I behold no trouble in Jacob,
Nor do I see distress in Israel.
Jehovah, their God is with them,
And to him they shout as their King.

This preserves the order of the narrative; and the two latter lines contain the reason of their happy circumstances. The common version is at variance with the whole narrative of Moses. How frequently are we told of their iniquities and perverse-ness. (Boothroyd on the passage.) The Targum of Onkelos, however, supports the view given in the text, and paraphrases the verse thus:—"I see that there are none who worship idols in the house of Jacob, (and there appears to have been none at that period,) nor any servants of trouble or vanity," as idols were called in Israel.—See also Patrick's Commentary, and Taylor's Hebrew Concordance.—Ed.

phetic speech: ¹ 'Behold, the people shall rise up as a great lion, and lift up himself as a young lion; he shall not lie down until he eat of the prey, and drink of the blood.'

Thus, in what sense soever we take the words, whether as relating to idolatry, of which the Israelites, in the main, were not at that time guilty; or to wickedness in general, which God's promises to the forefathers restrained him from punishing, though they might be guilty; or to the evil designs and practices against his people, which his justice and goodness both obliged him to disapprove; we shall have no reason to accuse him of a blind partiality towards them, but much, very much, to cry out with the inspired writers, ² 'Righteous art thou, O Lord, and true is thy judgment; ³ with the holy, thou shalt be holy; and with the upright man thou shalt be perfect; for the Lord knoweth who are his, and ⁴ can rightly distinguish 'between those that serve him, and those that serve him not.'

Of the number of those who served not God, Balaam was certainly one; and yet we have reason to presume, that he nevertheless was a real prophet. The Jews, indeed, are generally of opinion, that he was a busy and pretending astrologer, who, observing when men were under a bad aspect of the stars, pronounced a curse upon them; which sometimes coming to pass, gained him, in some neighbouring nations, a reputation in his way. Several of the ancient fathers suppose him to be no more than a common soothsayer, for so he ⁴ is called, who undertook to foretell future events, and discover secrets, &c., but by no good and justifiable arts. Origen will needs have it, that he was no prophet, but only one of the devil's sorcerers: and that of him he went to inquire; but God was pleased to prevent him, and ^a to put what answers he pleased into his mouth. It cannot be denied, however, but that ⁵ the Scripture expressly calls him a prophet; and therefore some later writers have imagined, that he had been once a good man, and a true prophet, till loving the wages of iniquity, and prostituting the honour of his office to covetousness, he apostatized from God, and betaking himself to idolatrous practices, fell under the delusion of the devil, of whom he learnt all his magical enchantments; though at this juncture, when the preservation of his people was concerned, it might consist with God's wisdom to appear to him, and vouchsafe his revelations.

Balaam indeed was a man of no great probity, and might by profession be a diviner; but by the free access he had to God, it seems to be apparent, that he was no common sorcerer, or prophet of the devil: for did ever any sorcerer address his prayers to the supreme God, and receive answers and instructions from him? Did ever any sorcerer prescribe a law to himself, to say nothing less or more than what the Spirit of God should dictate? The Spirit of God, when did it ever come upon an enchanter? Or was it ever known, that an oracle, upon a remote event, and what God alone was capable of revealing, should be declared by a mere magician?

When God was pleased to give answers to his inquiries, to make his angel appear to him, and to put the word of prophecy in his mouth, on all these occasions, we find him expressing no surprise at all, as if he had been perfectly well acquainted with these several ways of divine communication; and therefore, bad as he was, and a slave to his passions, he must nevertheless be deemed a true prophet of God. The only suspicious passage in his conduct, is his having recourse to enchantments; for ⁶ 'what concord hath God with Belial?' Or what service could he possibly promise himself by making use of these? But to this it may be replied, that ⁷ the arts of magicians, and their incantations to procure oracles and prodigies, were, by the greatest philosophers of those times, held in great veneration, and by them reputed to be true. Though therefore this Balaam was really a prophet, yet as a man of learning, he might not be a stranger to the theory of what human science, and the then reputed natural knowledge had advanced upon these subjects: and as Saul, though he had before ⁸ 'put away those that had familiar spirits, and the wizards out of the land; was yet induced, 'when the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets, to go to a woman that had a familiar spirit, and inquire of her;' so Balaam finding nothing but a full disappointment in all his views, in the several revelations which God was pleased to make to him, and being warmly inclined to purchase, if he might with any colour be able to do it, the advancement which Balak had offered him, was tempted to try what might be the event, if he used some of the arts which most learned nations held in the highest repute, and esteemed to be of the greatest efficacy. He tried, but 'found ⁹ no enchantment against Jacob, nor any divination against Israel.'

To enter therefore into the character of this true prophet and enchanter both, we must observe, 1st, That before the giving of the law, and the conquest of the promised land, there were other ^b true worshippers of God, besides the descendants of Abraham, dispersed over the face of the earth. 2dly, That this worship of God ^c was frequently mixed with such superstition and idolatry, even among them who professed to adore that one God of heaven and earth. 3dly, That this odious mixture did not hinder God ^d from revealing himself to those who practised such a monstrous and motley religion. 4thly, That supernatural gifts in general, and those of prophecy in particular, though they enlightened the minds of the prophets, yet, * many times, did not sanctify their hearts and affections. And, 5thly, That the greatest weakness or wickedness of prophets never went so far, as to make them pronounce oracles contrary to what was dictated to them by the Spirit of God: ' If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord, to do either good or bad of my own mind, but what the Lord saith that must I speak.'

^a To this purpose Philo, in his life of Moses, brings in an angel discoursing with Balaam to this effect. "It will be in vain for you to contend; for I, without your privity or knowledge, will guide the organs of your mouth, and make you speak what upon this occasion is fit and proper. I will direct your speech, and cause you to utter prophecies, though you know nothing of the matter." Several passages to the same purpose, are likewise to be found in Josephus, (Antiquities, b. 4. c. 7.) though there is no foundation for them in what Moses tells us concerning these adventures of Balaam.

It is not to be questioned, therefore, but that Balaam was conscious of his own inspiration, and did knowingly obey the divine will; but still he could have wished, for Balak's sake, as well as his own, that he might have been permitted to pronounce different things, to what he did; even as the prophets of Israel, in future ages, when ordered to denounce judgments against the people, would have desired liberty, no doubt, to prophesy things of a more grateful relish; but as they could not have that permission, they obeyed, though with some reluctance, and when they came to the point, did nevertheless pronounce boldly what they were ordered to pronounce.

And this, by the way, will, in some measure, account for the odd mixture in Balaam's behaviour, namely, his seeking for enchantments in one minute, and falling into a fit of devotion in the next. For besides that the words which he utters upon this occasion, are not properly his own, but infused into him by the Spirit of God, and for which, consequently, he is not responsible, to hear a wicked man sometimes come out with a pious wish, or holy ejaculation, can be no incongruous thing at all. ² The character of virtue is so very beautiful, its end so comfortable, and the odour of its memory so sweet, that even wicked men cannot see and hear it, without secretly preferring it, and inwardly sighing for it, and wishing at least that it were their own: and therefore it is no wonder, that even Balaam, under some sudden compunction of mind, or conviction of the amiableness and happy estate of virtue, both here and hereafter, should desire to die the righteous man's death. But there is something more to be said for Balaam in this respect, than for other wicked men; and that is, the business he was now about. The whole series of his behaviour indeed shows him to be a vain and ostentatious man. By the preamble to his prophecies, ³ ' Balaam, the son of Beor, hath said, and the man whose eyes are open, who knew the knowledge of the most High, and saw the vision of the Almighty, hath said,' &c., he would make us believe, that he was a man of no small consideration, vastly familiar with God, and ^b quite superior to the little pretenders of his age; and as we may farther observe, that in all his intercourse with Balak, he never pretended to consult any but God, we cannot but think, that to seem to be in earnest about the matter, and now and then drop a religious sentence, was no more than what became the business he was upon, and the character he thought proper to assume, even supposing the words to have been of his own invention, which, as we said before, were of divine inspiration.

Of all the prophecies which God at this time delivered from the mouth of Balaam, there was one of a more eminent and peculiar nature: ⁴ ' I shall see him, but not now; I shall behold him, but not nigh; there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall arise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Seth.' All opinions agree in this, that Balaam here speaks of a king and conqueror; and perhaps in calling him a star, he accommodates himself to the long established notion, ^a that the appearances of comets denoted either the exaltation or destruction of kingdoms: but the great question is, of what king or conqueror is it that he speaks?

⁵ Some have applied the prophecy entirely to David, the most illustrious of the Jewish monarchs, who extended his conquests far and wide. ⁶ Others have applied it as entirely to the Messiah, supposing that the metaphor of a star comports better with him, and his celestial origin, than with David; and that the main strokes of the prophecy resemble an heavenly, more than an earthly conqueror. The matter, however, may be compromised, if we will but allow ⁷ of a learned man's observation, namely, that the most remarkable prophecies in the Old Testament, bear usually a twofold sense; one relating to the times before the Messiah, and the other, either fulfilled in the person of the Messiah, or in the members of his body, the church, of which kind we may justly esteem the preceding prophecy. For though its primary aspect may be towards David, yet whoever considers it attentively shall perceive, that its ideas are too full to extend no farther, and must therefore, in a secondary and more exalted sense, refer us to Christ, ' whose kingdom ruleth over all,' and ' to whom all things are put in subjection under his feet.'

In this sense, the generality of Jews as well as Christians, have all along understood it; and it is no improbable conjecture, ^a whatever some may think of it, that by the strength of this prophecy, kept upon record among the oriental archives, the magi of that country, at our Saviour's nativity, were directed to Jerusalem, and inquired, ⁸ ' Where is the king of the Jews, for we have seen his star in the east?' And, upon a farther supposition, that these very magi were descended from Balaam in a direct line, he might then, with propriety enough, pronounce of the Messiah, 'I shall see him,' that is, see him in my posterity, 'but not now; I shall behold him but not near.'

The promise or prediction which God orders Moses to make to the Israelites, is this, ¹ 'I will raise them up a prophet, from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth, and he shall speak unto them all that I command him.' Now in order to discover wherein the similitude between Moses and this prophet was to consist, we must inquire into the particulars that distinguished Moses from the rest of the prophets; and accordingly we find God himself, upon a small sedition that Aaron and his sister were engaged in against him, making this declaration in his favour: ² 'If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known to him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream; but my servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all his house, with him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches:' and what he means by speaking apparently, we find explained, when we are told, 'that ³ the Lord spake to Moses face to face, as a man speaketh to his friend.' This was the distinguishing character of Moses, and in this particular neither Joshua, nor any of the succeeding prophets could pretend to be like unto him. They never saw God's glorious presence, nor heard him speak distinctly. He did not converse familiarly with them, but whatever he had to communicate, he did it by way of visions, or dreams, or some dark and enigmatical expressions.

⁴ They indeed had no special commission, no new institutes of religion to publish, nor had they usually any extraordinary credentials to produce. Their business in short, was to explain and inculcate the law which Moses gave, and even in this it is hardly supposable, that they were always infallibly directed, because it is said of several of them, that ⁵ 'they erred in vision, and stumbled in judgment.' So that with no propriety can it be affirmed of them that 'they were like Moses,' much less can that additional character belong to them 'I will put my words in his mouth, and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him;' which certainly implies an extraordinary commission to publish something that was not revealed before.

But now, when it is said of the blessed Jesus, that he was ⁶ 'a teacher sent from God, for that no man could do the miracles which he did, except God were with him;' that he came, to ⁷ 'declare God,' or what is all one, to reveal a new religion, ⁸ 'which was confirmed by signs and mighty wonders;' and to qualify him for this, that he ⁹ 'was from the beginning with God,' and ¹⁰ 'is in the bosom of the Father:' when it is expressly said, that he is ¹¹ 'the mediator of a new covenant in his blood, for the redemption of the transgressions of the former covenant;' and ¹² 'as Moses was faithful in all his house, as a servant, for a testimony of these things which were to be spoken after; so he, as a Son, was faithful to him that appointed him, and was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he, who hath built the house, hath more honour than the house:' when all this, I say, is affirmed and verified of Christ, it is manifest, that the great lines of the prophetic description we are now considering, in their true primary sense, meet only in him, who is the 'express image of his Father,' ¹³ in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom, and knowledge.' But to return to Balaam.

Whatever opinion we may have of the matter, it is certain, that some of the wisest nations among the heathens had a great conception of the power of their prophets, and thought that they were persons in high favour and esteem with their gods, who were always inclinable to listen to and ratify either their benedictions or execrations. ^a The imprecations of these men, as ¹⁴ Plutarch informs us, were by the Romans held so very efficacious, that whoever was under them, could not possibly escape; and therefore we need not wonder, that in conformity to this custom, we find Balak sending for 'Balaam to come and curse' the Israelites for him, since it was his settled persuasion, ¹⁵ 'that he whom he blessed was blessed, and he whom he cursed was cursed.'

But though Balak acted according to the prevailing prejudices of that age, in sending for Balaam, yet God had sufficient reason to be angry with him for going. He had once consulted God about cursing the people of Israel, and had received a very full and peremptory answer, forbidding him to go about it; 'Thou shalt not curse the people, for they are blessed.' This reason, however, he kept to himself; for had he communicated it to the ambassadors at first, in all probability, they would not have importuned him anew to go: but his covetousness urged him on, and the rich presents and promises which the messengers the second time brought, began to operate so very powerfully, that he forgot his reverence to the divine Majesty, and presumed once more to consult him about going.

Upon this occasion the sacred historian relates the matter thus:—¹⁶ 'And God came unto Balaam at night, and said unto him, If the men come to call thee, rise up and go with them: and Balaam rose up in the morning, and saddled his ass, and went with the princes of Moab, and God's anger was kindled because he went.' What, angry for what himself commanded him to do? ¹⁷ Our translators indeed thus render the text; but the Hebrew words

^a The Romans were of opinion, that by a certain form of imprecation, they could demolish towns, and defeat whole armies of their enemies: and what the usual form for this purpose was, Macrobius has taken care to leave us in these words:—'O father Pluto, or Jove, or by whatever other name it is proper to address thee, I entreat that thou mayest load with fear, alarm, and consternation, the whole of that city and army, which I feel that I am pronouncing; and may thou drag hence and deprive of the light of life all those who bear arms against us, our legions, and armies; destroy these armies, these foes, these men, their territories, and all who dwell in their dominion, in town or country. Deliver up to the hands of their enemies, the cities and territories of those whom I feel that I now pronounce; reckon as accursed and damned the whole of their cities, lands, and persons; granting assurance and safety to me, my fealty, and office,—to the legions and armies engaged in performing these purposes;—for myself, oath, office, and the Roman people, their legions, and armies I deliver up and devote in our stead, these enemies, as substitutes for punishment. are clear of this absurdity; for they tell us, that 'God's anger was kindled,' not ci halak, 'because he went,' but ci halak hua, 'because he went of himself,' that is, without staying for Balak's messengers to come in the morning to call him. He had told them over night, that an 'house full of silver and gold' could not tempt him to go counter to what God should direct him to do; and by this vaunting speech they very possibly might think their master's offers neglected, and be tempted to go away next morning without him; but so full were his head and heart of expectations from the journey, that he would not run the hazard of their calling; but rose up early in the morning, went himself to them, which was acting directly contrary to God's express order, for which reason he sent his 'angel to stand in his way for an adversary against him.' By the mouth of his angel, however, God permitted him to go, as knowing very well that his journey would tend to his confusion, and the manifestation of his people's glory. For though there was nothing but malice in the prophet's heart, and a fixed determination to do all the harm he could to the Israelites; yet God, by his overruling providence, directed his words so, as to make them, upon every essay to curse, pregnant with blessings. Had not God forbidden the prophet to go upon his first application for leave, he had not declared his aversion to Balak's wicked project: had he not allowed him to go upon his further importunity, he had not exposed his folly and madness, as well as the weakness of his magical arts, so effectually: but now, in the wise method which he took, he defeated the designs of the wicked, and 'made the wrath of man to praise him;' he hath shown us, that no enchantments, no machinations can prevail, where he undertakes to protect; and¹ has left us this lesson of instruction, "That when men are foolish and self-willed, and in the pursuit of their corrupt views, will follow their own ways, notwithstanding many kind hints and admonitions to the contrary, God then abandons them to their own imaginations, which, in the event, very frequently prove their ruin."

It cannot be denied, indeed, but that God gave Balaam sundry admonitions, not to follow, in this headstrong manner, the pursuit of his avarice. His enjoining him not to go, when the princes of Moab first came for him; his sending an angel in the road to rebuke him for his rash and madvised proceeding; and when he was come to Balak, his overruling his words upon three different attempts, and making him pronounce what was least of all his intention, were sufficient remembrancers, that his ways could not possibly be right before God. But of all others, the speaking of his ass was such a miraculous incident, as would have made any considering man, one would think, retract his purpose.

This indeed is so wonderful an instance, that several of the Jewish doctors, who, upon other occasions, are fond enough of miracles, seem as if they would hardly be induced to assent to this. Philo, in his life of Moses, passes it over in silence; and² Maimonides pretends, that it only happened to Balaam in a prophetic vision. An inspired writer in the New Testament assures us, that it was a real fact, as Moses relates it. Moses says, that 'the Lord opened the mouth of the ass, and she said unto Balaam;' and St Peter tells us, that the ass,

'speaking with man's voice, forbade the madness of the prophet;' an human voice came out of the mouth of the ass; but I do not apprehend, that this voice proceeded from her own sentiments. Her tongue was miraculously moved, not by any power of hers so to move it, and it spake what it was moved to utter, without any connexion of her words and sentiments, and without her understanding the very words she uttered upon this occasion. This seems to have been the fact, and the severest philosophy, I hope, cannot deny, that God is as able to make creatures, destitute of understanding, pronounce articulate and rational words, as it is for a musician, by the different touches he gives any instrument, to make it express a variety of notes.

It may seem a little strange indeed, that Balaam should show no kind of surprise, when he heard his ass speak like a human creature: but to this³ some reply, that Balaam might probably have imbibed the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, which was certainly very common in the east, and from thence might be less astonished to hear any brute speak; whereas⁴ others suppose, that he was in such a rage and fury at the supposed perverseness of his beast 'crushing his foot,' and 'falling down under him,' that for the present, he could think of nothing else; though the conciseness of Moses' narration, that must be presumed to have omitted many circumstances, which if rightly known would dispel this, and many more difficulties that may be imagined in this transaction, does certainly furnish us with a better and more satisfactory answer. For,⁵ though we could not assign a sufficient reason why God thought fit to work this miracle, yet who shall therefore dare to infer that it was never wrought? The account which we have here even of the most ancient times is very short; nor can we rightly form a judgment what the prevailing sentiments of the world might be, in the age when Balaam lived. The counsels of God are likewise a great deep, nor can any man so far penetrate into them, as to pronounce what is proper or improper for him to do. Upon this occasion, however, there seems to be some reason for his giving the ass the faculty of speech, namely, that thereby he might convince the princes of Moab, who are supposed to be in company with Balaam, how easy a thing it was for him, who had opened the mouth of this dumb creature, to stop that of its owner, or to direct his words to what purposes he pleased; and⁶ how weak and impotent was the man in whom they confided, when, with all his curses and imprecations, he could not get the better of a poor brute, and much less then of the people, so immediately under the divine protection.

The Scripture indeed informs us, that after his fruitless negotiation with Balak,⁷ he returned to his own place: and so he might return to Mesopotamia, and yet when he heard of the success of his advice against the Israelites, and how many thousands of them had been cut off in consequence of it, he might go back again to the Midianites in hopes of obtaining an ample reward for his services; or when war was declared against them, the Midianites themselves might possibly send for him again, and he be the rather inclined to go, because now he might have some hopes of cursing the Israelites with success, since they had apostatized from the worship of their God, and fallen into idolatry, which while they stood clear of, he knew he would not be permitted to do; and it is not unlikely, that for this purpose he was carried into the field of battle, and there became a sacrifice to his own evil policy.

It is a sad perversion of the sense of Scripture, when God, in condescension to our capacities, is pleased to make use of human words and phrases, to account that condescension, not only an impropriety of speech, but a disparagement likewise to the divine nature and perfections. The Scripture indeed makes mention of God's 'swearing in his wrath;' but who would ever think, that the form of this expression should give any disgust, or the sense of it be thought repugnant to the natural notions we have of God? He that at all considers the end and intent of an oath, must allow it to be a solemn asseveration, made as strong and binding as possible, in order to beget faith and confidence in others, or to procure a sure belief of what is so affirmed. When men swear, nothing can make their asseveration so strong and binding, as the invocation of God to be their witness, or avenger: and in like manner, when God himself is said to swear, we are to suppose, that he enforces and strengthens his asseveration as much as possible, or as much as is proper, to beget the highest trust and confidence in his revelations, not by invoking a superior, for that, we may say, is not in his power, but by condescending to make use of human forms of swearing, with such proper alterations as the case requires. Thus, when God swears ² by himself, or ³ by his great name, or ⁴ by his life, or ⁵ by his right hand, or ⁶ by his holiness, or ⁷ by his truth, or ⁸ his excellency, or any other of his attributes or perfections, the meaning of these expressions is much the same, namely, that he thereby declares the thing to be as certain, and as surely to be depended on, as his own being or attributes are. This, I say, is the whole purport of the thing; and God is therefore said to make use of this manner of speaking, only because it is more awful and solemn, and consequently apt to make deeper impressions, and beget a stronger confidence in the hearers than a naked declaration can.

It is the manner of the Scripture to ascribe to God hands, eyes, and feet; but the design is not that we should believe that he has any of these members according to the literal signification; but only that he has a power to execute all those acts, to which these members in us are so very subservient. It is the manner of the same Scripture, to represent him as affected with the like passions that we feel in ourselves, when we are angry or pleased, have our hearts attendered or provoked to revenge; and yet, upon reflection, we cannot think that any of these passions are inherent in the divine nature; but the meaning only is ⁹ that God will as certainly punish the wicked, as if he were inflamed with the passion of anger or revenge; and as infallibly relieve or reward the good, as we will those for whom we have tender compassion or affectionate love. So that it is only by way of analogy and comparison, that the nature and passions of men are ascribed to God; and therefore certainly, when he is pleased to express himself in accommodation to our capacities, instead of making it a matter of cavil and reproach, we ought to be thankful for his condescension, and to interpret his words in a sense suitable to his divine Majesty.

It cannot be denied, indeed, but that the utter extirpation of the Canaanites carries a face of rigour and severity, not so very consistent with God's frequent declarations of his mercy and long-suffering; but then it should be considered, that as he is full of lenity and mercy to those that endeavour to please him, so he has thought fit to declare with the same breath, that he will ¹⁰ 'by no means clear the guilty.' Let us then see how the case stood between God and these nations, when the Israelites were sent to dispossess them.

There is no question to be made, but that most of these people had at first the true worship of God instituted amongst them, and that their several progenitors took care to leave behind them worthy conceptions of him; but notwithstanding this, in the days of Moses we find their notions so corrupted, and all kinds of idolatry so publicly established, that the land is said to have been defiled with them, and like a stomach overcharged with unwholesome diet, to have nauseated, ¹¹ 'and spued them up.'

In denouncing the sentence of their excision, therefore, ¹² 'Ye shall smite them, and utterly destroy them, and save alive nothing that breatheth,' God intimates the reason of his severity by the enumeration of these particulars; ¹³ 'Ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their statues, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire;' even the images of Chemosh, and Peor, and Moloch, and other detestable idols, to whom they are said to have offered human sacrifices, and to have ¹⁴ 'made their seed pass through the fire.' Nor was their idolatry less provoking, than the corruption of their morals, since adultery and bestiality of all kinds, incest, and all manner of uncleanness they both avowedly practised, and ¹⁵ 'took pleasure in those that did them.'

The Midianish women, in particular, by prostituting their bodies, in order to draw the young Israelites into idolatry, had given sufficient evidence of their incorrigible attachment to wickedness, and how impossible it would be for the people whom God had selected from the rest of the world to preserve their integrity, if these, and such like public seducers, were permitted to live among them; and therefore God assigns this as another reason for their extirpation: ¹⁶ 'Because thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God, and he hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that be upon the face of the earth;' ¹⁷ therefore 'shalt thou consume all the people, which the Lord thy God shall deliver into thy hands; thine eyes shall have no pity upon them, lest they turn thee away from following me, to serve other gods, which will surely be a snare unto thee.⁷

Now, if either the incorrigible wickedness of any people, or the danger of their corrupting others by their enticements and bad examples, may be deemed a sufficient reason, as it is in all civil governments, to cut off obnoxious members, for God to rid himself of any nation that has incurred his highest displeasure, the Israelites, who were only instruments in God's hands, are no more to be blamed for executing the Almighty's commands, than the person who apprehends a malefactor, and brings him to condign punishment, is to be thought culpable by the laws of the land. And though the malefactor may possibly plead for himself, that he never did the apprehender, or even the executioner, any wrong; yet this will be of no weight or significance to the magistrate, when he calls upon the inferior officer to do his duty.⁸ Do but then allow the high and mighty magistrate of heaven and earth as much right as his deputies have that act under him, and a judgment sufficient to determine what concerns the public good, and then certainly the Israelites, acting by his orders, had at least as clear a right to destroy the Canaanites as any executioner can have to take away life by command of authority.

There is something, perhaps, that we may think more affecting in the case of the innocent children, which fell in this common devastation; but then we are to consider, that as the lives of all mankind are in the hands of God that gave them, so may he demand them back again, when, or in what manner he pleases; and as well may we quarrel with his providence, for sending a destroying angel armed with a famine, a deluge, or a pestilence, which sweeps away young and old together, as we may with his deputing the Hebrews to be the agents of his high behests, in a general and promiscuous slaughter of such nations, as his divine justice and wisdom had predestinated to destruction.

The Jews, it must be owned, have several rules of life, and customs peculiar to themselves, and by a rigorous observance of these, they contracted among other nations the character of being a sullen and unsociable people, haters of the rest of mankind, and averse to all civil society and commerce. Thus Manetho, as he is quoted⁹ by Grotius, lays this heavy charge upon them, "That they would hold no manner of correspondence with any mortal that was not initiated into their religion." Tacitus says of them, "That though they are courteous enough to one another, yet they pursue foreigners with the utmost rage of exasperated enemies." And, to name no more, Diodorus relates, "That they were the only people in the world who rejected all commerce and friendship with foreigners; and not only so, but treated them as enemies." But all this must certainly be a gross mistake, because the law of Moses expressly commands those that live under it to do good to mankind in general; not only to love their neighbours,¹⁰ but 'to love the stranger'¹¹ likewise, and in 'no case'¹² to vex or oppress him,¹³ for this very reason, 'because they were strangers in the land of Egypt:' and therefore Josephus, in his book¹⁴ against Apion, tells us, that though their lawgiver would not admit those who came occasionally only to the solemnities of their religion; yet, among other things, these he enjoined as necessary, and almost essential clauses in his law, namely, to supply every one with fire, water, and provisions, that was in want, and to direct the traveller in the road; which plainly contradicts the representation which the "Roman satirist thought fit to give of them.

If we consult the practice of the first founders of the Jewish nation, we shall find Abraham¹⁵ making an alliance with Abimelech, king of Gerar, at Beersheba, and assisting even the impious Sodomites, when he thought them unjustly invaded by their enemies: we shall find Isaac¹⁶ entering into a covenant with the same, or another king of the same name, at the same place; and Jacob¹⁷ signing articles of agreement with Laban, his father-in-law. Nor can we think, that the promulgation of the Jewish ordinances made any alteration in this particular, or laid any restraint upon their votaries from joining in treaties of commerce, or any other negotiations that tended to the benefit of human society. For, had this been the case, we cannot conceive how¹⁸ both David and Solomon could have ventured to make a league with Hiram, king of Tyre, without offending God; which they were so far from doing, that Solomon in particular, as¹⁹ the sacred history informs us, was directed by 'that wisdom, which he received from God,' when he made his confederacy with this heathen prince.

Excepting then those several people whom God had appointed the Israelites, at their entrance into Canaan, to destroy, and some other kings and nations afterwards, against whom he had sent out his prophets to denounce vengeance for their sad impieties, the Jews were forbidden to maintain a civil intercourse with none; but, on the contrary, were frequently excited to use kindness and hospitality to aliens, as well as others, that all the world might see, as²⁰ Josephus puts the words into Solomon's mouth, at the dedication of the temple, "That the Hebrews were not so inhuman, as to envy strangers the common dispensations of the author and fountain of all our happiness."

And for this very reason,²¹ I am confident it was, that the Hebrews are so often reminded by God of their having been strangers and bond-slaves in the land of Egypt, that by their hospitality and charity, they might comfort and relieve those who were in the like condition; that, in the words of the prophet,²² 'they might draw out their soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul; that they might bring the poor that were cast out, to their houses; cover the cold and naked, and not hide themselves from their own flesh.' For this cause are they so frequently called upon, in the words of the same prophet²³ 'to look unto the rock whence they were hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence they were digged, to look unto Abraham their father, and to Sarah that bare them;' that the happy change of their circumstances might beget in them a perpetual gratitude to their great benefactor, and the obscurity of their origin teach them to be humble.

It is part of the admonition of Moses to the Israelites, ¹ 'Thou shalt remember all the way, which the Lord thy God led thee, these forty years, in that terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thy heart, and whether thou wouldest keep his commandments or no.' What restrained the serpents, which were so numerous in the wilderness, from stinging the Hebrews, was doubtless that great and sovereign being, who resided in the pillar of the cloud, to cover the camp in their march, and make every noxious creature flee before them. ² Several authors are of opinion, that the serpents which bit the Israelites, were of the flying kind, and might be called fiery, by reason of their colour. Herodotus informs us, that Arabia produced this sort of serpents in great abundance; and the time of the year wherein the Israelites were under this calamity was in the season when these creatures usually are upon the wing, to visit the neighbouring and adjacent countries; and might now be directed into the camp of the Israelites as a great army; for so God ³ calls 'the locust, the canker-worm, the caterpillar, and the palmer-worm, his great army,' to destroy and depopulate without control. For however the divine presence had protected them before, the people were now in a state of rebellion; they were murmuring at the tediousness of their journeyings, and at their want of provisions, though every day fed by providence at the expense of a miracle. So that God, being angry with them, had removed their heavenly safeguard; and no sooner was it removed, than things were left to their natural course. The serpents resumed their venom; and ⁴ as it was now in the heat of summer, when creatures of this kind are naturally most poisonous, they raised such sores, and sudden inflammations wherever they fell, as occasioned death in some of the most guilty, and violent pains in all, until God was pleased to provide them with a remedy of a nature somewhat extraordinary. ^a

^a The fiery serpent mentioned Num. xxi. 6. Deut. viii. 15. Is. xiv. 29. was so called, probably from the burning sensation which its bite occasioned. Plutarch thus speaks of a similar kind of reptiles: "The inhabitants of the country round the Red Sea, were tormented in such a manner as was never heard of till that time. Little dragons bit their arms and legs: and if you touched them ever so lightly, they fixed themselves to the flesh, and their bite was intolerably painful, and like fire." The Hebrew original signifies also a winged serpent; and we are told that such were very common both in Egypt and Arabia. The learned Bochart describes them as short, spotted with divers colours, and with wings resembling those of the bat. The heathen writers concur in testifying that the deserts wherein the Israelites journeyed produced serpents of so venomous a kind, that their bite was deadly beyond the power of any art then known to cure it. The ancients observed in general, that the most sandy and barren deserts had the greatest number, and the most venomous of serpents.

The viper is one of the deadliest among the serpent tribes, as appears from the allusion of Zophar: 'the viper's tongue shall slay the wicked;' that is, he shall as certainly die as if a viper had bitten him. Every touch of the viper's tongue is instant death; for when the barbarians in Malta saw the venomous reptile leap from the fire, and fasten upon the hand of Paul, they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly. (Acts xxviii. 6.) The prophet Isaiah mentions it among the venomous reptiles, which in extraordinary numbers infest the land of Egypt: 'from whence come the young and old lion, the viper and fiery flying serpent.' (Is. xxx. 6.) In illustrating the mischievous character of wicked men, and the ruinous nature of sin, he thus alludes to the dangerous creature: "they hatch cockatrice eggs, and weave the spider's web; he that eateth of their eggs dieth; and that which is crushed breaketh out into a viper." The cockatrice here undoubtedly means the viper; for the egg of one creature never produces, by any management, one of a different species. When the egg is crushed, the young viper is disengaged, and leaps out, prepared for mischief. It may be objected, that the viper is not an oviparous but a viviparous animal; and consequently, the prophet must refer to some other creature. But it is to be remembered, that although the viper brings forth its young alive, they are hatched from eggs, perfectly formed in the belly of the mother. The viper alone of all terrestrial animals, produces within itself an egg of an uniform colour, and soft like the eggs or roe of fishes. This curious natural fact, reconciles the statement of the sacred Scripture, with the truth of natural history.

The certain and speedy destruction which follows the bite of this creature, clearly proves the seasonable interposition of almighty power for the preservation of the apostle Paul. Exasperated by the heat of the fire, the deadly reptile, leaping from the brushwood, where it had concealed itself, fixed the canine teeth, which convey the poison into the wound which they had made, in his hand. Death must have been the consequence, had not the power of God, which long before had shut the lions' mouths, that they might not hurt the prophets, neutralized the viper's deadly poison, and miraculously preserved the valuable life of his servant. The viper, on this memorable occasion, exhibited every symptom of rage, and put forth all its powers: the deliverance of Paul, therefore, was not accidental, nor the effect of his own exertion, but of the mighty power of that Master whom he served, whose voice even the deadly viper is compelled to obey. This conclusion was in effect drawn by the barbarians themselves: for when 'they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds and said, that he was a god:' they did not hesitate to attribute his preservation to divine power; they only mistook his real character, not the true nature of that agency which was able to render the bite of the viper harmless.

To the deadly malice with which the scribes and Pharisees persecuted the blessed Redeemer and his followers after his ascension into heaven, John the Baptist pointedly alludes in these words: 'O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come!' And our Lord addresses them in the same terms: 'ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?'

The fiery flying serpents.—The brazen figure of this creature was a type of our blessed Redeemer, who, for our salvation, was lifted up upon the cross, as the serpent was elevated in the camp of Israel, for the preservation of that people. It is the only species of serpent which the Almighty Creator has provided with wings, by means of which, instead of creeping or leaping, it rises from the ground, and leaning upon the extremity of its tail, moves with great velocity. It is a native of Egypt and the deserts of Arabia; and receives its name from the Hebrew verb saraph, which signifies to burn, in allusion to the violent inflammation which its poison produces, or rather its fiery colour, which the brazen serpent was intended to represent.

Bochart is of opinion, that the seraph is the same as the hydrus, or, as Cicero calls it, the serpent of the waters. For in the book of Isaiah, the land of Egypt is called the region from whence came the viper and flying seraph, or burning serpent. Elian says, they came from the deserts of Lybia and Arabia, to inhabit the streams of the Nile; and that they have the form of the hydrus.

The existence of winged serpents is attested by many writers of modern times. A kind of snakes were discovered among the Pyrenees, from whose sides proceeded cartilages in the form of wings; and Sealiger mentions a peasant who killed a serpent of the same species which attacked him, and presented it to the king of France. Le Blanc, as quoted by Bochart, says, at the head of the lake Chiamay, are extensive woods and vast marshes, tion of physicians, that such people as are bitten with any venomous beast, should be kept from the sight of the very image of the beast from which they received such hurt; and therefore God might take occasion, from the incongruity of the means, to magnify his own power, making use of this kind of remedy, that the Israelites might know, and be convinced, that both the disease and medicine came from him. When our blessed Saviour cured the blind man in the gospel, 'he spit on the ground and made clay, and spread it all over his eyes,' which some standers by might be apt to believe was a likelier way to put them quite out, than to recover them; but when they saw the thing have its effect, they glorified God, and said, ¹ 'How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles?' because they could not but perceive, that it was a greater miracle to work the cure by incompetent or incongruous means, than by none at all. And in like manner, if, instead of setting up this brazen serpent upon a pole, God had ordered the Israelites to apply a leaf of any common herb to the bite of these poisonous serpents, as he did Hezekiah to ² 'lay a lump of figs for a plaster upon his boil,' the cure might have been the same; but then the singularity of it had not been so remarkable. Men might have imputed it to some secret virtue in the plant, which now can be ascribed to nothing but the superlative power of God, who, even by contrary means, can bring about what ends he pleases.

The design of those men, however, can hardly be good, who, to rob God of the glory of the cure, would impute it to some secret quality in the brazen serpent itself. ³ A talisman, which, according to the common account, is a certain piece of metal, made under the influence of such and such planets and constellations, with a wonderful power to beget love, and overcome enemies; to drive away noxious animals, and cure diseases, &c., is a chimerical notion; and ⁴ to resemble the figure which God appointed Moses to set up, to any of these vain devices, is a scheme that ^a deserves our scorn, more than our confutation. The author of the book of Wisdom, addressing himself to God, and speaking of the Israelites, has imputed the virtue of this serpent to its true cause. ⁵ 'He that turned himself towards it, was not healed by the thing which he saw, but by thee, who art the Saviour of all.' And accordingly, in the foregoing verse, he calls it 'a sign, or symbol of salvation, to put them in remembrance of the commandment of the law.

The only considerable difficulty in the whole transaction is, why God, who had forbidden all manner of images, should, on this occasion, command one to be made. This the Jewish doctors, as ^b Justin Martyr which it is very dangerous to approach, because they are infested by very large serpents, which, raised from the ground on wings resembling those of bats, and leaning on the extremity of their tails, move with great rapidity. They exist, it is reported, about these places in such great numbers, that they have almost laid waste the neighbouring provinces.

The original term (Mespheph) does not always signify flying with wings; it often expresses vibration, swinging backwards and forwards, a tremulous motion, a fluttering; and this is precisely the motion of a serpent, when he springs from one tree to another. Niebuhr mentions a sort of serpents at Bassorah; they commonly keep upon the date trees; and as it would be laborious for them to come down from a very high tree, in order to ascend another, they twist themselves by the tail to a branch of the former, which making a spring by the motion they give it, throws them to the branches of the second. Hence it is that the modern Arabs call them flying serpents. Admiral Anson also speaks of the flying serpents that he met with at the island of Quibo, but which were without wings.

The hydri, it is true, are produced and reared in marshy places; not in burning and thirsty deserts, where the people of Israel murmured because they could find no water. But although that people might find no water to drink, it will not follow, that the desert contained no marshy place. Besides, it is well known, that when water falls, these serpents do not perish, but become chersydri, that is, seraphim, or burners. These chersydri, it is extremely probable, were the serpents which bit the rebellious Israelites; and in this state they were more terrible instruments of divine vengeance; for, exasperated by the want of water, and the intense heat of the season, they injected a deadly poison, and occasioned to the miserable sufferers more agonizing torments. The time of the year when Jehovah sent these serpents among his people, proves that this is no vain conjecture. According to Nicander, the hydri became chersydri, and beset the path of the traveller, about the dog-days. Now, Aaron died on the first day of the fifth month, that is, the month Abib, which corresponds with the nineteenth day of July. The Israelites mourned for him thirty days: immediately after which, they fought a battle with Arad, the Canaanite, and destroyed the country: then recommencing their journey, they murmured for want of water, and the serpents were sent. This, then, must have happened about the end of August; the season when the hydri become seraphim, and inflict the most cruel wounds. The words of Moses seem to countenance the idea, that the hydri employed on this occasion, were not generated on the spot, but sent from a distance. 'And the Lord sent fiery serpents, or seraphim, among the people.' (Num. xxi. 6.) From these words it is natural to conclude, that they came from that land of rivers, through which the congregation had lately passed. Nor will this be reckoned too long a journey, when it is recollected, that they travel from both the Lybian and Arabian deserts, to the streams of the Nile.

They inflicted on this memorable occasion an appropriate chastisement on the perverse tribes. That rebellious people had opened their mouth against the heavens; they had sharpened their tongues like serpents; and the poison of asps was under their lips; therefore they were made to suffer by the burning poison of a creature which they so nearly resembled. In this state of helplessness, they had recourse to him whom they had provoked, and whose patience and goodness they had so long experienced: they entreated Moses to intercede for them with God, that he might forgive their sins, and remove this calamity. He recommended Moses to make a brazen serpent in exact resemblance to the fiery serpent, and to raise it on a pole in the view of the people, so that the wounded might look to it, and be healed. There seemed to be no connexion between the means and the end, between a piece of brass, whatever might be its shape, and the cure which the looking to it, was designed to effect. But it was the appointment of God, and a just conception of his character would at once lead to the conclusion, that he who can accomplish his purposes without means as easily as with them, would not fail to render his own institution efficacious. Accordingly, when Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole, it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived. Our Lord has taught us, 'that as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whose believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.'—Ed.

a Sir John Marsham has collected several passages from the profane writers, which hint at charms and enchantments to cure the bite of serpents; and he says the Hebrews made use of enchantments for this very purpose; which assertion he endeavours to support by a citation from Ps. lviii. 1, 5; by another from Ecclesiastes, chap. x. 8; and by a third from Jeremiah, chap. viii. 17; and from the whole of what he offers, he would intimate, that the cure of the Israelites was not miraculous, but that the brazen serpent was properly a charm for the calamity, or an amulet for the distemper; but it would be trifling to refute this opinion.—Shuckford's Connection, vol. 3. b. 12.

b In his book against Trypho, he insists upon this serpent as observes in his days, could give no account of; but had they known Jesus Christ, and him crucified, they might have soon perceived,¹ that God intended it for a type of the death of Christ, and the manner in which he was to die; and that the effects of the brazen serpent upon them who looked on it, did represent the virtue received by true believers from the death of their Redeemer. For so we find our Saviour himself applying the mysterious meaning of it: ² 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whoso believeth in him, should not perish, but have eternal life.'

Thus we have answered the several doubts and objections that have been made to that part of the history of Moses which includes this period of time: and if the attestation of profane writers, may be thought any confirmation of what has been said, we have the practice of most subsequent lawgivers, in imitation of this great Jewish leader, pretending to a familiarity with some fictitious deity or other, and thence deriving their institutions: and whoever compares the sacred and fabulous account of things together, will find a near resemblance between Aaron and the heathen Mercury; and that as this false deity is said to have been an Egyptian by birth, the messenger and interpreter of the gods, and is generally painted with a caduceus, or wand in his hand twisted about with snakes; so Aaron was himself born in Egypt, and appointed by God to be ³ an interpreter to his brother Moses, and a messenger to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, in whose presence he threw down his wonder-working rod, and it immediately became a serpent.

The whole history of Balaam, as romantic as it seems, is still upon record in the ancient oriental writers, from whence the present Mahometans have borrowed many things. It is not improbable that the speaking of his ass gave handle to the fiction of several other brute creatures, upon less momentous occasions, accosting their masters. That the deserts wherein the Israelites journeyed, were infested with serpents of so venomous a kind, that their biting was deadly, and above the power of art to cure, both Strabo and Diodorus testify. And, to instance no farther, the worship of Esculapius, the known god of physic, under the form of a serpent,^a and what some late travellers tell us of the Indians carrying about a wreathed serpent upon a perch, to which they pay their adorations every morning, had manifestly their original from some tradition or other of this serpent's image, which Moses was directed to set up. So true is the character, confirmed by testimony of all kinds, which the sacred writers give us of this Moses, the servant of the Lord, that both as the leader, the lawgiver, and historian of his people, ⁴ 'he was found faithful in all his house.'

a type of Christ, and appealing to the company, what reason (exclusive of that) could be given of this matter, one of the Jews confessed that he was in the right, and that he himself had inquired for a reason among the Jewish masters, and could meet with none.—Kidder's Demonstration, p. 73.

a There is something very remarkable, and truly horrid, in what Clemens Alexandrinus mentions—that in the orgies of Bacchus Maenolis (or the mad) his worshippers were crowned with serpents, and yelled out Evo, Ece, even her by whom the transgression came.

CHAP. III.—On the Character and Conduct of Balaam.

[SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.]

DIFFERENT opinions have been entertained in regard to the real character of Balaam. The opinion of bishop Patrick, Dr Waterland, bishop Butler, bishop Horsley, and Dr Hales, is, that he was a true prophet of Jehovah, to whom, on this occasion, he offered the sacrifices which he had desired Balak to prepare. Others maintain, that he was merely an eminent soothsayer or diviner, who, it was supposed, could influence the fate of individuals and nations by his enchantments. Origen, Chrysostom, Basil, and Augustine, among the ancients, and Bryant and bishop Gleig, among the moderns, were of the latter opinion.

It is certain, as bishop Gleig has observed, that there is nothing recorded in Scripture which has excited more profane ridicule among arrogant infidels than the story of Balaam rebelling, or striving to rebel, against his God; reprov'd for that rebellion by a contemptible animal; blessing the people whom he was requested to curse, and whom he wished to curse; advising the seduction of that people to idolatry and fornication, immediately after blessing them, under the influence of the Spirit of God, for their abstinence from these vices; praying that he might himself die the death of the righteous, and soon afterwards falling in battle with those who, at his instigation, had provoked to war that very people to whom in his prayer he alludes as the righteous. That a true prophet, long blessed with a familiar though supernatural intercourse with Jehovah, and such Balaam is supposed to have been, should have persisted, to the end of his life, in deliberately thwarting, as far as he was able, the very designs of Jehovah which he declared were revealed to himself, and that he should at last have enticed to idolatry those whom he had been compelled to bless because they were not idolaters, and have taken up arms against them with whom he had prayed with such apparent earnestness that he might live and die, is an extraordinary picture of human nature.

Is this really the picture of Balaam exhibited by the inspired lawgiver of the Hebrews? If Balaam was a prophet of Jehovah, by whom he had long been inspired with the knowledge of future events, and whom he named as the only true God, it certainly is: but if he was an idolatrous diviner or soothsayer, as he is elsewhere styled, and compelled, on this occasion, to bless where he intended to curse, and to foretell, in language not his own, future events of the highest and most general importance, the character and conduct of Balaam, as described by Moses, will be found perfectly consistent with itself; whilst those who have attended to the import of the miracles which were wrought in Egypt for the deliverance of Israel, will at once perceive the wisdom of making the ass the instrument of rebuking the madness of this diviner.

My own opinion is, that Balaam was originally a diviner, or magician of great renown; but having acquired some knowledge of the true God, perhaps by hearing of the wonderful works performed by Moses in his name, he endeavoured to render this knowledge subservient to his interested and ambitious purposes, by professing himself a prophet of Jehovah, and uttering divinations as revelations from him. Thus the exorcists, observing how efficacious the name of Jesus proved in the mouth of the apostle, attempted to cast out devils, 'adjuring them by Jesus whom Paul preached;' and thus Simon Magus, finding the miracles of Philip so much superior to the effects of his magic, embraced christianity; and afterwards offered Peter money to confer on him the same power which he exercised, doubtless intending to enrich or aggrandize himself by it. On this supposition, Balaam's case of incantations, even in seeking Jehovah, was the natural effect of the association of his old practices with his new pretensions.¹ There is no evidence that God had ever spoken to him, or by him, before this event: but there is ample proof that he lived and died a wicked man, and an enemy of God and his people. This, however, has not been a singular case.² Balaam dwelt in or near Mesopotamia; but his reputation had reached so far, and he was so celebrated, that he was sent for, as it appears, in consequence of the counsel given to Moab by the elders of Midian; being the only person who was able to contend with Moses, the prophet of Israel. For we may suppose that they ascribed to the superior skill of Moses in some unknown arts all that power by which Israel had been brought out of Egypt, notwithstanding Pharaoh's determined opposition; had subsisted for so many years in the wilderness, and had obtained their late victories over the Ammonites.

Bishop Patrick does not think that Balaam was, at the time when visited by the messengers of Balak, either a true prophet, or a devout worshipper of Jehovah; but that he had formerly been both, till becoming so covetous as to love the wages of unrighteousness, he addicted himself to superstitious rites and ceremonies, making use of teraphim, which had been of ancient practice in his country, and worshipping God perhaps by other images. No evidence, however, can be adduced in support of these suppositions: for we know nothing of Balaam but from what is related of him in the book of Numbers, and in other books of sacred Scripture, which allude to the circumstances which are there mentioned.

My own opinion is, that Balaam was a soothsayer; and yet that he was inspired by the Spirit of God to utter important predictions. He was probably one of those early idolaters who did not entirely renounce the true God, or cease to worship him, but only associated with him, in their vain imaginations, a number of subordinate divinities, to whom they supposed that he had committed, under his own superintendence, the administration of the affairs of this world, assigning to the care of different deities different countries. To these fictitious beings, of whom they soon found images, they paid a kind of subordinate worship, without, however, neglecting the worship of Jehovah. Of this we have one instance in the case of Laban, who, while he appears to have acknowledged the supreme divinity of Jehovah, worshipped certain inferior gods, of which his daughter Rachel contrived to carry away the images. Such appears likewise to have been the state of religion in Egypt, when Joseph was first carried thither: for it was the true God that sent to Pharaoh the dreams which Joseph interpreted, for the good of the country of which Pharaoh was the sovereign; and such was the case in Canaan, during the reign of the two Abimelechs, of whom we read in the book of Genesis.

Balaam, as it appears to me, was an idolater who never was a true prophet of the true God; but who had heard of Jehovah, and acknowledged not only his existence, but even his power as the tutelary God of the Israelites, though he may have been doubtful at first, as the Syrians were at a later period, whether the God of Israel, or his own god, were most powerful. The ancient idolaters never hesitated to acknowledge each others' gods, or to worship, along with their own, the gods of those nations in which they had occasion to reside; and the Jews and Christians would never have been persecuted by the Roman emperors for worshipping the true God, had they not refused to worship together with him, the idol deities of the empire.

According to Mr Bryant, the goat, the baboon, the ass, and the ram, were all considered sacred, and all for the same reason, by the Egyptians, and some other eastern nations. All these animals were considered, in the countries in which Baal-peor was the favourite deity, as emblems of that god, who was, in different temples, worshipped under their different similitudes.

On a sacred ass then, Balaam, the priest of Peor, zealous for the cause of his own god, and eager to gain the wages of iniquity, was prosecuting his journey to curse the worshippers of the true God, when he was encountered by an angel on the way. After various attempts to escape, the ass fell down before the angel, who had displayed himself to her, though not yet to her rider; that is, the emblem of the god of Balaam bowed down before the servant of the God of Israel; and at last, words proceeded from her mouth expressive of the severest reproof that could be given to the madness and obstinacy of the soothsayer of Pethor. It was a rule with the God of Jacob to display his supremacy to his people, by making all other deities and their agents subservient to his will. On this account, he often forced their representatives, and their prophets, to be the unwilling ministers of his commands; to attest the superiority of his power; and even to execute his vengeance on their own votaries. This was remarkably the case in all the miracles wrought by the ministry of Moses in the land of Egypt, when Jehovah made the gods of that country the instruments of his vengeance on Pharaoh and his host. In every step of his progress, Balaam was foiled at his own weapons. The instrument by which he was first rebuked on the way, though contemptible in our eyes, was sacred to the god in whom he trusted; and therefore the speaking ass, though it has often been the subject of ridicule among ignorant infidels, affords one of the most illustrious proofs of the divine wisdom. God, if he had pleased, might have reproved Balaam in the way without the intervention of the ass; when the soothsayer arrived at the end of his journey, he might have been compelled by the overpowering influence of the Spirit of God, to pour forth all the predictions which he afterwards uttered, without having recourse to any one of his enchantments; but the proof of Jehovah's superiority over the gods of Midian and Moab would not have been so conspicuous to the grovelling minds either of those nations or of the Israelites themselves, had a single circumstance been omitted which actually took place. Balaam was everywhere compelled to bless the people whom it was his wish to curse; and to foretell the future destruction, by that people, of all the nations which worshipped the gods of Egypt, Midian, and Moab.¹

CHAP. IV.—Of the Profane History, Religion, Government, &c., of such nations as the Israelites had dealings with during this period.

TOWARDS the conclusion of the foregoing book, we carried the succession of the Egyptian kings down to the reign of Amenophis, who, according to the most received accounts, was that obstinate prince, that in pursuit of the Hebrews, together with all his army, was lost in the waves of the Red Sea: nor should we, as yet, concern ourselves any farther with the history of that nation, but that his son and successor, Sesostris,^a who

a It is a matter of no small dispute among chronologers, in what time it was that Sesostris lived. The seeming analogy of the name makes Sir John Marsham think, that Sesostris was the same with Shishak, 'king of Egypt, who, in the days of Rehoboam, came up against Jerusalem, and took away the treasures of the house of the Lord, the treasures of the king's house, and all the shields which Solomon had made,' &c. (1 Kings xiv. 25, 26.) What confirms him in this opinion, is a passage in Josephus, wherein he tells us, that "God avenged himself upon Rehoboam, by the hand of Shishak, king of Egypt, concerning whom Herodotus (being mistaken) ascribes what he did to Sesostris." (Jewish Antiquities, b. 8. c. 4.) But what if, in this matter, Josephus himself should be mistaken, and not Herodotus? Josephus certainly took his antiquities from the records of the Jews, which gave a full account of what happened to Abraham and his posterity, both before and after they inherited the land of Canaan; but gave no account at all of that country while it was in other hands, and particularly while the Israelites were in the wilderness; and therefore it is more probable, that Josephus knew of no conquest of the land of Canaan by the Egyptians, before the time of Rehoboam. For when he applies what Herodotus says of Sesostris' setting up several infamous pillars, to stigmatize the countries which he conquered for cowardice, to Shishak, after his expedition against the Jews, he plainly gives us to understand, that he knew of no other expedition from Egypt against the land of Canaan before that. And indeed these very pillars are enough to decide the matter, that our Sesostris was not Shishak. Shishak made an irruption into Judea, plundered the temple and the country, and so went back again into Egypt. Now, had he set up such pillars, as a perpetual mark of infamy upon the Jews, can we imagine that they would have let them stand, even to be seen in Herodotus' time, and not immediately pulled them down upon his retreat? But, on the other hand, if Sesostris, who succeeded the Pharaoh that was drowned in the Red Sea, conquered Canaan, and set up such pillars, there is good reason to think, that they might continue a long while, because the Canaanites, who were a conquered people, dared not pull them down in his reign, and in the time of the deputies who governed under him; and the Israelites, who knew that these pillars were no reflection on them, but only on their enemies, would be inclinable enough to let them stand. It is much more probable then, that the mistake belongs to Josephus, and not to Herodotus; because Herodotus, in what he asserts of Sesostris, agrees with Diodorus and others; but, to fix the actions of Sesostris upon Shishak, there is no one ancient author that will agree with Josephus. Aristotle affirms, (Polit., b. 1. c. 10.) that the kingdom of Sesostris was much older, in lived in the time of the Israelites' peregrination in the wilderness, and may therefore properly take his place here, was a person of so distinguished a character, that to pass him by in silence would be doing an injury to our reader.

As soon as Sesostris was born, some historians tell us, that Vulcan appeared to his father, in his sleep, and informed him, that his son should conquer the whole world: upon which presumption it was, that he took so much care, not of his education only, but of every male child's likewise that was born on the same day with him, even through all his kingdom of Egypt. The number of these is said to have amounted to 1700 in all; and the king gave orders that they should be trained up in the same point of time, than that of Minos in Crete, which every one owns was in the time of Joshua. Pliny maintains, (Nat. Hist., b. 37. c. 8.) that Troy was taken in the time of Ramesses, who was the third descendant from Sesostris. Strabo avers, (b. ult.) that Sesostris was long before the Trojan times; and Sir John Marsham, and in general all the writers of the Argonautic expedition, own plainly, that the colonies of Sesostris had been at Colchis before that, which all agree to have been a century before the fall of Troy. And, if to these we may add two moderns, both the learned prelate Usher, and the learned bishop Cumberland, do unanimously agree in making Sesostris to be the son of that Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea; which the latter of these has given several arguments to prove, (Sanchon., p. 402.) But these the learned author of the Connection of the Sacred and Profane History has endeavoured to invalidate; and thereupon concludes, "That Sesostris should be the son of Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea, and that in the state which his father's misfortunes must have reduced Egypt to, he should immediately find strength sufficient to subdue kingdom after kingdom, and to erect himself a large empire over many great and flourishing nations; this must be thought, by any one who duly considers things, at first sight, a most romantic fiction;" (vol. 3. b. 11.) Shuckford is undoubtedly right when he says, in his Connection, that Sesostris could not have been the son of Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea. For it seems self-evident that the son of that monarch could not have been in a condition to attempt the conquests which Sesostris is known to have achieved. Had Sesostris returned flushed with victory, and known that the Israelites were wandering in the desert, as our author supposes, there is little doubt but that, in his thirst for universal empire, he would have attempted to reduce them again to bondage; and as the desert in which the Israelites spent the time of their journeyings was close upon Egypt, it would not have been a very difficult task to one who had carried an army through so many inhospitable countries, to have penetrated the desert and attacked the Israelites, and had he done so unsuccessfully, Moses would undoubtedly have recorded his defeat. But Dr Hales has shown, that there was not less than seventeen kings between the date of the exode of the Israelites and Sesostris, whose joint reigns amounted to 340 years. During all this period, there seems to have been no king of any note except Amenophis, or Moeris, the father and immediate predecessor of Sesostris, who seems to have been one of the best and wisest of the Egyptian kings. The formation of the lake that goes by his name is ascribed to him; but the extent of it, and other circumstances, make it evident that it could not have been excavated by human labour. But he seems to have opened a communication between the river and this vast natural basin, eighty stadia in length, and three stadia, or a hundred yards in breadth, according to Diodorus; and this converted the lake into a vast reservoir for the redundant waters of the river while inundated. A stupendous work, and far more glorious than either the pyramid or labyrinth, if we consider its various and important uses for agriculture, commerce, fishery, &c. At present this canal is called Bahr Jussuf, or "Joseph's river," and is vulgarly ascribed to the patriarch Joseph, while regent of Egypt; but was most probably repaired and denominated from the famous sultan, Joseph Saladin, who made that wonder of Cairo, called "Joseph's well."—See Hales' Analysis, vol. 4. p. 431, 8vo second edition.—Ed.

discipline and exercises with his son, as justly supposing that they who had been the constant and equal companions of his childhood and youth, would prove his most faithful ministers, and affectionate fellow soldiers. ¹ Having therefore provided tutors and masters, and every thing necessary for this purpose, he had them, by degrees, inured to laborious and manly exercises, as well as instructed in all liberal and useful sciences, that, as they grew up, by the strength of their bodies, and the cultivation of their minds, they might be equally fitted either to command or execute.

Amenophis, after he had been at this vast expense and trouble in laying the foundation of his son's future grandeur, resolved to give him and his companions an opportunity of displaying the good effects of their education; and accordingly sent him, and them along with him, at the head of an army into Arabia. In this expedition, the young Sesostris surmounted all the dangers of serpents and venomous creatures, all the wants and hardships of a dry and barren country, and in the end, conquered the Arabians, a rude and barbarous people, that had never been vanquished before.

From Arabia his father ordered him westward, where he subdued the greatest part of Africa; but while he was engaged in this expedition, news was brought him, that his father, and all his army, were drowned in the Red Sea, which made him desist from his conquests, and hasten home with his army, in order to secure his succession to the kingdom. Whether it was that he called to mind the prediction of the god Vulcan, or was instructed by Mercury, who prepared him for the war; was assured of success by divination, by dreams in the temple, or prodigies in the air, or persuaded to it by his daughter Athyrte, a young lady of uncommon understanding, and who made it out to her father that the thing was practicable; but so it was, that no sooner was he settled upon the Egyptian throne, but his thoughts began to swell, and his mind to grasp at an universal monarchy.

His own country indeed he found but in a lamentable estate. The Israelites, who were their slaves, were gone. All their veteran soldiers, with their arms, chariots, and horses, were lost: the first-born of every family was slain, the cattle killed, the fruit of the earth destroyed, and nothing but famine was to be expected: and yet, notwithstanding all this discouragement, he was resolved to put in practice his scheme for a general conquest. But then considering that this would oblige him to be long absent, and far distant from Egypt, he could not but deem it necessary to gain the love and affection of his subjects, that those who followed him might lay down their lives more cheerfully in his service, and they whom he left behind might not be induced to attempt any innovations while he was gone.

To this purpose he endeavoured, in the first place, to oblige every one to the utmost of his power; some by largesses in money; others by donations in land; many by the concession of free pardons; and every one by fair speeches, and a courteous and affable behaviour upon all occasions. Those that were condemned for high treason he released with impunity, and by paying what they owed, discharged such as were in prison for debt. In the next place, he resettled the ancient division of the country into six and thirty parts, which the Egyptians call nomi, or provinces: assigned a governor to each of these; and constituted his brother Arnaïs, (whom the Greeks called Danaus,) supreme regent. Him he invested with ample power and authority, but restrained him from wearing the crown, from offering any injury to the queen and her family, and from having any dealings with the royal concubines.

Having thus settled the government, he proceeded in the last place, to raise an army equal to the vastness of his design, which consisted of 600,000 foot, 24,000 horse, and 27,000 warlike chariots. His principal officers were taken out of those brave men who were trained up with him in martial exploits; and that they might always be in readiness, without submitting to any mean employ, to attend him to the wars, he took care to bestow on them large estates in land, in some of the richest and most fertile parts of Egypt. With this army he marched at first against the Ethiopians, whom he soon conquered, and made them pay a tribute of ebony, gold, and elephants' teeth. But his land forces alone were not answerable to the conquests he intended; and therefore he fitted out two fleets of tall ships, somewhat resembling our modern form, one in the Mediterranean Sea, and the other in the Arabian Gulf. With the Mediterranean squadron he conquered Cyprus, the sea coasts of Phœnicia, and several of the Cyclades; and from the Arabian Gulf, he sailed into the Indian Sea, and there subdued all the coasts thereof, till happening to come into a shallow, and his ships drawing more water than usual, he either was unable or afraid to go any farther, and so returned into Egypt.

But he had not been long returned, before his ambition began to operate afresh; and therefore advising with his priests, he recruited his army, and marched into Asia. The Israelites were at this time in the deserts of Arabia, and therefore it may look a little strange, why a man of Sesostris' spirit should not have been tempted to pursue them. But besides the barrenness of the country, which could never support so vast a multitude as he carried with him, he could not but reflect on his father's fate: and therefore dreading the like miraculous overthrow, he declined the Israelites, and marched directly against Canaan, which, without the least opposition, at once submitted to him; so that, imposing an annual tribute upon the people, and putting governors in all their principal towns, he proceeded in the course of his conquests, and in a short time overran all Asia and some parts of Europe.

He passed the river Gauges, and pierced through all India; as far as the main ocean eastward: then ^a he

^a Though Herodotus, Diodorus, and others, relate, that he was victorious in these countries; yet some will have it that he met with a repulse, fled from the Scythians, and was worsted by the Colchians. For Justin tells us that Vexoris, or Sesostris, despatching ambassadors before him to summon the Scythians to surrender, they sent back his messengers with contempt, and threats, and defiance, and immediately took up arms; that Sesostris being informed that they were advancing towards him, by hasty marches, suddenly turned about, and fled from before them, leaving all his baggage and warlike apparel to the pursuers, who followed him till he came on the borders of Egypt (b. 2. c. 3.) Pliny relates (b. 33. c. 3.) that he was overthrown by the king of Colchis; and subdued the Scythians, as far as the river Tanais, which divides Europe from Asia: here he brought into subjection the other parts of Asia; and from hence he went into Thrace in Europe; but as he was marching along the deserts, he was in danger of losing his army through the want of provisions, and difficulty of passes; and therefore "erecting, as his custom was, his pillars there, he adventured to proceed no farther: though the occasion of his return may rather be imputed to the news which he received from the Egyptian high priest, of his brother's revolt and usurpation.

For, encouraged with his long absence, and great distance, Armais had done every thing that was interdicted him; had assumed the diadem, violated the queen, made promiscuous use of the king's concubines, and by the advice of his false friends, was now meditating to maintain his usurpation by force of arms: but hearing of his brother's return, he feigned himself of another temper; meets him at Pelusium, a frontier town, before he could have certain intelligence of what had passed; and there received him with all the appearance of submission and joy, but with a real design, not only to take away his life, but quite extirpate his whole family. To this end he invited the king his brother, the queen, and her children, to a banquet, which he had prepared for their refreshment; but when they had all drank very plentifully, and were now gone to rest, he caused a great quantity of dried reeds, which he had before prepared for that purpose, to be laid round the king's pavilion, and set on fire, in hopes to destroy them all. Sesostris perceiving the danger he was in, and expecting no assistance from his guards, who were all overcome with wine, ^b lifted up his hands, and implored the gods in behalf of his wife and children, he rushed with them through the flames; and being thus unexpectedly preserved, he made oblations to several of the gods, but more especially to Vulcan, by whose protection he thought himself delivered. The traitor Armais being thus defeated in his wicked design, betook himself to arms, but was soon discomfited by Sesostris, and forced to flee into Greece, where he settled at Argos, and not long after was chosen king;

Valerius Flaccus insinuates, that he was repulsed with great slaughter, and put to flight in these parts.—Argonaut, b. 5.

^a It was the custom of this great warrior, to set up pillars in every country he conquered, with an inscription to this effect,—“Sesostris king of kings, and lord of lords, subdued this country by the power of his arms.” If the nation had, without opposition, ignobly submitted to him, besides the inscription, he caused the privities of a woman to be carved, as a mark of their effeminacy and baseness; but if they had defended themselves bravely, the pillars bore the distinction of the contrary sex, in testimony of their courage. Besides these, he left statues of himself behind him, two of which were to be seen in Herodotus' time, one on the road between Ephesus and Phocæa, and the other between Smyrna and Sardis. They were armed after the Ethiopian and Egyptian manner; held a javelin in one hand, and a bow in the other; and across the breast, had a line drawn from shoulder to shoulder, in which was this inscription:—“This region I obtained by these my soldiers.”—Universal History, b. 1. c. 3.

^b Herodotus adds one circumstance more; that waking out of sleep, and finding his danger, he consulted with his queen what to do in this extremity, who advised him to throw two of his children into the flames, that they might serve as a bridge for all the rest; which he accordingly did, and so they all escaped. But this is generally deemed a mistake in our historian, or a circumstance crept in, on purpose to make the distress appear more affecting.—Betford's Scripture Chronology, b. 4. c. 5.

while his victorious brother, after nine years' absence, returning in triumph to Egypt, adorned the temples with rich spoils: and having disbanded his army, after he had rewarded them according to their merit, he began to apply his mind to such stupendous works as might immortalize his name, and everlastingly contribute to the public good.

He built a temple in every city in Egypt, and dedicated it to the peculiar god of the place. This was a work wherein he employed none but captives; and therefore he had it inscribed upon each temple, “None of the natives were put to labour here.” He raised vast mounts and hills of earth, to which he removed the cities that had before too low a situation, in order to secure both man and beast from the danger of the Nile's inundations. All the way, from Memphis to the sea, he dug canals, which from the Nile branched out, and not only made an easier conveyance from place to place, but greatly advanced the trade and prosperity of the kingdom. All the towns that were upon the frontiers, and lay before exposed to any superior number of forces, he fortified against the incursions of enemies, and made them of difficult access. He defended the east side of Egypt against the irruptions of the Syrians and Arabians, with a wall drawn from Pelusium, through the deserts, as far as Heliopolis, which is at least 1500 furlongs. He caused a ship of 280 cubits long, to be built all of cedar, gilded over with gold without, and lined with silver within; and to perpetuate the memory of his actions, he erected two obelisks of polished marble, 120 cubits high, on which was inscribed an account of the extent of his empire, the value of his revenue, and the number of the nations which he had conquered. One thing, however is reported of him, which argues an horrid insolence, in so great a man, and tarnishes his character not a little, and that is, that at set times his custom was, to have the tributary kings, and such as held their dominions under his favour, to come into Egypt to pay their homage; and though he received them at first with all signs of honour and respect, yet on certain occasions, he would have his horses unharnessed, and some four or more of these kings yoked together, and made to draw his chariot: but, bating this opprobrious piece of arrogance, ^c and whereof he was cured before he died, he was certainly in all respects, the greatest prince that ever sat upon the Egyptian throne; and (what some have accounted an augmentation of his greatness) after he had reigned three and thirty years, he lost his eyesight, and out of disgust, laid violent hands upon himself, thereby making his magnanimity in death, as they call it, equal to the glorious actions of his life.

^c The manner in which he was cured is said to be this:—One day, as some of these tributary kings were drawing him along, he perceived one of them to look back upon one of the wheels, with a very great steadfastness; and thereupon inquiring what might be the subject of his thoughts, or the occasion of his deep attention, he received an answer to this effect:—“The going round of the wheel, O king, calls to my mind the vicissitudes of fortune: for as every part of the wheel is uppermost and lowermost by turns, so it is with men, who one day sit on a throne, and on the next are reduced to the vilest degree of slavery.” Which answer struck the king with such compunction, that for ever after he gave off this inhuman practice.—Diodorus, b. 1; and Universal History, b. 1. c. 3.

tians in the Red Sea, the first people that gave them any molestation were the Amalekites. Amalek was the son of Eliphaz, by his concubine Timna, as Eliphaz was the first-born of Esau.^a He gave name both to the people and country where he lived, and notwithstanding the spuriousness of his birth, is,¹ in the catalogue of the dukes of Edom, reckoned as one of them. The country of the Amalekites lay somewhere between Egypt and Palestine, and was therefore very probably bounded by Canaan to the north; by Egypt or its dependent territories to the south; by Edom, or the land of Seir, to the east; and by the deserts towards the sea, or perhaps by the margin of the sea itself, to the west.

Their religion was at first no doubt the same that was taught in the house of Abraham; but in process of time they were carried away with the general corruption, and fell into the same idolatry that their brethren the Edonites practised. And as to their commerce or trade, the situation of their country might favour them, as much as their neighbours, and the superiority of the power and greatness to which they had advanced themselves, looks as if they had improved it more than others.

Their form of government was monarchical; and as it appears that the first, at least one of the first, and the last of their kings was called Agag, it is no unlikely supposition, that all their intermediate kings bore the same name. However this be, it is certain, that at this time they were a flourishing nation, and grown up to such a ^b sudden height of power and grandeur, that their king is spoken of as much superior to any other; and therefore, when Balaam foretels the future majesty of the Jewish state, he expresses himself, that ² 'their king should be higher than Agag,' and styles them the 'first of the nations;' which seems to countenance the wonderful things which the Arabian historians tell us of these people, namely, that they once conquered Egypt, and possessed the throne of that kingdom for several generations. The truth is, these Amalekites were a bold and daring people from the very first. No sooner had the Israelites set foot upon the Arabian shore, but they conspired against them, and falling on their rear, in their march to Horeb, made some slaughter among them, which Joshua, as soon as he had got his fighting men in order, took care to repay; though it must be confessed, that God for some time, was pleased to make use of this nation, in conjunction with some of the Canaanites, to ³ 'be scourges in the sides, and thorns in the eyes,' that is, his instruments for the punishment of the diffidence and disobedience of his own people.

Esau, who either from the colour of his hair and complexion, or for selling his birthright to Jacob for a mess of red pottage, had the name of Edom given him, was the progenitor likewise of this people. Their ancient kingdom, when in its meridian, was bounded on the north by the land of Canaan and the Salt Sea; on the south by the Arabian gulf; on the east, by the land of Midian; and on the west, by the kingdom of Amalek; and in this compass of ground, they had several remarkable cities, besides two eminent sea-ports, Elath and Ezion-geber, on the Arabian gulf; but the latter of these became so infamous for the many wrecks which befell the shipping that frequented it, that in time it came to be disused.

The people were naturally bold and courageous; jealous of their rights, and always in a disposition to maintain them; as those who claim the empire of the sea, in the manner that they did, should always be. As they were descended from Abraham, we are not to doubt, but that their belief and practice were right at first, though, by degrees, ⁴ they fell into idolatry, and if we can suppose that the book of Job was of as ancient date as is pretended, and that he himself lived among these people, we cannot but acknowledge, that the ⁵ invention and use of constellations in astronomy, ⁶ the art of writing, ⁷ the art of navigation, and many more parts of truly useful knowledge, were begun, and cultivated among them.

The form of their civil constitution seems to have varied according to the exigencies of the times. The Horites, who very early inhabited this country, were ruled, at first, by their respective patriarchs, or heads of families; ⁸ till being overcome by Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, who swept them before him with other nations, they, to secure themselves for the time to come, changed the constitution into an elective monarchy; and it was under this form of government that Esau and his family lived for some time sojourners in this land. The monarchy, however, did not last above seven or eight successions, till some way or other, it came to be divided into several little independent principalities, or dukedoms; and as the posterity of Esau exceeded all others in the number of their dukes, it cannot be incongruous to suppose, that they had the greatest hand in bringing about this revolution, and the largest share in the government that was founded thereupon.

^a This genealogy of the Amalekites seems to be altogether erroneous. The Amalekites are mentioned (Gen. xiv. 7.) as a people of some consequence at the time of the wars of Chedorlaomer, and must therefore have been a nation before the era of Abraham and Lot, which is a proof that they did not derive their origin from Amalek, the grandson of Esau, but from some older stock. That stock, according to the Arabian writers, was Amalek, or Amlak, a son of Ham, and, of course, grandson of Noah. This account of the origin of the Amalekites certainly agrees better than our author's, with the description of them by Balaam as the first of the nations in that part of the world; for had their common ancestor been a grandson of Esau, they must, in the days of that soothsayer, have been a nation of no antiquity. It must be confessed, however, that there is no Amalek or Amlak mentioned by Moses among the sons of Ham; but that is a very slight objection to the Arabian account, it being universally admitted that it is only of the family of Shem that the Jewish legislator gives a full and minute genealogy.—See Bishop Newton's Dissertation on the Prophecies of Balaam.

^b The kingdom of Edom commenced much about the time of the Israelites' departure out of Egypt; and that of Amalek could not be much, if any thing at all, older; and therefore when Balaam expressed himself in so high a strain, concerning Agag, and his monarchy, it could not have been much above forty years' standing. The expression of Amalek's being 'the first of the nations;' our version turns otherwise in the margin, 'the first of the nations that warred against Israel;' and if we compare what is said of Agag, but thirteen verses before, we shall not be at a loss for the right, at least for a natural, explication of the words, namely, that they were the greatest and most noble nation at that time; and accordingly Le Clerc's version styles them, 'the first-fruits of the nations,' by which in his Commentary, he understands them to have been the most ancient and potent nation of any of those which proceeded from the loins of Abraham and Lot.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 1.

And as they had the largest share in the government, it is not unreasonable to suppose farther, that in consequence of their power, they soon expelled the Horite dukes, and at the same time might force Amalek, or his spurious offspring, to leave their dominions. For in the next generation, the posterity of Esau, who are styled absolute dukes of Edom, were only eleven in number, and in all the country had no rivals. But as the approach of the children of Israel put them, and every nation else, in a great consternation, they thought it most conducive to their general safety, to unite under one common head; and thereupon having made choice of a king, they resolved to maintain their ground against any invasion. It was to this nameless king, or perhaps his successor, that Moses sent ambassadors, desiring a free passage through his country, which he absolutely denied, and to let him see that he was in earnest, immediately took the field; but as his design was to act upon the defensive only, and not distress a people that were his brethren, in matters wherein he could relieve them, without danger to himself, ¹ he supplied them, for their money, with whatever necessaries they wanted. And thus far the history of the Edomites, during this period, goes.

Moab, the son of Lot, by an incestuous commerce with the elder of his daughters, was the progenitor of this people, and gave name to their country; which was bounded on the east by the deserts of Arabia; on the west, by the mountains that lie east from the Dead Sea; on the north, by the country of the Ammonites, the descendants of Lot by his younger daughter; and on the south, by the brook or little river Zerid, which runs into the Dead Sea; so that, in the whole, it is about forty miles in length, and as much in breadth.

That the people had once the knowledge of the true God, can hardly be doubted; but in time they loved not to retain that knowledge, but introduced the worship of false gods, with such monstrous and obscene ceremonies, as are not fit to be named. Their principal idols were Chemosh and Baal-peor; and to these they sacrificed, on mountains dedicated to that service, and in temples built in their cities, not only oxen and rams, but upon extraordinary occasions, human victims.

The form of their government was regal, and the first inhabitants of their country were the Emims, a great and powerful people, of extraordinary strength and stature, very probably the descendants of Ham, and of the same gigantic race with the Anakims and Rephaims, though the Moabites called them by the name Emims, which, in Hebrew signifies terrible. And too terrible an enemy had they been for the Moabites, had not Chedorlaomer and his allies, by their frequent incursions, much weakened them, and made them an easy prey. The Moabites, however, when they had thus dispossessed them, kept not their new dominions long entire; for Sihon king of the Amorites, who bordered on them eastward, fought against the king of Moab, and took from him all his kingdom to the north of the river Arnon.

The successor to this king was Balak, who was then upon the throne, when the Israelites came and encamped in the neighbourhood of his country. His tampering with the infamous Balaam was the reason why his people were not permitted to mix or intermarry with the Hebrews; but as the Midianites, whose history we are now come to, were more particularly instrumental in seducing them to idolatry, their punishment, for the present, was more severe.

Midian, the fourth son of Abraham by his wife Keturah, is generally reputed to have given name to the country, and to have been the progenitor of the Midianites, who, in the early ages of the world, were confounded with ² the Ishmaelites, and soon after seem to be conjoined with the Moabites, as if they had been both one nation; when the true reason of this seeming commixture was, that according as they lived to the northern or southern parts of the country, of course they joined themselves either to the Moabites or Ishmaelites; and upon that account are oftentimes promiscuously mentioned in Scripture.

What the limits of their country were, it is not so easy a matter to perceive. Its boundary on the east is uncertain, but on the west, it was contiguous to the land of Edom; on the north to the country of Moab; and on the south, to the Red Sea.

Its inhabitants were very numerous, and may be distinguished into two sorts, shepherds and merchants. The shepherds moved up and down in tents; they drove their cattle before them, even when they went to war; and seem to have had few or no fixed habitations, except some strougholds near the borders of their country. The merchants, in like manner, travelled from place to place in companies, or caravans, as it is the custom in those parts even to this day, and the only settlements they seem to have had were their marts, and stations, in places convenient for their trade.

By these two different employes, however, the whole nation flourished to a great degree. The merchants grew excessively rich; and the shepherds by exchanging with them, their cattle for gold, and jewels of all kinds, were enabled to make a much better appearance than other nations. But as their affluence in these things soon introduced luxury, they were a people remarkable for all kinds of vanity, riot, and excess. Though their learning could not be great, yet their merchants were obliged to know something of writing and arithmetic, in order to keep their accounts; and as they were traders, and situate on the Red Sea, it can hardly be supposed but that they applied themselves to ship-building, in order to explore not only their own coasts, but those of other countries likewise, that lay contiguous to them; and consequently could not be without some tolerable skill in geography and geometry.

Their religion differed according to the part of the country which they inhabited. These who lived in the north of Midian, fell into all the abominations of the Moabites, and in their endeavour to corrupt the Israelites, quite exceeded them. But those that were placed more towards the south, if we may take Jethro, who is said to have ruled over a people near the Red Sea, for a pattern, retained just notions of God, and of the form of worship which he had prescribed to their forefathers; for they offered up praises, and thanksgivings, and sacrifices to him, though their religious rites and ceremonies are not specified.

Their form of government, might, in the like manner, be different, according to the part of the country which they inhabited, though in the main, it looks as if it had been aristocratical rather than monarchial. Jethro, indeed, in our translation is called a priest, and because the word in the original does equally signify a prince, it has generally been concluded, that he had the honour of being both. Mention is likewise made of other princes; and the five who fell by the hand of Israel, are sometimes styled kings, and sometimes dukes of Midian: so that this nation seems to have been governed by a multitude of dukes, or petty princes, who, perhaps, in their own jurisdiction, were independent on each other, and yet some way or other, were in Moses' time, ¹ feudatory under Sihon, king of the Amorites. Sihon had indeed made a conquest from the Moabites of the best part of the country he then possessed, and having settled himself in their place, made several of the neighbouring princes tributary to him; but refusing a passage to the Hebrews, and coming without ^a any provocation to attack them, he himself was slain, and his whole army routed; Heshbon, his capital city, was taken, and all the rest of his dominions distributed among the Israelites.

There were the several nations on the other, that is, on the east side of Jordan, which God delivered into the hands of his people; and more we shall have to say of them, as they meet us in our way. In the mean time the progress which the Israelites have hitherto made, the enemies they have vanquished, and the kingdoms they have seized and divided among themselves, notwithstanding all the artifices to prevent them, do sufficiently verify that conclusion, at the end of their leader's last exhortation: ² 'Happy art thou, O Israel! Who is like unto thee, O people, saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help; and who is the sword of thy excellency! Thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee, and thou shalt tread upon their high places. The fountain of Jacob shall be upon a land of corn and wine, and his heavens shall drop down dew.'^b

^a It is reckoned good policy in a general, when he has any great design in agitation, which cannot so well be executed without passing through a neutral country, not to ask leave at first, because too much civility would lay him under the suspicion of fear; but first of all to enter the prince's country, and then to send and desire permission for his troops to march through it. But this was not Moses' practice. He first sent ambassadors to the king of the Amorites, with this peaceable message: 'Let me pass through thy land, we will not turn into the fields, or into the vineyards; we will not drink the waters of the well; but we will go along by the king's highway, till we be past the borders? Thou shalt sell me meat for money, that I may eat, and give me water for money, that I may drink; only I will pass through on my feet,' Num. xxi. 22. After so civil a message as this, if Sihon thought not proper to let the children of Israel pass through his country, he might have contented himself with so doing, because it does not appear that the Israelites ever threatened to force their passage. But when, instead of acting upon the defensive, which was all that in reason he should have done, he sets himself at the head of his forces, and marches out to fight, the war must be deemed unjust on his side, and the fate he met with no more than his desert.—Calmet's Dictionary.

^b In hot countries where showers were less frequent, the morning and evening dews were a great refreshment to the earth, and productive of much plenty, as was fully exemplified in the blessed land of Canaan, which was fruitful and abounding with every product of the earth.

CHAP. IV.—On the Land of Canaan.

BY THE EDITOR.

THOUGH reference has already been made, both in a geographical and historical point of view, to Canaan, we think it may be instructive to insert a few additional paragraphs on the same subject. The land of Canaan is, on many accounts, entitled to more particular consideration; but chiefly because it was the residence of the chosen seed, and the theatre of our redemption.

When the Maker of heaven and earth appointed to the nations their inheritance, the country which is bounded on the west, by the Mediterranean, on the east by the river Jordan, the lake Asphaltites, and the sea of Tiberias, on the north by the mountain Antilibanus, and on the south by Idumea, fell to the lot of Canaan, one of the sons of Ham. It extends about 200 miles in length and 80 in breadth. From the grandson of Noah, by whom it was peopled, it was first called the land of Canaan. It has since been distinguished by other names, as the land of prouise, the holy land, Judea, from the tribe of Judah, which possessed its finest and most fertile divisions, and Palestine, from the Philistines, by whom a great part of it was inhabited.

The descendants of Canaan, the original possessor of this highly interesting country, are thus enumerated by Moses:—'Canaan begat Sidon, his first-born, and Heth, and the Jebusite, and the Amorite, and the Girgashite, and the Hivite, and the Arkite, and the Senite, and the Arvadite, and the Zemarite, and the Hamathite.' All these families were settled at first within the limits of Canaan, but the increase of population, or what is more likely, the spirit of emigration and adventure, which is strongly felt in countries where much land remains to be occupied, soon carried them beyond the prescribed limits of their paternal inheritance. The original extent of the land of Canaan, is accurately stated by Moses in these words:—'The border of the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar, unto Gaza; and as thou goest unto Sodom, and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Lasha.'³ But the sacred historian informs us, that several Canaanitish families, in process of time, settled in the circumjacent countries: his words are—'And afterwards were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad,' namely, beyond their original bounds, which he then proceeds to describe.

The true situation of the inheritance of Sidon, the first-born of Canaan, is clearly determined by the famous city of that name. Sidon was one of the most ancient cities in the world, and long the wealthiest and greatest of which Phœnicia could boast. It was very strong both by nature and art. On the north side, a citadel, built on an inaccessible rock, and environed on all sides by the sea; and on the south side, another fort defended the mouth of the harbour. Secured on all sides against the assaults of her enemies, and enriched by the extensive commerce which she carried on with the surrounding nations of Asia and Europe, her inhabitants lived in profound security, and indulged, without restraint, in every voluptuous gratification. So great was their luxury, that 'to live after the manner of the Sidonians,' became a sort of proverbial phrase for living quietly and securely in ease and pleasure.¹ But their wealth and luxury do not seem, at least for several ages, to have enervated their minds, and destroyed their powers of exertion, and habits of industry; for we know, from the testimony of an inspired writer, that in the days of Solomon, 'none were skilled to hew timber like the Sidonians.' They are represented by writers, both sacred and profane, as excellent artificers in several other professions or trades; and in proof of this fact, many of them were retained in the pay of Solomon, and employed as his principal workmen in building the temple of Jehovah.^a

Though the Tyrians were accustomed to boast of the great antiquity of their city, it cannot be doubted that Sidon can trace her history to a still remoter date; for in the same chapter, where the prophet Isaiah records the vain boast of the Tyrians, he expressly calls Tyre the daughter of Sidon;² by which he means that the Tyrians were a colony of the Sidonians. Indeed, Tyre rose by degrees to a height of greatness and splendour, which her illustrious parent was never able to reach; yet it is evident from ancient writers, that she was for several ages greatly her inferior. The former was distinguished by the name of the strong city, so early as the days of Joshua; but in the very same passage, the latter receives the more significant and honourable title of 'the great Sidon,' to intimate that she was then the capital of Phœnicia. Nor ought it to be forgotten, that Homer never mentions Tyre in any part of his writings, while he often celebrates the ingenuity and industry of the Sidonians. Many years after Sidon was built, says an ancient writer, the Sidonians being attacked by the king of Ascalon,

^a Sidon was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, who, however, consented to receive the submission of the Sidonians, and permitted them to retain their own kings. Entering afterwards into a league with Nectanebus, king of Egypt, against Darius Oechus, king of Persia, they were besieged by the latter; when in despair they burnt their ships and their city; in which latter was so great a quantity of gold and silver melted down by the fire, that Oechus sold the ashes for a considerable sum of money. The city was, however, soon rebuilt; as about eighteen years after, we find it submitting to Alexander. It subsequently shared in the fortunes of the rest of Phœnicia, being alternately oppressed by the Grecian kings of Syria and Egypt; while its trade, together with that of Tyre, was diverted to Alexandria; though its declension was never so complete as that of the latter city. After the subversion of the Grecian empire by the Romans, Sidon fell into the hands of the latter; who, to put an end to the frequent revolt of the inhabitants deprived it of its freedom. It then fell successively under the power of the Saracens, the Seljukian Turks, and the Sultans of Egypt, who in 1289, that they might never more afford shelter to the Christians, destroyed both it and Tyre. But it again recovered, and has ever since been in the possession of the Ottoman Turks. Sidon, at present called Saïde, is still a considerable trading town, and the chief mart for Damascus and Upper Syria; but the port is nearly choked up with sand. Though presenting an imposing appearance at a distance, as it rises from the water's edge, it is like all Turkish towns ill-built and dirty, and full of ruins; having still discoverable, without the walls, some fragments of columns and other remains of the ancient city. Mr Conner made the number of inhabitants 15,000; of whom 2000 are Christians, chiefly Maronites, and 400 Jews, who have one synagogue. They are principally employed in spinning cotton; which, with some silk, and boots and shoes, or slippers, of Morocco leather, form the chief articles of commerce.—Ed.

escaped in their ships, and laid the foundation of Tyre, sometime before the destruction of Troy.^b This event happened, according to Josephus, about 240 years before the building of Solomon's temple. But after the taking of Sidon, by the Persians, the city of Tyre rapidly increased in wealth and greatness, and became in a short time, the capital of Phœnicia, and the mart of the whole earth. At the time it was besieged by Alexander, it was in every respect, the greatest commercial city in the world. Including ancient Tyre it was nineteen miles in circuit: the houses were spacious and magnificent, consisting of several stories, and higher than those of Rome. Pre-eminent in riches and splendour, rose the magnificent temples of Olympian Jove, Astarte, and other deities adored by the Tyrians, constructed by Hiram, adorned with pillars of gold, glittering with precious stones, and enriched with the splendid offerings of many kings. The city was defended by a wall of great height, formed of huge stones cemented with lime. Two harbours received its innumerable vessels, one looking towards Sidon, the other to Egypt. Strabo places it nearly at the distance of twenty-five miles from Sidon, its renowned parent. The inhabitants of Tyre, like the Sidonians, from whom they derived their origin, were distinguished for the acuteness and versatility of their genius. They were skilled in arithmetic and astronomy; but in the mechanical parts they were scarcely equalled, certainly not surpassed, by any people. For the brilliant colour known to the ancients by the name of the Tyrian purple, the kings of the east were indebted to their ingenuity. The fabrics produced in the Sidonian looms rivalled the fine linen of Egypt; while the productions of the artificer in iron, in brass, and in crystal, were not less remarkable for the beauty of the device, than for the delicacy of the execution. It is, therefore, a true account which the inspired prophet has given of the greatness and splendour of Tyre. Isaiah calls her, 'a mart of nations; the crowning city, whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honourable of the earth;' and Ezekiel, who alluding to old Tyre, places her 'at the entry of the sea;' and in another passage, to the new city, 'in the heart of the seas,' recounts the various nations that carried on a lucrative commerce with the Tyrians.

But the pride and luxury which her unrivalled power and riches produced among all ranks of her citizens, and above all, the cruel and unbrotherly triumph in which the Tyrians indulged, when the chosen people of God yielded to the arms of Nebuchadnezzar, and were led away captive beyond the river of Babylon, excited against them the displeasure of heaven. As a just punishment of their crimes, continental Tyre was taken and destroyed by the Chaldeans, after a siege of thirteen years;^c

^c At the end of this long period, continental Tyre was taken by assault and utterly destroyed, the ruins of which were afterwards called Pale Tyrus, or Old Tyre. But before this was effected, the inhabitants, foreseeing what must happen, and the blockade of Nebuchadnezzar, for want of a navy to second his land operations, being incomplete, transported all their valuable effects into a small island about a third of a mile from the shore, where they laid the foundations of New Tyre, which, by the vast resources of its trade, rose in a few years to an equal eminence and remained in a state of ruin and desolation seventy years, a term of equal duration with the captivity of Judah, whom they had so barbarously insulted in the hour of her distress. At the end of that period, Tyre recovered her wealth and splendour; an event which the prophet Zechariah describes in these striking terms: 'and Tyrus did build herself a stronghold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets. But with her commerce and prosperity, her wickedness returned; and the judgments of God quickly followed. In fulfilment of ancient prophecies which sealed her doom, and even described the manner of her future destruction, Alexander besieged, and took, and set the city on fire; but so great was the forbearance of heaven, so numerous and efficient were her resources, that in the short period of nineteen years, she was able to withstand the fleets of Antigonus, and to sustain a siege of fifteen months before she was taken. But the time of her final desolation at length arrived; and nothing could divert or retard the full accomplishment of the divine purpose long before expressed by an inspired prophet: 'Thus saith the Lord God, behold I am against thee, O Tyrus, and will cause many nations to come up against thee, as the sea causeth her waves to come up: and they shall destroy the walls of Tyrus, and break down her towers; I will also scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock: it shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea, for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God.'¹ To show the certainty of this fearful sentence, it is repeated: 'I will make thee like the top of a rock; thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon; thou shalt be built no more; for I the Lord have spoken it, saith the Lord God.' And again; 'I will make thee a terror, and thou shalt be no more; though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again, saith the Lord God.'² The exact fulfilment of this prediction in all its parts, is attested by so many travellers of unimpeachable veracity, who beheld and examined the ruins of this once great, powerful, and splendid city, that the most stubborn unbeliever is awed into silence.⁴

The descendants of Heth, or the Hittites, the second family of Canaan mentioned by Moses, were planted about Hebron, in the southern division of the country. Moses informs us, that Sarah died at Hebron, and 'Abraham spake to the sons of Heth' about the purchase with the old city which had been destroyed. The rage of Nebuchadnezzar was so great at finding the place almost deserted, and entirely cleared of every thing valuable, that he razed the buildings to the ground, and killed every inhabitant that could be found. Two hundred years afterwards, Alexander, by forming a causeway from the mainland to the island, reduced New Tyre, after a seven months' siege.—Ed.

a Tyre has again partially revived: Mr Buckingham, who visited it in 1816, represents it as containing 800 substantial stone built houses, and from 5000 to 8000 inhabitants. But Mr Jowett, on the authority of the Greek archbishop, reduces this number to less than 4000; namely, 1200 Greek catholics, 100 Maronites, 100 Greeks, 1000 Mountanalis, and 100 Turks. Mr Jowett observed numerous and beautiful columns stretched along the beach, or standing in fragments, half buried in the sand that has been accumulating for ages. 'The broken aqueduct, and the ruins which appear in its neighbourhood, exist as an affecting monument of the fragile and transitory nature of earthly grandeur.'³ The old, or continental Tyre, has long since disappeared, and its very site, like that of Nineveh and Babylon, cannot now be accurately recognised.—Ed.

of a burying-place; and adds in a subsequent verse, 'Abraham stood up and bowed himself to the people of the land, even to the children of Heth;' which sufficiently proves their claim to that part of the family inheritance. The principal settlements of the Hittites, were in the mountainous part of the country; for the Hittites are mentioned with the Jebusites as dwelling in the mountains.

The city of Hebron was originally called Kirjath Arba, or the city of Arba, a great man among the Anakims.³ It was a place of great antiquity; for, according to Moses, it was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt, the naval city of the Pharaohs, the ancient kings of Egypt; and was one of the oldest cities in that kingdom. Hebron was situated among the mountains, on the ridge which runs southward from Jerusalem. It became famous for the long residence of Abraham in its neighbourhood, and for being the burying-place of his family. In succeeding times, it was the chosen abode of David during the first seven years of his reign; and is supposed to have been the dwelling-place of Zacharias and Elizabeth, the parents of John the baptist. Hebron was also one of the cities of refuge, and was given to the tribe of Levi, by the appointment of Jehovah.

In the immediate neighbourhood of this city, was the plain of Mamre, called in another passage of Scripture, the vale of Hebron. It lies on the south side of the town, at a distance of about two miles; and is represented as remarkably fertile and pleasant; a circumstance sufficiently attested by the protracted residence of the venerable patriarch, who had a right to select the richest pastures of Canaan. His tent was pitched under the shade of a spreading oak, from whence, reposing at his ease, he could see his flocks and his herds feeding at large on the surrounding hills. But what chiefly recommended Mamre and its umbrageous oak to him, was the vision of angels with which he was honoured, on their way to execute the vengeance of God in the cities of the plain; a circumstance which has rendered that fertile vale memorable to every succeeding age.⁶

Next to the Hittites in the same tract of country, were planted the sons of Jebus, who seem to have been its original inhabitants. The capital city of their possessions was called Jebus, in honour of their venerable founder; a name which it afterwards exchanged for Jerusalem, one of the most celebrated on the records of history. These facts are explicitly stated by the inspired writer: 'And David and all Israel went to Jerusalem which is Jebus; where the Jebusites were the inhabitants of the land.'⁴ This city is first mentioned in Scripture under the name of Salem, which is by interpretation, peace; the capital of the kingdom over which Melchizedek reigned. The name by which it was afterwards known, seems to be compounded of both Jebus and

Salen, and to have been originally written Jebussalem, but, for the sake of the sound, afterwards softened into Jerusalem. In Hebrew the word assumes the dual form, and is commonly read Jerusalem; probably to denote that the city consisted of two parts, of which one was the old city, where Melchizedek and the Jebusites dwelt; and the other the new city built by David and his successors on the throne of Israel and Judah, which for its extent might be regarded as a new city, or new Jerusalem. This term, the Greeks, adapting it to their language, according to their usual practice, changed into Hierosolyma, which literally signifies the sacred city.

The old city founded by the Jebusites before Abraham arrived in Canaan, is styled by some writers the city of Melchizedek, not because he was the founder, but because it was the seat of his government. This ancient city was so strongly fortified both by nature and art, that the people of Israel could not drive out the Jebusites, its original inhabitants, but were reduced to live with them at Jerusalem. The armies of Israel indeed seized the city; but the Jebusites kept possession of the strong fort which defended the town, till the reign of David, who took it by storm, and changed its name to the city of David, to signify the importance of the conquest, and to perpetuate the memory of the event. Having chosen Jerusalem for the place of his residence and the capital of his kingdom, he adorned the fortress with a royal palace for his own accommodation, and a variety of other buildings, which, from the continual additions made to them in succeeding reigns, increased to the size of a considerable city, and covered nearly the whole of Mount Zion. The largeness of the city of David, may be inferred from the expression of the sacred historian: 'David built round about from Millo and inward.'¹ This passage, and particularly the word Millo, has greatly exercised the genius and divided the sentiments of commentators; and is therefore entitled to more particular notice. That Millo was situate in the city of David, the inspired historian expressly asserts.² It seems to have been a public building, where the king and his princes met in council about affairs of state. The words of the historian are: 'And this is the reason of the levy (or tax) which king Solomon raised; for to build the house of the Lord, and his own house, and Millo, and the wall of Jerusalem, and Hazor, and Megiddo, and Gezer.' But every ground of hesitation is removed by the sacred writer of the second book of Kings, who calls it expressly 'the house of Millo.'³ That it was a public building, in one of whose apartments the council of state met to deliberate upon public affairs, is rendered extremely probable by one of the kings of Judah losing his life there by the hands of his princes; for we are told, that 'the servants of king Joash arose and made a conspiracy, and slew him in the house of Millo,' whither he had probably come to consult with his princes and other principal persons upon some affairs of state.

This interpretation is greatly strengthened by a passage in the book of Judges, which informs us, that 'all the men of Shechem gathered together, and all the house of Millo, and went and made Abimelech king.' The city of Shechem then had also its house of Millo, and a great number of persons connected with it, whom the sacred writer distinguishes from the men of the city. Now, since both were concerned in making Abimelech king, it is natural to conclude, that the men of the city were the inferior inhabitants, and the house of Millo the chief men of the place: both of whom on this occasion met in the senate-house, to set the crown upon the head of their favourite.

The house of Millo upon Mount Zion, appears to have been a place of great strength, and essentially connected with the defence of Jerusalem; for when Hezekiah discovered that Sennacherib meditated the reduction of Jerusalem, 'he strengthened himself, and built up all the wall that was broken, and raised it up to the towers, and another wall without, and repaired Millo in the city of David, and made darts and shields in abundance.'⁴ From the intimate connexion between the repairing of Millo and the making of darts and other implements of war, it has been conjectured by some writers that one part of that public building was occupied as an armoury, in which there is nothing improbable.

The possessions of the Philistines were divided into five lordships, denominated from their chief towns, Gaza, Ashdod, Eshkalon, Gath, and Ekron.

Gaza lay in the southern extremity of that narrow strip of country which submitted to the arms of the Philistines; and the city of Gaza, from which the lordship took its name, stood in the south-west angle of the land of Canaan. This was the city whose gates Samson carried away to the top of the hill, and where he was kept in prison by his cruel and ungenerous enemies. It was famous for the temple of Dagon, which the renowned Israelite pulled down upon himself and his unfeeling tormentors, in revenge for the loss of his sight and his liberty. This place was afterwards chosen by the Persians, to be the treasury where they deposited the tribute of the western provinces of their immense empire; whence all riches received, at length, among the people of those countries, the name of Gaza. It was destroyed by Alexander the Great, as the prophet had foretold, and consigned to perpetual desolation. The city built by Constantine, and called by the name of Gaza, is nearer to the sea than the ancient city, and by consequence does not affect the truth of the prediction.

Next to Gaza, northward, rose the city of Askelon, styled by the Greeks and Latins, Ascalon, and situate also on the sea shore. It is said to have been famous among the idolatrous nations of antiquity, for a temple dedicated to Decreto, the mother of Semiramis, who was adored here under the form of a mermaid; and for a temple of Apollo, in which Herod, the father of Antipater, and grandfather of Herod the great, officiated as priest.

Above Ascalon, still farther to the north, stood the city of Ashdod, called by the Greeks, Azotus, and mentioned under that name in the Acts of the Apostles. It lies near the shores between Gaza and Joppa, and was distinguished by the temple of Dagon. Into this temple the captive ark of Jehovah was brought, by the triumphant idolaters, and set by the side of their unsightly idol. But their joy was of short duration, the object of their stupid veneration was cast prostrate before the symbol of the divine presence, and broken in pieces, and a severe but righteous vengeance inflicted on themselves, for their presumption. The passage is too important to be omitted. 'And when they of Ashdod rose early on the morrow, behold Dagon was fallen on his face to the earth, before the ark of the Lord: and they took Dagon and set him in his place again. And when they rose early on the morrow morning, behold Dagon was fallen on his face to the ground, before the ark of the Lord; and the head of Dagon, and both the palms of his hands were cut off upon the threshold, only the stump of Dagon was left to him.' Nor was this all; 'The hand of the Lord was heavy upon the men of Ashdod; and he destroyed and smote them with emrods, even Ashdod, and the coast thereof. And when the men of Ashdod saw that it was so, they said, 'The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us; for his hand is sore upon us, and upon Dagon our god. They sent, therefore, and gathered all the lords of the Philistines unto them, and said, What shall we do with the ark of the God of Israel? And they answered, Let the ark of the God of Israel be carried about unto Gath. And they carried the ark of the God of Israel thither.'¹

Gath, lying still farther to the north than Ashdod, was memorable in the history of the Old Testament, for being the birthplace of the giant Goliath, who defied the armies of the living God, and suffered the punishment due to his impiety, from the hand of David. The city was dismantled by this prince, but was afterwards rebuilt by Rehoboam his grandson, and after being again dismantled by Azias, king of Judah, was totally destroyed by Hazael, king of Syria. But from this catastrophe it gradually recovered, and retained its ancient name in the days of Eusebius and Jerome, who place it about four miles from Eleutheropolis, towards Diospolis, or Lydda.

Gath suffered severely while the ark of the covenant was detained within its walls: 'The hand of the Lord,' says the sacred writer, 'was against the city with a very great destruction; and he smote the men of the city, both small and great; and they had emrods in their secret parts. Therefore they sent the ark of God to Ekron.'² This city was placed in the northern extremity of the country, which submitted to the yoke of the Philistines. It was called by the Greeks Accaron; was a place of great wealth and power, and held out a long time against the armies of Israel. Ekron is frequently mentioned in the holy Scriptures, and particularly for the idolatrous worship of Beelzebub, that is, the lord of flies; a name given him by the Jews, either in contempt of his divinity, and the rites of his worship, or in allusion to the numerous swarms of flies which attended his sacrifices. But whatever might be the reason for distinguishing by this name, certain it is, in this city was the principal seat of his worship: here he was held in the highest honour, and is therefore called in Scripture, 'the God of Ekron.'

The inhabitants of Ekron, less hardened in crime, or less insensible to danger than their neighbours, were the first that advised the Philistines to restore the ark of Jehovah, the God of Israel. 'The Ekronites cried out, saying, They have brought about the ark of the God of Israel to us, to slay us and our people. So they sent and gathered together all the lords of the Philistines, and said, Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go to its own place;' and the destructive calamity which hung over their devoted city was averted.

The land of Canaan was reserved by the wisdom and goodness of Heaven, for the possession of his peculiar people, and the display of the most stupendous wonders. The theatre was small, but admirably situated for the convenient observation of the human race,—at the junction of the two great continents of Asia and Africa, and almost within sight of Europe. From this highly favoured spot, as from a common centre, the report of God's wonderful works, the glad tidings of salvation through the obedience and sufferings of his eternal Son, might be rapidly and easily wafted to every part of the globe, and circulated through every nation. When the most High, therefore, fixed the boundaries of the post-diluvian kingdoms, he reserved the inheritance of Canaan, for the future seat of his glory; and while powerful states, and extended empires rose and flourished, in the circumjacent regions, his secret providence parcelled out the land of promise among a number of petty kings, whose individual weakness and jarring interests, gave them an easy prey to the armies of Israel. To this arrangement the inspired prophet certainly refers in these words, 'Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations; ask thy father, and he will show thee, thy elders, and he will tell thee.' When the most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people, according to the number of the children of Israel. Canaan and his posterity were directed to take possession of Palestine, rather than any other branch of Noah's descendants, because he had already fallen under the solemn malediction of his grandfather Noah, for his unnatural conduct; and they were permitted to fill up the measure of their iniquity by a general corruption of manners, and particularly, by departing from the knowledge of the true God, to the service of idols; and therefore might be justly driven out, when the time fixed in the divine purpose arrived, to make room for the chosen people of Jehovah. 'Their bounds,' says the inspired writer, 'he set, according to the number of the children of Israel;' for Canaan and his eleven sons exactly correspond with the twelve tribes, into which the family of Jacob was divided.³

CHAP. V.—On the Mountains of Canaan.

BY THE EDITOR.

PALESTINE is, in general, a mountainous country; even the whole of Syria, of which the Holy Land is reckoned a part, is in some degree a chain of mountains, branching off in various directions, from one great and leading ridge. Whether the traveller approach it from the sea, or from the immense plains of the desert, he beholds, at a great distance, a lofty and clouded chain running north and south as far as the eye can reach; and as he advances, sees the tops of the mountains sometimes detached, and sometimes united in ridges, uniformly terminate in one great line, towering above them all. This line, which extends without interruption, from its entry by the north quite into Arabia, runs at first close to the sea, between Alexandretta and the Orontes; and after opening a passage to that river, proceeds to the southward, quitting for a short distance the shore, and in a chain of summits stretches as far as the sources of the Jordan; where it divides into two branches, to enclose, as it were, in a capacious basin, this river and its three lakes. During its course, a countless number of branches separate from the main trunk, some of which are lost in the desert, where they form various enclosed hollows, as those of Damascus and Haran; while others advance towards the sea, where they sometimes end in steep declivities as at Carmel, or Nekoura, or by a gentle descent sink into the plains of Antioch and Tripoli, of Tyre and Acre.

Such is the general appearance of the country which Moses taught his people to expect, while they traversed the burning and dreary wilderness: 'for the land whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowest thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot as a garden of herbs: but the land whither ye go to possess it, is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven.'¹ The striking contrast, in this short but glowing description, between the land of Egypt, where the people of Israel had so long and so cruelly suffered, and the inheritance promised to their fathers, where Jehovah reserved for them and their children every blessing that a nation can desire, must have made a deep impression on their minds. In Egypt, the eye is fatigued with wandering over an immense flat plain, intersected with stagnant canals, and studded with mud-walled towns and cottages; seldom refreshed with a single shower; exhibiting, for three months, the singular spectacle of an extensive sheet of water, from which the towns and villages that are built upon the higher grounds, are seen like islands in the midst of the ocean, marshy and rank with vegetation for three others—and parched and dusty the remainder of the year. They had seen a population of naked and sunburnt peasants, tending their buffaloes, or driving their camels, or sheltering themselves from the overwhelming heat beneath the shade of the thinly scattered date or sycamore trees; below, natural or artificial lakes, cultivated fields, and vacant grounds of considerable extent—overhead, a burning sun, darting his oppressive rays from an azure sky, almost invariably free from clouds. In that "weary land," they were compelled to water their corn fields with the foot; a painful and laborious employment, rendered necessary by the want of rain. Those vegetable productions which require a greater quantity of moisture than is furnished by the periodical inundations of the Nile, they were obliged to refresh with water drawn out of the river by machinery, and lodged afterwards in capacious cisterns. When the melons, sugar canes, and other vegetables that are commonly disposed in rills, required to be refreshed, they struck out the plugs which are fixed in the bottoms of the cisterns; and then the water gushing out, is conducted from one rill to another by the husbandman who is always ready, as occasion requires, to stop and divert the torrent, by turning the earth against it with his foot, opening at the same time with his mattock a new trench to receive it.² Such is the practice to which Moses alludes; and it continues to be observed without variation to this day. But from this fatiguing uniformity of surface, and toilsome method of watering their grounds, the people of Israel were now to be relieved; they were going to possess a land of hills and valleys, clothed with woods, beautified and enriched with fountains of water, divided by rivers, streams, and brooks, flowing cool and pure from the summits of their mountains, and, with little attention from the cultivator, exciting the secret powers of vegetation, and scattering plenty wherever they came.

Sometimes the drought of summer renders frequent waterings necessary even in Judea. On such occasions, the water is drawn up from the wells by oxen, and carried by the inhabitants in earthen jars, to refrigerate their plantations on the sides of the hills.³ The necessity to which the Jewish husbandman is occasionally reduced, to water his grounds in this manner, is not inconsistent with the words of Moses, which distinguish the Holy Land from Egypt, by its drinking rain from heaven, while the latter is watered by the foot. The inspired prophet alludes, in that passage, not to gardens of herbs, or other cultivated spots on the steep declivities of the hills and mountains, where, in so warm a climate as that of Canaan, the deficiency of rain must be supplied by art, but to their corn fields; which, in Egypt, are watered by artificial canals, in the manner just described; in Canaan by the rain of heaven.

The most remarkable mountains in Palestine, are those of Lebanon, so frequently celebrated in the holy Scriptures. This lofty range, described by ancient and modern historians under the names of Libanus and Antilibanus, is the highest point of all Syria, and serves equally as a boundary to Judea and Assyria; but, so frequent mention is made of them in the writings of the prophets, that they are generally included within the confines of the land of promise. They reach their highest elevation to the south-east of Tripoli; and their towering summits capped with clouds, are discerned at the distance of thirty leagues. The superior height of Lebanon, is ascertained by the course of the rivers. The Orontes, flowing from the mountains of Damascus, loses itself below Antioch; the Kasmia which, north of Balbec, shapes its course towards Tyre; the Jordan, forced by the declivities towards the south, prove this to be the highest point. Next to Lebanon, the highest part of the country is Akkar, which becomes visible as soon as the traveller leaves Marra in the desert. It appears like an immense flattened cone, and is constantly seen for two days' journey. The height of these mountains has not been ascertained by the barometer; but we may deduce it from a circumstance mentioned by every traveller who visits the land of promise. In winter, their tops are entirely covered with snow, from Alexandretta to Jerusalem, but after March, it melts, except on Mount Lebanon; where, however, according to Volney, it does not continue the whole year, unless in the highest cavities, and towards the north-east, where it is sheltered from the sea breeze, and the rays of the sun. In this situation, that traveller saw it at the very time he complains of being nearly suffocated with heat in the valley of Balbec. Now since it is fully ascertained, that snow in this latitude, requires an elevation of fifteen or sixteen hundred fathoms, we may conclude that to be the height of Lebanon. It is therefore much lower than the Alps, or even than the Pyrenees: Mont Blanc, the loftiest of the Alps, is estimated at two thousand four hundred fathoms above the level of the sea; and the peak of Apian in the Pyrenees, at nineteen hundred.

Lebanon, which gives its name to the extensive range of the Kessauan, and the country of the Drusez, presents to the traveller everywhere majestic mountains. At every step, he meets with scenes in which nature displays beauty or grandeur, sometimes romantic wildness, but always variety. The sublime elevation and steep ascent of this magnificent rampart, which seems to enclose the country; the gigantic masses which shoot into the clouds, inspire him with astonishment and reverence. Should he scale these summits which bounded his view, and ascend the highest point of Lebanon, distinguished by the name of the Samin, the immensity of space which expands around him, becomes a fresh subject of admiration. On every side, he beholds a horizon without bounds; whilst, in clear weather, the sight is lost over the desert, which extends to the Persian gulf, and over the sea, which washes the coasts of Europe. He seems to command the whole world; while the wandering eye, now surveying the successive chains of mountains, transports the mind in one instant, from Antioch to Jerusalem; and now, approaching the surrounding objects, observes the distant profundity of the coast, till the attention at last fixed by distinct objects, more minutely examines the rocks, the woods, the torrents, the sloping sides of the hills, the villages and the towns; and the mind secretly exults at the diminution of objects, which formerly appeared so great. He sees the valleys obscured by stormy clouds, with fresh delight, and smiles at hearing the thunder, which so often burst over his head, growling beneath his feet; while the threatening summits of the mountains are diminished, till they appear like the furrows of a ploughed field, or the steps of an amphitheatre, and he feels himself gratified by an elevation above so many lofty objects, on which he now looks down with inward satisfaction.¹

On visiting the interior parts of these mountains, the roughness of the roads, the steep descents and precipices, strike him at first with terror; but the sagacity of the mule which he rides, the only beast of burden which can traverse them with safety, soon relieves him, and he calmly surveys those picturesque scenes that entertain him in quick succession. There he travels whole days together, to reach a place which was in sight at his departure; he winds, descends, skirts the hills, and climbs their precipitous sides; and in this perpetual change, it seems as if magic herself varied for him at every step, the decorations of the scenery. Sometimes he sees villages gliding from the steep declivities on which they were built, and so arranged, that the terraces of one row of houses, serve as a street to those above them. Sometimes he sees the habitation of a recluse, standing on a solitary height; here a rock, perforated by a torrent, and become a natural arch; there another rock, worn perpendicular, resembles a high wall. On the sides of the hills, he frequently sees beds of stones uncovered and detached by the waters, rising up like artificial ruins. In many places, the waters meeting with inclined beds, have excavated the intermediate earth, and formed caverns; in others, subterraneous channels are formed, through which flow rivulets for a part of the year. These subterraneous rivulets are common throughout Syria; they are found near Damascus, at the sources of the Orontes, and at those of the Jordan. That of the Mar-Kama, near the village of Shouair, opens by a gulf called Elbaloisa, or the Swallower. It is an aperture of about ten feet wide, in the middle of a hollow; at the depth of fifteen feet, is a sort of first bottom, but it only hides a very profound lateral opening. Some years before Volney visited Lebanon, it was shut, as it had served to conceal a murder. The winter rains coming on, the waters collected and formed a pretty deep lake; but some small streams penetrating among the stones, they were soon stripped of the earth which fastened them, and the pressure of the mass of water prevailing, the whole obstacle was removed with an explosion like thunder; and the re-action of the compressed air was so violent, that a column of water spouted up, and fell upon a house at the distance of at least two hundred paces. The current thus occasioned, formed a whirlpool, which swallowed up the trees and vines planted in the hollow, and threw them out by the second aperture.

These picturesque situations often become tragical. By thaws and earthquakes, rocks have been known to lose their equilibrium, roll down on the neighbouring houses, and bury the inhabitants. This happened about twenty years before Volney's visit, when a fragment of the mountain, slipping from its base, overwhelmed a whole village, without leaving a single trace where it formerly stood. Still more lately, and near the same place, says that traveller, the entire side of a hill covered with mulberries and vines, was detached by a sudden thaw, and sliding down the rock, was launched like a ship from the rocks, into the valley below. It might be supposed, that such accidents would disgust the inhabitants of these mountains; but, besides that they happen seldom, they are compensated by an advantage, which makes them prefer their perilous habitations, to the most stable and fertile plains,—the security they enjoy from the oppressions of the Turks. This security is esteemed so great a blessing by the inhabitants, that they have discovered an industry on these rocks, which we may elsewhere expect in vain. By mere art and labour, they have fertilized a rocky soil. Sometimes to gain water, they conduct it by a thousand windings along the declivities, or stop it by dams in the valleys; while in other places they support the ground, ready to crumble down, by walls and terraces. Almost all these mountains cultivated in this manner, have the appearance of a flight of stairs, or an amphitheatre, every step of which is a row of vines or mulberry trees. Our author computed from one hundred to one hundred and twenty of these gradations on the same declivity. In many places, their summits are flattened and stretched into vast plains; which reward the toil of the cultivator with luxuriant crops of corn and all kinds of pulse. Numerous rivulets of excellent water intersect these elevated regions, and diffuse on every side the nicest verdure. The soil which covers the declivities, and the narrow valleys which separate them, is extremely fertile, and produces in abundance, corn, wine, and oil, which D'Arvieux pronounces to be the best in Syria.

These mountains consist of a hard calcareous, whitish, stone, sonorous like freestone, and disposed in strata variously inclined. This stone has nearly the same appearance in every part of Syria: sometimes it is quite bare and peeled; such, for instance, is that of the hills on the north side of the road from Antioch to Aleppo, and that which serves as a bed to the upper part of the rivulet which passes by the latter city. In travelling from Aleppo to Hama, veins of the same rock are constantly to be met with in the plain; while the mountains on the right present huge piles, which appear like the ruins of towns and castles. The same stone, under a more regular form, likewise composes the greater part of Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon, the mountains of the Drusez, Galilee, and Mount Carmel, and stretch to the south of the lake Asphaltites. The inhabitants everywhere build their houses, and make lime with it. Of this beautiful stone was the temple of Jehovah built, and the other splendid edifices with which Solomon adorned the capital of his kingdom. He 'had threescore and ten thousand that bare burdens, and fourscore hewers in the mountains; and the king commanded, and brought great stones, costly stones, and hewed stones, to lay the foundations of the house. And Solomon's builders and Hiram's builders did hew them, and the stone-squarers.'¹

Volney never heard that these stones contained any petrified shells in the upper regions of Lebanon; but he found between Batround and Djebail, in the Kesraonan, not far from the sea, a quarry of schistus stone, the flakes of which bear the impressions of plants, fish, shells, and particularly the sea onion. The bed of the torrent of Azkalon, in Palestine, is also lined with a heavy stone, porous and salt, which contains many small volutes and bivalves of the Mediterranean. Pooecke found a large quantity of them in the rocks which border on the Lead Sea. These are indubitable remains of the antediluvian world, and afford an additional proof, if any were needed, of the existence and prevalence of the deluge over the surface of our globe.

So famous was this stupendous mountain (Lebanon) in the days of Moses, that to be permitted to see it, was the object of his earnest desires and repeated prayers: and, as the strongest expression of his admiration, he connects it in his addresses to the throne of his God, with Zion the future seat of his divine glory. 'I pray thee, let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan; that goodly mountain and Lebanon.'

The storms and tempests which, gathering on the highest peak of Lebanon, burst on the plains and valleys below, are often very severe. When De la Valle was travelling in the neighbourhood of that mountain, in the end of April, a wind blew from its summit so vehement and so cold, with so great a profusion of snow, that though he and his companions were in a manner buried in their quilted coverlets, yet it was sensibly felt, and proved very disagreeable. It is not, therefore, without reason that Lebanon, or the white mountain, as the term signifies, is the same by which that lofty chain is distinguished; and that the sacred writers so frequently refer to the snow and the gelid waters of Lebanon. They sometimes allude to it as a wild and desolate region; and certainly no part of the earth is more dreary and barren than the Samin, the region of perpetual snow. On that naked summit, the seat of storm and tempest, where the principles of vegetation are extinguished, the art and industry of man can make no impression; nothing but the creating power of God himself, can produce a favourable alteration. Thus, predicting a wonderful change, such as results from the signal manifestations of the divine favour to individuals or the church, the prophet demands, 'Is it not yet a very little while, and Lebanon shall be turned into a fruitful field?'² The contrast in this promise between the naked, snowy, and tempestuous summit of Lebanon, and a field beautified and enriched with the fairest and most useful productions of nature, expresses with great force, the difference which the smiles of Heaven produce in the most wretched and hopeless circumstances of an individual or a nation.

Lebanon was justly considered as a very strong barrier to the land of promise; and opposing an almost insurmountable obstacle to the movements of cavalry and chariots of war. When Sennacherib, therefore, in the arrogance of his heart, and the pride of his strength, wished to express the ease with which he had subdued the greatest difficulties, and how vain was the resistance of Hezekiah and his people, he says, 'By the multitude of my chariots am I come up to the height of the mountains, to the sides of Lebanon; and I will cut down the tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir-trees thereof; and I will enter into the height of his border, and the forest of his Carmel.' What others accomplish on foot with much labour and the greatest difficulty, by a winding path cut into steps, which no beast of burden, except the cautious and surefooted mule, can tread, that haughty monarch vaunted he could perform with horses and a multitude of chariots. Surrounded by crouching slaves, and accustomed to see every obstacle vanish before him, he vainly supposed he could gratify the most inordinate desire; and what the world accounted physical impossibilities, must yield to his power.

The lofty summits of Lebanon were the chosen haunts of various beasts of prey; the prints of whose feet, Maundrell and his party observed in the snow. To these savage tenants of the desert, the prophet Habakkuk seems to allude in that prediction: 'For the violence of Lebanon shall cover thee, and the spoil of beasts, which made them afraid, because of men's blood, and for the violence of the land.'³ The violence of Lebanon is a beautiful and energetic expression, denoting the ferocious animals that roam on its mountains, and lodge in its thickets; and that, occasionally descending into the plain in quest of prey, ravage the fold or seize upon the unwary villager. To such dangers Solomon expressly refers, in the animated invitation which, in the name of the Redeemer, he addresses to the church: 'Come with me from Lebanon, my spouse, with me from Lebanon: look from the top of Amanah, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lions' dens, from the mountains of the leopards.'¹ With these fierce and ravenous animals, the prophet Jeremiah joins the wolves of the evening, and sends them to lay waste the habitations of his guilty and unrepenting nation: 'Wherefore a lion out of the forest shall slay them, and a wolf of the evening shall spoil them; a leopard shall watch over their cities, every one that goeth out thence shall be torn in pieces; because their transgressions are many, and their backslidings are increased.'² Near the base of the mountains, the traveller is entertained with a more pleasing sight than the lion slumbering in his den, or the print of his feet in the snow; he sees the hart or the deer shooting from the steep, to quench his thirst in the stream.² It was when David wandered near the foot of Lebanon, driven by his unnatural son Absalom from Zion and the fountain of Israel, the scenes of divine manifestation, that he marked the rapid course of these animals to the rivulets which descended from the sides of the mountains. He saw the hart panting for the water brooks, and the sight reminded him of his former enjoyments, while the circumstances of the creature bore a striking analogy to his own situation and feelings at the time. The passage, in which, prompted by the casual incident, he poured out the ardent longings of his soul for the waters of life, is wonderfully beautiful and tender: 'As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so pants my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, the living God; when shall I come and appear before God?'³

Though the upper regions of Lebanon are unfit for the habitation of man, they still contribute to his advantage. From their accumulated snows descend a thousand streams of pure and wholesome water, to irrigate the fields below, to clothe them with verdure, and enrich them with the choicest products. The fountains and the streams of Lebanon, furnish accordingly a number of pleasing figures to the inspired writers. The church is described in the Song of Solomon, as a fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon.⁴ And the prophet, in reproving the folly and perverseness of his people, demands, 'Will a man leave the snow of Lebanon which cometh from the rock of the field? or, shall the cold flowing waters that come from another place be forsaken?'⁵ No man, in the sober exercise of reason, would leave the pure and refreshing streams which descend from the sides of that stupendous mountain, for the miry puddle or the insipid waters of the cistern; yet, with still greater absurdity than such conduct betrays, had the chosen people of God forsaken the worship of his name, for the degrading and unprofitable service of idols.

The approach to Lebanon is adorned with olive plantations, vineyards, and luxuriant fields; and its lower regions, besides the olive and the vine, are beautified with the myrtle, the styrax, and other odoriferous shrubs; and the perfume which exhales from these plants is increased by the fragrance of the cedars, which crown the summits, or garnish the declivities of the mountain. The great ravine, which runs a long way up into the mountain, and is on both sides exceedingly steep and high, is clothed from the top to the bottom with fragrant evergreens, and everywhere refreshed with streams, descending from the rocks in beautiful cascades, the work of divine wisdom and goodness. These cool and limpid streams, uniting at the bottom, form a large and rapid torrent, whose agreeable murmur is heard over all the place, and adds greatly to the pleasure of that romantic scene.⁶ The fragrant odours wafted from the aromatic plants of this noble mountain, have not been overlooked by the sacred writers. The eulogium which Christ pronounces on the graces of the church, contains the following direct reference: 'The smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon;' and the prophet Hosea, in his glowing description of the future prosperity of Israel, converts the assertion of Solomon into a promise: 'His branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the olive-tree, and his smell as Lebanon.'⁷

The richness and flavour of the wines produced in its vineyards have been celebrated by travellers in all ages. Rauwolf declares, that the wine which he drank at Canobin, a Greek monastery on Mount Libanus, far surpassed any he had ever tasted. His testimony is corroborated by Le Bruin, who pronounces the wines of Canobin better and more delicate than are to be found any where else in the world.⁷ They are red, of a beautiful colour, and so oily that they adhere to the glass; these are so excellent, that our traveller thought he never tasted any kind of drink more delicious. The wines produced on other parts of the mountain, although in much greater abundance, are not nearly so good. To the delicious wines of Canobin, the prophet Hosea certainly refers in this promise: 'They that dwelt under his shadow shall return; they shall revive as the corn, and grow as the vine; the scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon.'⁸

In striking allusion to the scenery and productions of that mountain, it is promised in the sixth verse: 'His branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the olive-tree, and his smell (or his memorial, as the original term signifies,) as Lebanon.'⁷ His branches shall spread like the mighty arms of the cedar, every one of which is equal in size to a tree; his beauty shall be as the olive-tree, which is admitted by all who have seen it, to be one of the most beautiful productions of nature; and his smell, his very memorial, shall be as the wine of Lebanon, which delights the taste, and the very recollection of which excites the commendation of those that have drunk it, long after the banquet is over. The meaning of these glorious figures undoubtedly is, that the righteous man shall prosper by the distinguishing favour of Heaven; shall become excellent, and useful, and highly respected while he lives; and after his death, his memory shall be blessed, and embalmed in the affectionate recollection of the church, for the benefit of many who had not the opportunity of profiting by his example.

The fragrant odour of the wines produced in the vineyards of Lebanon, seems chiefly to have attracted the notice of our translators. This quality is either fictitious or natural. The orientals, not satisfied with the fragrance emitted by the essential oil of the grape, frequently put spices into their wines to increase their flavour. To this practice Solomon alludes in these words: 'I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine of the juice of my pomegranate.'¹ But Savary, in his Letters on Greece, affirms, that various kinds of naturally perfumed wines are produced in Crete; and the wine of Lebanon, to which the sacred writer alludes, was probably of the same species.

The cedar of Lebanon has, in all ages, been reckoned an object of unrivalled grandeur and beauty in the vegetable kingdom. It is accordingly one of the natural images which frequently occur in the poetical style of the Hebrew prophets, and is appropriated to denote kings, princes, and potentates of the highest rank. Thus, the prophet Isaiah, whose writings abound with metaphors and allegories of this kind, in denouncing the judgments of God upon the proud and arrogant, declares, that² 'the day of the Lord of hosts, shall be upon all the cedars of Lebanon that are high and lifted up, and upon all the oaks of Bashan.' The king of Israel used the same figure, in his reply to the challenge of the king of Judah: 'the thistle that was in Lebanon, sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughter to my son to wife: and there passed by a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trod down the thistle.' The spiritual prosperity of the righteous man, is compared by the psalmist to the same noble plant: 'The righteous shall flourish as the palm-tree; he shall grow as the cedar in Lebanon.'³ Whatever is majestic and comely in the human countenance; whatever commands the reverence, and excites the love of the beholder,—Lebanon and its towering cedars are employed by the sacred writers to express.

To break the cedars, and shake the enormous mass on which they grew, are the figures that David selects, to express the awful majesty and infinite power of Jehovah: 'The voice of the Lord is powerful: the voice of the Lord is full of majesty. The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars: yea, the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon. He makes them also to skip like a calf: Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn.'⁴ This description of the divine majesty and power, possesses a character of awful sublimity, which is almost unequalled, even in the page of inspiration. Jehovah has only to speak, and the cedar which braves the fierce winds of heaven is broken, even the cedar of Lebanon, every arm of which rivals the size of a tree; he has only to speak, and the enormous mass of matter on which it grows, shakes to its foundation, till, extensive, and lofty, and ponderous as it is, it leaps like the young of the herd in their joyous frolics, and skips like the young unicorn, the swiftest of the four-footed race.

The stupendous size, the extensive range, and great elevation of Libanus; its towering summits capped with perpetual snow, or crowned with fragrant cedars; its olive plantations; its vineyards producing the most deli-icious vines; its clear fountains and cold-flowing brooks; its fertile vales and odoriferous shrubberies,—combine to form in Scripture language, 'the glory of Lebanon.'⁵ The extensive forests of cedars which adorned and perfumed the summits and declivities of those mountains, have almost disappeared. Only a small number of these 'trees of God,' which, according to the usual import of the phrase, signally displayed the divine power, wisdom, and goodness, now remain. Their countless number, in the days of Solomon, and their prodigious bulk, must be recollected, in order to feel the force of that sublime declaration of the prophet: 'Lebanon is not sufficient to burn, nor the beasts thereof for a burnt-offering.'⁶ Though the trembling sinner were to make choice of Lebanon for the altar; were to cut down all its forests to form the pile; though the fragrance of this fuel, with all its odoriferous gums were the incense; the wine of Lebanon pressed from all its vineyards the libation; and all its beasts the propitiatory sacrifice; all would prove insufficient to make an atonement for the sins of men; would be regarded as nothing in the eyes of the supreme Judge for the expiation of even one transgression. The just and holy law of God requires a nobler altar, a costlier sacrifice, and a sweeter perfume,—the obedience and death of a divine person to atone for our sins, and the incense of his continual intercession, to secure our acceptance with the Father of mercies, and admission into the mansions of eternal rest.

The conversion of the Gentile nations from the worship of idols and the bondage of corruption, to the service and enjoyment of the true God, is foretold in these beautiful and striking terms: 'The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon: they shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God.'⁷ In the animated description which the same prophet gives of the prosperity to which the kingdom of Christ was destined to rise in the New Testament dispensation, the following allusion to the glory of Lebanon again occurs: 'And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow into it.'⁸ By these words, the prophet meant to inform his nation, what the event has fully verified, that the church of the Gentiles was to be of great extent, like the range of Lebanon, intersecting the country in various directions; was to be firmly established in the earth, like a fortress built upon the summits of a steep and lofty mountain; was to overcome all opposition, set at defiance the hostile movements of all her enemies, and regard with indifference or contempt, the envious exertions of every competitor; for she shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow into her. The rapid growth of the New Testament church, her great extent, and the countless number of her converts, are fully described in the figurative language of the psalmist: 'There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon; and they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth.' The forests of the east, always near the point of ignition, under the intense beams of a vertical sun, from the carelessness or malice of those who take shelter in their recesses, are frequently set on fire; and the devouring element sometimes continues its ravages, till extensive plantations are consumed. To such a terrible conflagration, the prophet justly compares the destructive operations of the Roman armies under the command of Vespasian and Titus, against the nation of the Jews, when the nobles and rulers were slaughtered, the city and temple reduced to ashes, the people either put to the sword or sold into slavery, and the whole country laid waste. ¹ 'Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars. Howl, fir-tree, for the cedar is fallen; because the mighty is spoiled: howl, O ye oaks of Bashan; for the forest of the vintage is come down.'

The north-east part of this mountain, adjoining to the Holy Land, is in Scripture distinguished by the name of Hermon. It lies on the east of Jordan; and is known in Scripture by different names: the Sidonians call it Sirion, and the Amorites Shenir. This Mount Hermon is thought, not without some probability, to be the same with Mount Hor, mentioned by Moses in his description of the promised land.²

Besides this Mount Hermon in the northern border of the country beyond Jordan, we read of another mountain of the same name, lying within the land of Canaan, on the west of the river Jordan, not far from Mount Tabor. To this mountain the holy psalmist is thought to refer in these words: 'The north and the south, thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name.' And in the following passage, 'As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descends about the mountains of Zion.'

Another branch of Lebanon, which extended for a considerable way along the eastern coast of the country beyond Jordan, is mount Gilead, where Laban overtook Jacob in his return to his father's house; and being warned of God in a dream, not to injure the patriarch, made a covenant with him, and in witness of the solemn transaction, in conjunction with his son-in-law, made a heap of stones, and entertained their followers upon it, in token of sincere and lasting friendship. From this incident, the place was called Galeed, the heap, or circle of witness, and Mizpah, a beacon or watch-tower; for, said Laban to his son-in-law, ³ 'The Lord watch between me and thee, when we are absent one from another, if thou shalt afflict my daughters, or if thou shalt take other wives beside my daughters: no man is with us; see, God is witness between me and thee.' That this was done in a mountain, we are expressly told; and from the name given to the heap of stones constructed on that occasion, the whole mount, together with the circumjacent country, received in succeeding times, the name of Gilead. It lies on the east of the sea of Galilee, forming part of the ridge of mountains which run from Mount Lebanon toward the south, on the east of Canaan; and included the mountainous region, called in the New Testament, Trachonitis.

The mountains of Abarim lie beyond Jordan, in the southern division of the country. One part of these mountains, or hills, was distinguished by the names of Mount Nebo and Pisgah. God said unto Moses, ⁴ 'Get thee up into this mountain Abarim, unto Mount Nebo, which is in the land of Moab, over against Jericho.' And that this was the same as Pisgah, from whose summit Moses obtained a sight of the promised land, and where he terminated a career of greater glory than ever fell to the lot of any mortal, may be inferred from the following words: ⁵ 'And Moses went up from the plains of Moab, unto the mountain of Nebo, to the top of Pisgah that is over against Jericho.' From this account it seems probable that Pisgah, was the highest pinnacle of Nebo, a mountain in the great range of Abarim; for the term Pisgah may be derived from a root which signifies to elevate, or raise up; and therefore may justly denote the top of the loftiest peak of that mountain.

On the south of Canaan lay Mount Seir, whither Esau retired from the presence of his brother Jacob. This mountainous country was originally inhabited by the Horites, or Horims, the descendants of Hor, or Hori, from whom the mountain was afterwards called Mount Hor. It was on a mountain of this name, by the coasts of Edom, that Aaron died. It is therefore probable, that the whole tract was formerly called Mount Hor; since we find that the inhabitants were formerly called Horites.

Gilboa was, according to Jerome and Eusebius, a ridge of mountains, six miles from Bethshan, among which stood a town of the same name. These mountains were remarkable for the death of Saul and Jonathan, and the total defeat of their forces, in a general battle with the Philistines; an event which the holy psalmist laments in the most tender elegiac strains. ⁶ 'The beauty of Israel is slain upon thy high places: how are the mighty fallen! Ye mountains of Gilboa, let there be no dew, neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offering, for there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, the shield of Saul, as though he had not been anointed with oil.'

The only remarkable mountain on the western border of Canaan, is Carmel, which lies on the sea coast, at the south end of the tribe of Asher, and is frequently mentioned in the sacred writings. On this mountain, which is very rocky, and about 2000 feet in height, the prophet Elijah fixed his residence. The fields around it have been celebrated in all ages, for the extent of their pastures, and the richness of their verdure. So great was the fertility of this region, that, in the language of the sacred writers, the name Carmel is often equivalent to a fruitful field.

Tabor is a lofty mountain of a conical form, which rises in the plain of Esdraclon, at two hours' distance eastward from Nazareth. On the lofty summit of this beautiful mountain, by the constant and universal suffrage of antiquity, our Saviour was transfigured before his disciples: when the fashion of his countenance was altered, his face shone like the sun, and his raiment became white and glistening.

The rough mountainous tract, lying between the hills of Gilead and the river Jordan, was called Bashan. By the Greeks it was named Trachonitis. It furnishes the sacred writers with many beautiful allusions, and apt illustrations. So beautiful and stately were the oaks of Bashan, that the prophet Isaiah classes them with the cedars of Lebanon. 'The day of the Lord of hosts shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up, and he shall be brought low; and upon all the cedars of Lebanon, that are high and lifted up, and upon all the oaks of Bashan.'

Bashan was celebrated for the extent and luxuriance of its pastures; so much so, that, when the prophet Micah foretells the restoration of his people, and their rapid prosperity under the fostering care of Jehovah, he exclaims, 'Let them feed in Bashan and in Gilead, as in days of old.' The cattle that grazed on these verdant mountains, were remarkable for their size, their strength, and fatness. Moses, in his dying song, makes butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs and rams of the breed of Bashan, a distinguished part of the portion which God bestowed on his peculiar people. The oppressors of Israel are frequently compared to the strong and fierce cattle reared in the same region: 'Strong bulls of Bashan,' cried the psalmist, in the name of the Saviour, 'have beset me round.'

Salmon is a mountain which stood in the neighbourhood of Shechem. Its declivities were clothed with lofty woods, and its summits were capped with snow. To both these circumstances there are allusions in Scripture.³

With respect to the hills in or near Jerusalem, the most celebrated is Mount Zion, on whose summit stood the city of David, and where the ark of the covenant rested under the tent which that pious monarch pitched for it. The holy hill of Zion stood, according to some writers, in the north part of Jerusalem; but the more probable and general opinion is, that it is the same hill which is taken for Zion in modern times, situate on the south of the present city, for the most part without the walls. But when Jerusalem was in the height of her power and splendour, in the reign of Solomon and David, Mount Zion was enclosed within the walls, and formed the southern district of that celebrated metropolis.

The only other eminence deserving of notice is the mount of Olives; a name certainly derived from the number of olive trees with which it was covered. It is a part of a long ridge of hills extending from north to south, with three summits. The mount of Olives is celebrated in the history of our Lord. To this mountain it was his custom to retire in the evening, after he had spent a laborious day in teaching the multitudes that attended his ministry in Jerusalem: it was from one of its summits that he beheld the city, and wept over it, and predicted its final destruction; in the garden which lay at the bottom, he commenced the scene of his last sufferings, for the sins of his people; and from the highest peak, as is generally supposed, after he had finished the work of our redemption on earth, he ascended into his Father's presence with unspeakable joy and glory.⁴

CHAP. VI.—On the Lakes and Rivers of Palestine.

BY THE EDITOR.

THE only considerable lakes in the land of promise, are those of Tiberias, and the salt sea. The lake of Tiberias was also known to the sacred writers by the name of the sea of Galilee, and the lake of Gennesareth. It was called the sea of Tiberias from a town of that name on its western border; the sea of Galilee, from the province of Galilee, in general; and the lake of Gennesareth, from that particular tract of Galilee which skirted its western shore. The breadth of this lake or sea is stated by Josephus at 40, and the length at 140 furlongs. Mr Buckingham says it is twelve to fifteen miles in its greatest length, and a variable breadth from six to nine miles. Its water is limpid, sweet, and wholesome; and lying upon gravel, is softer than the water either of a river or fountain; and, at the same time, so cold, that, says the Jewish historian, it cannot be warmed by exposure to the sun, in the hottest season of the year. It abounds in a great variety of fish, which, for taste and shape, are peculiar to itself. The lake of Tiberias is properly a dilatation of the river Jordan, which through the middle of it pursues his course to the Dead Sea. The country on both sides is uncommonly fruitful and pleasant. So fertile is the soil, that every plant thrives in it; and so great is the felicity of the climate, that nuts, palms, figs, and olive-trees, flourish here in great profusion, although they naturally require a quite different temperature; which, observes the historian, looks as if Providence took delight in this place, to reconcile contradictions; and as if the very seasons themselves were in a competition which should be most obliging. The durable character of the fruits produced in this delightful region, is not less remarkable than their great variety and excellence. Figs and grapes continue in season there ten months in the year; and other fruits the whole year round. Gennesareth is not more celebrated for its delicious air and temperature, than for a spring of living waters, clear as crystal, to which the nations give the name of Capernaum. The length of the country along the lake is about four miles, and the breadth four miles and a half. This district was, in the time of Josephus, inhabited by a skilful and industrious people, who wisely availing themselves of the singular advantages which the soil and climate of their highly favoured country afforded them, carried the improvement of their lands to the highest degree of perfection. From the extraordinary fruitfulness of this tract, some conjecture that the word Gennesareth is compounded of two words, Gan and Sai; of which the first denotes in Hebrew a garden, the last a prince, and consequently the compound, the garden of a prince, or a princely garden. But, although the name in this view sufficiently corresponds with the nature of the country, it is more probable that the word Gennesareth, in the New Testament, owes its existence to the term Chinnereth, or Cimmereth, in the Old; for, in the days of Joshua, Cimmereth was a fortified city in the tribe of Naphtali; and it is evident from a passage in the first book of Kings, that it gave its name to the surrounding country.¹ The Jewish legislator in several parts of his writings, and Joshua in the history of his proceedings, place the city of Chinnereth on the shore of the lake Tiberias, calling it by the same name, the sea of Chinnereth.² Hence, it is more than probable, that Gemesareth in the New Testament, is only a corruption of Chinnereth, the name by which the city and the lake on which it stood were known to the ancient Israelites. The city had indeed perished in the wars between the kings of Syria and Israel, long before the coming of Christ, which is the true reason that no mention is made of it in the New Testament, while the district where it stood retained its name for many ages after its fall. The date of its destruction may, with great probability, be fixed in the reign of Baasha king of Israel, about 958 years before Christ, when Benhadad king of Syria invaded his dominions, and 'smote Ijon and Dan, and Abel-beth-maachah, and all Chinnereth, with all the land of Naphtali.' Upon the ruins of ancient Chinnereth afterwards arose the city of Capernaum, deriving its name from the excellent fountain already mentioned, near which it was built; but the lake and the adjacent lands were permitted to retain their ancient name, till, in the lapse of ages, or by a change of dialect, it was moulded into Gemesareth. It was a common saying among the Jews, in reference to the lake of Gemesareth, that "God loved that sea more than all the other seas." And, in one sense, the observation is quite correct; for it was honoured, above all others, with the presence of our blessed Lord and Saviour, both before and after his resurrection. He made choice of Capernaum, which stood upon the margin of the lake, as his ordinary place of residence, on account of which it is called 'his own city.'³ On its shores he found several of his apostles pursuing the humble employment of fishermen, and called them to be witnesses of his mighty works, and the heralds of his kingdom. It was on this sea he came to them, walking upon the waters; where he rebuked the winds and the waves, and the furious storm was in a moment changed into a profound calm; and where he filled their nets with a miraculous draught of fishes.⁴ On the shore of this lake he appeared to his disciples after his resurrection, and after rebuking Peter for his unfaithfulness, and exacting a threefold confession, corresponding to his threefold denial, restored him to his office as an apostle, and to his station as a pillar in the church.

The only other lake connected with the illustration of Scripture, is that called by moderns the Dead Sea, from a tradition commonly but erroneously received, that no living creature could exist in its saline waters. It was anciently called the Sea of the Plain,⁵ from its situation in the great hollow or plain of Jordan; the Salt Sea,⁶ from the extreme saltiness of its waters; and the East Sea,⁶ from its situation relative to Judea. It is likewise called by Josephus, and by the Greek and Latin writers, Lacus Asphaltites, from the bitumen found in it; and is at present known in Syria by the names of Almutanah and Bahar Loth. This remarkable expanse of water covers the fruitful vale where once flourished the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, with the other cities of the plain; a vale so rich and beautiful, that the sacred historian compares it to the garden of paradise.⁷ It was changed into its present condition by an immediate interposition of God. 'The Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven. And he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground.' The destruction was complete and irreparable; the country was in a manner extinguished, by converting it into a deep lake: so fierce was the indignation, so terrible the overthrow.

The learned Michaelis ascribes the destruction of those cities to material causes. It is possible that the sovereign Ruler of the universe employed the operation of such causes on that occasion. Sodom was built upon a mine of bitumen, as we know from the testimony of Moses and Josephus, who speak of wells abounding with bitumen in the valley of Siddim. Lightning, pointed by the hand of Omnipotence, kindled the combustible mass, and the cities smk in the subterraneous conflagration. Nor is the ingenious suggestion of M. Malte Brun to be omitted, that Sodom and Gomorrah themselves might have been built of bituminous stones, and set in flames by the fire of heaven.

The lake Asphaltites is enclosed on the east and west with exceeding high mountains; on the north it is bounded with the plains of Jericho, on which side it receives the waters of the Jordan; on the south it is open, and extends beyond the reach of the eye.^a It is said to be seventy miles long, and twenty miles broad; and is fringed in some places with a kind of coppice of bushes and reeds. In the midst of this border, not a furlong from the sea, rises a fountain of brackish water, which a This opening leads into the valley of El Ghor, which with a southern continuation called El Araba, both inspected by Burekhardt, descends uninterruptedly to the Euxine Gulf of the Red Sea; which it joins at Akaba, the site of the ancient Ezion-geber. This Mr Burekhardt supposes to be the prolongation of the ancient channel of the Jordan, which discharged itself into the sea before its absorption in the expanded lake of Sodem. This is extremely probable; and there cannot be a more interesting country in the world than this, to be made the subject of an accurate geological survey. We may infer, however, this much from what we know, that before the face of the country was changed by the judgment that fell upon it, the ground now covered by the water of the Dead Sea, was an extensive valley, and through which the Jordan flowed in its course to the sea. That it flowed through the vale, may be inferred from the great fertility of the latter; and that it passed beyond it, is equally to be inferred from the want of space over which the water could expand to be exhausted by evaporation. But the discovery of the opening on the southern border of the lake, and the inclined valley leading from thence to the sea, have rendered these inferences almost conclusive.—Mansford.

a In the time of our Saviour, it is plain that ships sailed on the surface of this lake; and during the wars between the Jews and Romans, fleets of some force were stationed here, and bloody battles fought between them. But the case is greatly altered now, as not a boat is found to disturb its waters. Mr Buckingham says, "This fine piece of water abounds with a great variety of excellent fish; but from the poverty, and one must add, the ignorance, and the indolence of the people who live on its borders, there is not a boat or a raft, either large or small, throughout its whole extent. Some three years since, a boat did exist here, but this being broken up from decay, has never been replaced, so that the few fish taken, are caught by lines from the shore, nets never being used.

was pointed out to Maundrell by his Arab conductor; a sure proof that the soil is not equally impregnated with saline particles. The ground, to the distance of half an hour from the sea, is uneven, and broken into hillocks, which Mr Maundrell compares to ruinous lime kilns; but whether these might be the pits at which the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah were overthrown by the four kings who invaded their country, he could not determine.

The water of the lake is intensely salt, extremely bitter, and nauseous, and very heavy; "its depth seems to be altogether unknown; nor does it appear that a boat has ever navigated its surface. No verdure is to be seen on its banks; but it is not true that its exhalations are as pestiferous as to kill birds that attempt to fly over it. Mr Maundrell saw several birds flying about, and skimming the surface of the waters, without any visible harm. The same fact is attested by Volney, who states it as no uncommon thing to see swallows dipping for the water necessary to build their nests. The soil around it, impregnated also with salt, produces no plants; and the air itself, which becomes loaded with saline particles from evaporation, and which receives also the sulphureous and bituminous vapours, cannot be favourable to vegetation: hence the deadly aspect which reigns around the lake. The ground about it, however, is not marshy, and its waters are limpid and incorruptible, as must be the case with a dissolution of salt.¹ Mr Maundrell questions the truth of the common tradition, which is admitted by Volney in all its extent; that the waters of the Dead Sea are destructive to animal existence, having observed on the shore, two or three shells of fish, resembling oyster shells. That respectable traveller, willing to make an experiment of its strength, went into it, and found it bore up his body in swimming, with an uncommon force; but the relation of some authors, that men wading into it, are buoyed up to the top as soon as the water reaches to the middle, he found upon experiment untrue.

A recent traveller, on visiting the lake, found a crust of salt covering the surface of the ground, and resembling a snowy plain, from which a few stunted shrubs reared their heads. No murmur, no cooling breeze

a The water of this sea is far more salt than that of the ocean; containing one fourth part of its weight of saline contents in a state of perfect desiccation, and forty-one parts in a hundred in a state of simple crystallization; that is to say, a hundred pounds by weight of water, will yield forty-one pounds of salt; while the proportion of saline contents in the water of the Atlantic is not more than 1-27th part in a state of dryness, and about six pounds of salt in a hundred of the water. The specific gravity of the water is 1.211; that of common water being 1.000. A phial of it having been brought to England by Mr Gordon of Clunie, at the request of Sir Joseph Banks, was analyzed by Dr Marcet, who states that this water is perfectly transparent, and does not deposit any crystals on standing in close vessels. Its taste is peculiarly bitter and pungent; the contents of 100 grains of the water were as follows.

Muriate of Lime,	3.920
Muriate of Magnesia,	10.246
Muriate of Soda,	10.360
Sulphate of Lime,	0.054

By this it appears that the water of this sea is in fact, a mineral water; while the excessive quantity of solid contents, and its consequent greater specific gravity, enable it to support on its surface substances that would sink in any other water; a circumstance which has given rise to many marvellous tales.

announced the approach to its margin. The strand, bestrewed with stones was hot, the waters of the lake were motionless, and absolutely dead along the shore; he found it impossible to keep the water in his mouth; it far exceeded that of the sea in saltness, and produced upon the lips the effect of a strong solution of alum. Before his boots were completely dry, they were covered with salt; his clothes, his hat, his hands, in less than three hours, were impregnated with this mineral. About midnight he heard a noise from the lake, and was informed by the Arabs, that it proceeded from legions of small fish, which come and leap about on the shore.

The extreme saltness of this lake, has been ascribed by Volney to mines of fossil salt in the side of the mountains, which extend along the western shore, and from time immemorial have supplied the Arabs in the neighbourhood, and even the city of Jerusalem. He does not attempt to invalidate the credit of the Mosaic narrative; but only insinuates, that these saline depositions were either coeval with the mountains in which they were found, or entered into their original conformation. The extraordinary fruitfulness of the vale of Siddim, before the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, is asserted by Moses in terms so clear and precise, that the veracity of the sacred writer must be overthrown, before a reasonable doubt can be entertained of the fact. No disproportionate quantity of saline matter, could have been present either in the soil or the surrounding mountains. That it abounded with bitumen, some have inferred from the assertion of Moses, that the vale of Siddim was full of slime pits: where the Hebrew word chemar, which we render slime, others, and particularly the seventy interpreters, render bitumen. But gophnith and chemar, is the word Moses employs to denote brimstone, in his account of the judgment that overwhelmed the cities of the plain; and by consequence, brimstone is not meant, when chemar is used, but bitumen, a very different substance. Hence the brimstone which now impregnates the soil of the salt sea, and banishes every kind of vegetation from its shores, must be regarded, not as an original, but an accidental ingredient, remaining from the destruction of the vale by fire and brimstone from heaven. The same remark applies to the mines of fossil salt, on the surrounding mountains; the saline matter was deposited in the cavities which it now occupies at the same time, else the vale of Siddim, instead of verdant pastures, and abundant harvests, had exhibited the same frightful sterility from the begiming, for which it is remarkable in modern times. Bitumen, if the Hebrew word chemar denotes that substance, abounds in the richest soils; for in the vale of Shinar, the soil of which, by the agreement of all writers, is fertile in the highest degree, the builders of the tower of Babel used it for the mortar. The ark of bulrushes in which Moses was embarked on the Nile, was in like manner daubed with bitumen, chemar, and pitch; but the mother of Moses, considering the poverty of her house, cannot be supposed to have procured it from a distance, nor at any great expense: she must therefore have found it in the soil of Egypt, near the Nile, on whose borders she lived. It is, therefore, reasonable to suppose, that bitumen abounded in Goshen, a region famed for the richness of its pastures. Hence it may be fairly concluded, that the vale of Siddim, before its destruction, in respect of natural fertility, resembled the plain of Shinar, and the land of Egypt along the Nile. But it is well known, that wherever brimstone and saline matter abound, there sterility and desolation reign. Is it not then reasonable to infer, that the sulphureous and saline matters, discovered in the waters and on the shores of the lake Asphaltites, are the relics of the divine vengeance executed on the cities of the plain, and not original ingredients in the soil.

If we listen to the testimony of the sacred writers, what was reasonable hypothesis rises into absolute certainty. Moses expressly ascribes the brimstone, the salt, and the burning, in the overthrow of Sodom, to the immediate vengeance of heaven. 'When they see the plagues of that land,—that the whole land is brimstone, and salt, and burning; that it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth thereon, (like the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim, which the Lord overthrew in his anger and in his wrath); even all nations shall say, Wherefore has the Lord done thus unto this land? What meaneth the heat of this great anger?'¹ In this passage, the brimstone, salt, and burning, are true and proper effects of the divine wrath; and since this fearful destruction is compared to the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, the brimstone and salt into which the vale of Siddim was turned, must also be the true and proper effects of divine anger. This, indeed, Moses asserts in the plainest terms: 'Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah, brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven; and he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground.'² But since the brimstone and the fire were rained from heaven, so must the salt, with which they are connected in the former quotation; and this is the opinion received by the Jewish doctors. The frightful sterility which followed the brimstone, salt, and burning, in the first quotation, is in the same manner represented as an effect of the divine judgment upon the vale of Siddim; 'it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth thereon.'

The barrenness and desolation that result from the action of brimstone and salt, are introduced by the prophet in these words: 'Thus saith the Lord, cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord. For he shall be like the heath in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh, but shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness, in a salt land and not inhabited.'³ In this passage, the salt is assigned as the cause that the parched places in the wilderness remain in a state of perpetual sterility. In the judgments which the prophet Zephaniah was directed to predict against the kingdom of Moab, he alludes expressly to the punishment of Sodom and Gomorrah, and intimates that one part of that punishment consisted in the vale being turned into salt: 'As I live, saith the Lord, surely Moab shall be as Sodom, and the children of Ammon as Gomorrah, even the breeding of nettles and salt pits, and a perpetual desolation.'⁴

Some writers suppose the Dead Sea to be the crater of a volcano, but this opinion is entirely without foundation: for all extinguished volcanoes exhibit the same characters, that is to say, mountains excavated in the form of a tunnel, lava and ashes, which exhibit incontestible proofs of the agency of fire. The Dead Sea, on the contrary, is a lake of great length, curved like a bow, placed between two ranges of mountains, which have no natural coherence in form, no homogeneity of soil. They do not meet at the two extremities of the lake; but continue, and run northward as far as the lake of Tiberias; the other is lost in the sands of Yemen.

The rugged mountains and spacious caverns on the south-west shore of the lake Asphaltites, the chosen refuge of the oppressed in every age, acquired additional celebrity from the secure retreat which they afforded to David and his men, from the violence of Saul. 'It was told Saul, saying, behold, David is in the wilderness of En-gedi. Then Saul took three thousand chosen men out of all Israel, and went to seek David and his men upon the mountains of the wild goats.'

The rivers that water the land of promise, are not so remarkable as the mountains and the lakes which diversify its surface. The greater part of them, as the Kidron, the Jabbok, and the Arnon, are only brooks or mountain torrents, some of which are dry for the greater part of the year, or only run with a flowing stream during the melting of the snows on the peaks of Lebanon, or the fall of the former and the latter rain.

But the largest and the most celebrated stream in Palestine is the Jordan. It pursues its course through the whole extent of the Holy Land from north to south; and empties itself into the lake Asphaltites. It may be said to have two banks, of which the inner marks the ordinary height of the stream; and the outer its elevation during the rainy season, or the melting of the snows on the summits of Lebanon.⁵

CHAP. VII.—The General Fertility of Palestine.

BY THE EDITOR.

THE early promises which were made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with respect to the multiplication of their seed, seem to imply a proportionable fertility in the land of Canaan, which it was foretold at the same time should be given to them. The prophetic assurances, also, which described the land, spoke of it as abounding with cattle and productions favourable to the support of human life.

Jacob, in expressing his blessing to Judah, promises not, as to Issachar or Asher, that 'the land shall be pleasant, or his bread fat,' but that, 'binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine, he shall wash his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes; that his eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk;' and when God appeared to Moses, he declared that 'he would bring the Israelites into a good land and a large, into a land flowing with milk and honey;'⁶ figures expressive of abundance, and the luxuries only of a simple state.

The whole history of the Jews tends to demonstrate the accomplishment of the promises, with respect to the wonderful increase of this peculiar people. Notwithstanding the frequent wars in which the nation was engaged, and the wasting dispersions by which they were scattered, the country continued to maintain prodigious numbers in every age, excepting during the captivity.

The support of those numbers required a very large produce, and Judea appears to have displayed a considerable fertility. The sacred writers describe, in interesting pictures, the multitude of its cattle, covering the hills, the luxuriance of its trees, and the rich produce of its vineyards. The grapes brought to Moses exhibited an early proof of the fidelity of the prophetic descriptions; and the vast multitudes of people which are enumerated on various occasions confirmed the assurance. The people, not addicted to commerce, cultivated the soil with regular industry, and with that attachment which resulted from the nature of a tenure, which could not be alienated permanently, as the land reverted to its original proprietor every fifty years.

That the divine blessing increased its exuberance may reasonably be supposed, as indeed it was especially promised; and a miraculous plenty must have been imparted every sixth year, or the land could not have remained uncultivated on the sabbatical year, as we learn even from heathen writers, that it did; who mention also many particulars which tend to confirm the report which has been given.

Notwithstanding these testimonies, however, Mons. de Voltaire, in order to indulge a sarcastic vein against the historical accounts of the Old Testament, gives vent to some remarks upon the subject which are not founded on accurate information, and which do not authorize any supposition of exaggeration in the sacred accounts.

This writer in his history of the crusades, represents Judea to have been, as he describes it to be at present, one of the worst of all the inhabited countries of Asia, as almost entirely covered with parched rocks, with one layer of soil, and such as, if cultivated, might be compared to Switzerland.

It is to be observed, however, that this unfair writer has totally overlooked many circumstances which explain and confirm the accounts of the sacred historian, and it would tend but little to justify his remarks, even if he could prove that the soil of Judea is now barren; since it would not be unwarrantable to contend, that the divine favour might have conferred extraordinary fertility upon it in former times, and the divine curse have afterwards condemned it to sterility; but in truth, there is no proof that it is now barren, while there is sufficient evidence, that it was formerly very productive, and capable of sustaining its vast population.^a

^a If the untilled and waste places at the present day afford no very prepossessing appearance, it ought to be remembered, that they were predicted by Moses, Deut. xxix. 22, et seq. and that the country has been laid waste successively by Assyrians, Chaldeans, Syrians, Persians, Saracens, the European crusaders, the Turks, and Moguls, and that it now groans under the dominion of the Turks, who neither protect the agriculturist from the incursions of the Arabs, nor afford him any encouragement, but the contrary. And yet it is the unanimous testimony of travellers, in regard to this country, that, where it is cultivated, it is extremely fertile. It produces all sorts of fruit trees; and vines

The great number of inhabitants which this country is represented to have supported, was not more than the exertion of the nation and their wars might seem to have required; and indeed, the accounts on this subject are confirmed by heathen testimonies, and by Josephus.^b

Tacitus describes the climate as dry, and the soil as fruitful, exuberant in its produce, like that of Italy, and bearing the palm and the balsam,¹ the former of great size and beauty: this account is attested by Pliny, and Galen,² not to mention Josephus, who represents the soil to have been rich and fruitful,³ as does also Aristæus.⁴

Strabo describes part of the country as rocky, but commends that about Jordan and Jericho.⁵ Hecateus, mentioned by Josephus, speaks of the soil as being very fertile. Whatever sterility and want of population may be complained of at present, should be attributed in a great measure, to the influence of political changes, to the vexatious tyranny and bad policy of the government, and to the consequent neglect of the inhabitants, and their want of industry and of numbers to work the soil.

It is to be observed also, that in the time in which great population prevailed in Judea, it was sustained under favourable circumstances, resulting from simplicity of manners, and the frugal habits of the people. The land was not covered by those masses of buildings, and those extensive gardens, woods, and parks, which occupy such large spaces of productive ground in other countries, in modern times. All was open to cultivation or to pasture.

As the people also were interdicted from commerce, and few devoted themselves to the arts of refinement or to science, no class was exempted from the employments of industry, and every part of the land was cultivated.

If the country was mountainous, it is to be considered that the extension of the surface thence resulting, (containing, according to Hecateus, 3,000,000 of acres,) afforded great range for cattle in climates of the latitude of Judea; it is the mountain which affords the short and rich pasture, in which the herds particularly delight, and ^b Josephus (Jewish War, b. iii. c. 3. sec. 3.) praises Perea, which at the present time is a desert, for its vines and its palm trees; and particularly celebrates the region near the lake of Gennesareth, also the plains of Jericho, which are now uninhabited, and desolate, (b. iii. c. 10. sec. 8. b. iv. c. 8. sec. 3.) Indeed we are informed by Josephus, that in Galilee there were 204 cities and towns, that the largest of the cities had 150,000, and the smallest towns 15,000 inhabitants. Hence we can account for it, that Josephus himself, in this small province, short of forty miles long and thirty broad, collected an army of nearly 100,000 men. (Jewish War, b. ii. c. 20. sec. 6.) As so many people were collected in such a small extent of country, it is clear that the arts and commerce must have been patronized, and consequently the sciences; which leaves us to conclude, that the miracles of Jesus were performed in a country where they could be examined and fairly discussed. The reproach, which is cast upon Galilee, in John vii. 22., has no reference to the character of its soil or climate, but only to the fact, that the prophet or Messiah was not to be expected from that part of Palestine.

by which their milk and flesh are improved, and hence it was that Hebron was granted to Caleb as a favour.

It is not to be conceived that writers who addressed their countrymen, and who professed to reveal the promises of God, and to relate their accomplishment, could describe that as fertile, which in fact was barren, or speak of a population which did not exist, and there are still sufficient proofs of its fruitfulness to justify this persuasion.

Nothing can be more unphilosophical than to rest on the vague and hasty reports of some travellers who have visited this country in later times, and to set them up, even when contradicted by others more intelligent¹ in the present day, in opposition to the description of those who were contemporaries and witnesses of the particulars which they relate, and who, if they had stated falsehoods, could not have excited the respect which they received.

The barrenness, or scarcity rather, of which some authors may either ignorantly or maliciously complain, does not proceed, in the opinion of Dr Shaw, from the incapacity or natural unfruitfulness of the country, but from the want of inhabitants, and from the great aversion to labour and industry in those few by whom it is possessed. The perpetual discords and depredations among the petty princes who share this fine country, greatly obstruct the operations of the husbandman, who must have small encouragement to sow, when it is quite uncertain who shall gather in the harvest. It is in other respects a fertile country, and still capable of affording to its neighbours, the like ample supplies of corn and oil, which it is known to have done in the time of Solomon, who gave yearly to Hiram, twenty thousand measures of wheat for food to his household, and twenty measures of pure oil.

The parts about Jerusalem particularly, being rocky and mountainous, have therefore been supposed to be barren and unfruitful: yet, granting this conclusion, which is, however, far from being just, a country is not to be characterized from one single district of it, but from the whole. And besides, the blessing which was given to Judah, was not of the same kind with the blessing of Asher, or of Issachar, that 'his bread should be fat or his land pleasant,' but that 'his eyes should be red with wine, and his teeth should be white with milk.'² In the estimation of the Jewish lawgiver, milk and honey, the chief dainties and subsistence of the earlier ages, as they still continue to be of the Bedouin Arabs, are the glory of all lands; these productions are either actually enjoyed in the lot of Judah, or at least, might be obtained by proper care and application. The abundance of wine alone, is wanting at present; yet, the acknowledged goodness of that little, which is still made at Jerusalem and Hebron, clearly proves, that these barren rocks, as they are called, would yield a much greater quantity, if the abstemious Turk and Arab would permit the vine to be further propagated and improved.

Wild honey, which formed a part of the food of John the Baptist in the wilderness, may indicate to us the great plenty of it in those deserts; and, that consequently taking the hint from nature, and enticing the bees into hives and larger colonies, it might be produced in much greater quantity. Josephus, accordingly calls Jericho the honey-bearing country. The great abundance of wild honey is often mentioned in Scripture, a memorable instance of which occurs in the first book of Samuel: 'And all they of the land came to a wood, and there was honey upon the ground: and when the people were come to the wood, behold the honey dropped.'³ This circumstance perfectly accords with the view which Moses gave of the promised land, in the song with which he closed his long and eventful career: 'He made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock.'⁴ That good land preserved its character in the time of David, who thus celebrates the distinguishing bounty to his chosen people: 'He would have fed them also with the finest of the wheat, and with honey out of the rock, would I have satisfied thee.'⁵ In these holy strains, the sacred poet availed himself of the most valuable products of Canaan, to lead the faith and hope of his nation to bounties of a higher order, of greater price, and more urgent necessity, than any which the soil even of that favoured region, stimulated and sustained, as it certainly was, by the special blessing of heaven, produced,—the bounties of sovereign and redeeming mercy, purchased with the blood, and imparted by the Spirit of the Son of God.

As the mountains of Palestine abound in some places with thyme, rosemary, sage, and other aromatic plants, in which the bee chiefly delights; so, in other places, they are covered with shrubs and a delicate short grass, which is more grateful to the cattle, than that which the fallow grounds or the meadows produce. The grazing and feeding of cattle is not peculiar to Judea, it is still practised all over Mount Libanus, the Castravan mountains, and Barbary, where the higher grounds are appropriated to this purpose, while the plains and valleys, are reserved for tillage.

But even laying aside the profits which might arise from grazing, by the sale of butter, milk, wool, and the great number of cattle, which were to be daily disposed of, particularly at Jerusalem, for common food and for the service of the temple; these mountainous tracts would be highly valuable on another account, especially if they were planted with olive-trees, one acre of which is of more value than twice the extent of arable ground. It may be presumed, in like manner, that the vine was not neglected in a soil and exposure so well adapted to its cultivation.

Few traces are now to be found, except at Jerusalem and Hebron, of those extensive vineyards, which in better times adorned the hills of Canaan, and so amply rewarded the labours of the cultivator: but this is owing not to the ungratefulness of the soil, but to the sloth and bigotry of the present possessors. The vine is not of so durable a nature as the olive, and requires, besides, an unceasing culture and attention; while the superstitious Turk scruples to encourage the propagation of a plant, whose fruit may be applied to uses forbidden by the rules of his religion. But the general benefit arising from the olive-tree, and its longevity and hardiness, have been the means of continuing down to the present times, clumps of several thousands, to mark out to us the possibility, as they are undoubtedly the remains, of more extensive plantations. Now, if to these productions be joined several plots of arable ground, which lie scattered all over the valleys and windings of the mountains in the lot of Judah and Benjamin, we shall find, that the inheritance even of these tribes which are supposed to have had the most barren part of the country, fell to them in pleasant places, and that theirs was a goodly heritage.

Besides the great quantity of grapes and raisins, says Dr Shaw, in a note, which are brought daily to the markets of Jerusalem and the neighbouring villages, Hebron alone sends every year to Egypt, three hundred camel loads of the robb which they call dabash, the same word which is simply rendered honey in the sacred volume; as in the command of the patriarch Jacob to his sons: 'Carry down the man a present of the best things of the land, a little balm and a little honey:' for honey, properly so called, could not be a rarity there, so great as dabash must be, from the want of vineyards in Egypt. Several different substances appear to have obtained the name of honey among the ancient Israelites, which may be inferred from this precept: 'Ye shall burn no leaven, nor any kind of honey in any offering.' Besides the honey of grapes, of bees, and of the palm, the honey of the reed, or sugar, might be of great antiquity.

The mountainous parts of the Holy Land are so far from being inhospitable, unfruitful, or the refuse of the land of Canaan, that in the division of this country, the mountain of Hebron was granted to Caleb as a particular favour: 'Now therefore, give me this mountain, of which the Lord spake in that day.' In the time of Asa, the 'hill country of Judah' mustered five hundred and eighty thousand men of valour; 'an argument beyond dispute, that the land was able to maintain them. Even in the present times, though cultivation and improvement are exceedingly neglected, while the plains and valleys, although fruitful as ever, lie almost entirely desolate, every little hill is crowded with inhabitants. If this part of the Holy Land was composed, as some object, only of naked rocks and precipices, why is it better peopled than all the plains of Esdraelon, Rama, Acre, or Zabulon, which are all of them extremely fertile and delightful? It cannot be urged that the inhabitants live with more safety on the hills and mountains, than on the plains, as there are neither walls nor fortifications to secure their villages and encampments; and except in the range of Lebanon, and some other mountains, few or no places of difficult access; so that both of them are equally exposed to the insults of an enemy. But the reason is obvious; they find among these mountainous rocks and precipices, sufficient conveniences for themselves, and much greater for their cattle. Here they have bread to the full, while their flocks and their herds browse upon richer herbage, and both man and beast quench their thirst from springs of excellent water, which is but too much wanted, especially in the summer season, through all the plains of Syria. This fertility of Canaan is fully confirmed by writers of great reputation, whose impartiality cannot justly be suspected. Tacitus calls it a fruitful soil, and Justin affirms, that in this country the purity of the air, and the fertility of the soil, are equally admirable.

The justice of these brief accounts, Dr Shaw, and almost every modern traveller, fully verifies. When he travelled in Syria and Phœnicia, in December and January, the whole country, he remarks, looked verdant and cheerful: and the woods particularly, which are chiefly planted with the gall-bearing oak, were every where bestrewed with a variety of anemones, ranunculuses, colchicas, and mandrakes. Several pieces of ground near Tripoli were full of liquorice; and at the mouth of a famous grotto, he saw an elegant species of the blue lily. In the beginning of March, the plains, particularly between Jaffa and Rama, were every where planted with a beautiful variety of fritillaries, tulips of innumerable hues, and a profusion of the rarest and most beautiful flowers; while the hills and the mountains were covered with yellow pollium, and some varieties of thyme, sage, and rosemary.⁴

The account which has now been given of the soil and productions of Canaan, will enable the reader to perceive with great clearness, the force and justice of the promise made by Moses to his nation, a little before he died: 'The Lord thy God bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths, that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees, and pomegranates, a land of olive oil and honey.'

If to the natural fertility of this highly favoured country be added, the manner in which it was divided among the tribes of Israel, it will furnish an easy and satisfactory answer to the question which the infidel has often put: "How could so small a country as Canaan maintain so immense a population, as we find in the writings of the Old Testament?" That rich and fertile region was divided into small inheritances, on which the respective proprietors lived and reared their families. Necessity, not less than a spirit of industry, required that no part of the surface should be suffered to lie waste. The husbandman carried his improvements up the sides of the steepest and most rugged mountains, to the very top; he converted every patch of earth into a vineyard, or olive plantation; he covered the bare rocks with soil, and thus turned them into fruitful fields; where the steep was too great to admit of an inclined plane, he cut away the face of the precipice, and built walls around the mountain to support the earth, and planted his terraces with the vine and the olive. These circles of excellent soil were seen rising gradually from the bottom to the top of the mountains, where the vine and the olive, shading the intermediate rocks with the liveliest verdure, and bending under the load of their valuable produce, amply rewarded the toils of the cultivator. The remains of these hanging gardens, these terrace plantations, after the lapse of so many centuries, the revolutions of empire, and the long decline of industry among the miserable slaves that now occupy that once highly favoured land, may still be distinctly traced on the hills and mountains of Judea. Every spot of ground was in this manner brought into a state of cultivation; every particle of soil was rendered productive; and by turning a stream of water into every field where it was practicable, and leading the little rills into which they divided it, to every plantation, every tree and every plant, they secured for the most part, a constant succession of crops. Such was the management which Virgil recommended to the cultivators of Italy. "Then on the springing corn drives the stream, and ductile rills. And when the field is scorched with raging heat, the herbs all dying, lo, from the brow of a hilly tract he decoys the torrent, which falling down the smooth-worn rocks, awakes the hoarse murmur, and with gurgling streams allays the thirsty lands."¹

"This much is certain," says Volney, "and it is the advantage of hot over cold countries, that in the former, wherever there is water, vegetation may be perpetually maintained, and made to produce an uninterrupted succession of fruits to flowers, and flowers to fruits. In cold, nay even in temperate climates, on the contrary, nature benumbed for several months, loses in the sterile slumber the third part, or even half the year. The soil which has produced grains, has not time before the decline of summer heat to mature vegetables; a second crop is not to be expected; and the husbandman sees himself condemned to a long and fatal repose. Syria is exempt from these inconveniences; if, therefore, it so happens that its productions are not such as its natural advantages would lead us to expect, it is not less owing to its physical, than its political state."

On this question we have to add the temperament of the people to the physical powers of the country. The Israelite lived upon his own farm, in all the simplicity of rural life; was content with the produce of his own fields; a little wheat in the ear, or in meal, a few grapes and olives, dates or almonds, generally constituted his repast; and the great heat of the climate imperiously required him to lead a frugal and abstemious life. It is well known, that the inhabitants of warm countries subsist on much less and much lighter food than the people of colder latitudes, and by consequence, are capable of living in more crowded habitations. If all these circumstances are duly considered, the countless numbers of people, which, according to the Old Testament writers, once inhabited the land of promise, will neither appear incredible nor exaggerated.

The extraordinary fruitfulness of Canaan, and the number of its inhabitants, during the prosperous times of the Jewish commonwealth, may be traced to another, and still more powerful cause, than any that has been mentioned,—the special blessing of heaven, which that favoured people, for many ages, exclusively enjoyed. We know from the testimony of Moses, that the tribes of Israel reposed under the immediate care of Jehovah, their covenanted God and king, enjoyed his peculiar favour, and were multiplied and sustained by a special compact, in which the rest of the nations had no share. "The Lord shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers to give it."² But the blessing of Jehovah converts the desert into a fruitful field; for thus it is promised, (and what God promises he is able also to perform,) "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose; it shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon; they shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God; for in the wilderness shall the waters break out, and streams in the desert, and the parched land shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water: in the habitations of dragons, where each lay, shall be grass, with reeds and rushes."³ In this passage the blessings of salvation as exhibited in the present dispensation of grace, are certainly intended; but the use of these figures would be quite improper if the special favour of God could produce no such important changes on the face of nature.

Indeed the divine blessing has not bestowed the same degree of fruitfulness on every part of Canaan. This fertile country is surrounded by deserts of immense extent, exhibiting a dreary waste of loose and barren sand, on which the skill and industry of man are able to make no impression. The only vegetable productions which occasionally meet the eye of the traveller in these frightful solitudes, are a coarse sickly grass, thinly sprinkled on the sand; a plot of senna, or other saline or bitter herb, or an acacia bush; even these but rarely present themselves to his notice, and afford him little satisfaction when they do, because they warn him that he is yet far distant from a place of abundance and repose. Moses, who knew those deserts well, calls them "great and terrible," "a desert land," "the waste howling wilderness." But the completest picture of the sandy desert is drawn by the pencil of Jeremiah, in which, with surprising force and brevity, he has exhibited every circumstance of terror, which the modern traveller details with so much pathos and minuteness: "Neither say they, where is the Lord that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, that led us through the wilderness, a land of deserts and of pits, a land of drought, and of the shadow of death, a land which no man passed through, and where no man dwelt."⁴

Besides these inhospitable deserts which environ the land of promise, the inspired writers mention several wildernesses within its proper limits. In sacred language, a mountainous or less fruitful tract, where the towns and villages are thinly scattered, and single habitations few and far between, is distinguished by the name of the wilderness. The forerunner of our Lord resided in the wilderness of Judah till he commenced his public ministry. We are informed in the book of Genesis, that Ishmael settled in the wilderness of Paran, and in the first book of Samuel, that David took refuge from the persecution of Saul, in the same desert, where it appears the numerous flocks of Nabal the Carmelite were pastured. Such places, therefore, were not absolute deserts, but thinly peopled, or less fertile districts. But this remark will scarcely apply to the wilderness, where our Lord was tempted of the devil. It is a most miserable, dry, and barren solitude, "consisting of high rocky mountains, so torn and disordered, as if the earth had here suffered some great convulsion, in which its very bowels had been turned outwards.”¹ A more dismal and solitary place can scarcely be found in the whole earth. About one hour’s journey from the foot of the mountain which environs this wilderness, rises the lofty Quarantania, which Maundrell was told is the mountain to which the devil carried our blessed Saviour, that he might show him all the kingdoms and glory of the world.

It has a small chapel at the top, and another about half-way up, founded on a prominent part of the rock. Near the latter are several caves and holes in the sides of the mountain, occupied formerly by hermits, and even in present times, the resort of religious devotees, who repair to these lonely cells to keep their lent, in imitation of our Lord’s fasting in the wilderness forty days.

HISTORY OF THE BIBLE.

BOOK V.

CONTAINING AN ACCOUNT OF THINGS FROM THE ISRAELITES' ENTRANCE INTO THE LAND OF CANAAN, TO THE BUILDING OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE, IN ALL 47 YEARS,—ACCORDING TO DR HALES, 581 YEARS.

PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

THE people of Israel are at length settled in Canaan, under the guidance of Joshua. While we were contemplating the character of Moses, we beheld that astonishing dispensation, the deliverance of the whole nation of the Hebrews from the bondage of Egypt, their passage through the Red Sea, and their miraculous support and guidance in the wilderness for forty years. This indeed was the Lord's doing; and it is marvellous in our eyes. But Moses was employed as the chief instrument of executing the wondrous plan,—for the entire regulation of every thing was committed to him. While the Israelites were yet on the other side of Jordan, and had not entered the promised land; while they were preparing to attack their strongest and most formidable enemies; in that very critical and dangerous situation, their leader and commander was taken from them, and we were ready to ask, what now will become of Israel?—not remembering that He who had raised up Moses for their deliverance, and had fitted him for every service to which he had been called, is all-sufficient.

The history of Joshua, the successor of Moses, who had been nominated to his charge by the Lord himself, is contained chiefly in the book which bears his name, written probably by himself. Here, though we read of battles and conquests, in which we may seem to have no concern, we shall perceive the divine perfections displayed and exercised in a very eminent degree. The power of God is exhibited, altering the course of nature for the defence of his people; his justice taking signal vengeance on the wicked inhabitants of Canaan, when they had filled up the measure of their iniquities; his veracity giving the Israelites the possession of Canaan in completion of his promises and his holy covenant; and his grace and mercy, encouraging and assisting them in all their difficulties, till he had granted them rest and deliverance from their enemies.

The Lord did all this for his people by his servant Joshua, who was an eminent type of Christ, and who with a reference to him was distinguished by the same name,—the Hebrew of Jesus being Joshua. In two passages¹ we read Jesus, where the Israelitish general is intended, and the word should more properly have been translated Joshua. The office which this name denotes, (Saviour,) Joshua did not take to himself; but he was expressly called to it, and invested with it by the highest authority. He received his commission immediately from God, and entered upon his work with the strongest assurances of the divine direction and support. Our exalted Leader, in like manner, was constituted the Head of the church by a particular designation; and therefore he declared that “he came down from heaven, not to do his own will, but the will of Him that sent him.” Though, according to his original state, he was equal with God, and possessed the same glory as the Father, yet he submitted for our sakes to become a servant; and in his mediatorial character, as if he had been an inferior, he was set apart for his great undertaking, and furnished with full powers for its execution.

It is allowed that Joshua was qualified for his office, as being possessed of all necessary abilities. And shall we not maintain that Jesus was every way fitted for his great undertaking? His power, wisdom, love, and faithfulness, have all been demonstrated with unquestionable evidence. We rejoice then that he is able to save to the uttermost, that he will finish the work in righteousness, and that he will not fail, nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth, and fully accomplished the salvation of his people.

If Joshua in a triumphant manner conducted the hosts of Israel into Canaan, assigned to the various tribes their respective portions, and saw them settled in peace and prosperity around him,—Jesus, the Captain of the Lord's hosts,² stands engaged to bring all his followers into heaven—to put them in the secure possession of the kingdom which was prepared for them from the foundation of the world. For the accomplishment of his purpose, he relinquished the throne of his glory, became obedient to the law, was made a curse, died, went down into the grave, and rose again; and he is now carrying on the same work: with a particular regard to it, he will continue to maintain universal dominion, until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory. Not one of his faithful followers shall fail of attaining the eternal inheritance; for it is reserved in heaven for them, and they are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. His grace and truth are pledged for their present security, and for their final admission into the joy of their Lord. They shall sit with him in his throne, and shall reign for ever and ever.

The circumstances which claim the particular attention of the reader during this period are,—the regular observance of divine ordinances in Canaan, as these had been instituted in the wilderness;—the preservation of Israel from this time forward, when all the males went up, three times in the year, to the place which God had chosen for the celebration of the great festivals which he had commanded them to observe:—their preservation, too, although they were so often subdued, and brought under the dominion of their enemies;—and the preservation of true religion, notwithstanding their frequent apostasies. Nor should we fail to observe the frequent appearance of Christ during this period, in the form of that nature which he took upon him in his incarnation. He appeared in this form to Moses when God spake to him face to face, as a man speaketh to his friend, and he beheld the similitude of the Lord.¹ In this form he appeared to the seventy elders;² to Joshua, when he was near the walls of Jericho;³ to Gideon;⁴ to Manoah.⁵ Christ thus appeared, time after time, in the form of that nature which he was afterwards to assume for our redemption, because he was now carrying on that mighty design, and preparing the way for its accomplishment.

It was in this period that the school of the prophets was first instituted. In Samuel there was begun a succession of prophets, that was maintained continually from that era till the spirit of prophecy ceased about the time of Malachi; and therefore Samuel is spoken of in the New Testament as the beginning of this succession of prophets.⁶ 'And all the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, as many as have spoken have foretold of these days.' The young men that belonged to these schools were called the sons of the prophets. At first they were under the tuition of Samuel; afterwards of Elijah, Elisha, and others. They were often favoured with a degree of inspiration, while they continued under tuition in the schools of the prophets; and God commonly, when he called any one to the constant exercise of the prophetic office, or to any extraordinary service, took them out of these schools, though not always. For the prophet Amos informs us that he had not been educated in the schools of the prophets, and that he was not one of the sons of the prophets. The main design of this institution was to foreshow the great Redeemer, and the glorious redemption that he was to accomplish by his obedience unto death. 'To him gave all the prophets witness,—those things which God before had showed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled.' There had before been occasional prophecies of Christ: but now as the time was drawing nearer when the Redeemer should come, it pleased God to appoint a certain order of men, in constant succession, whose main business it should be to foreshow Christ and his redeeming work, and as his forerunners to prepare the way for his coming.

In the latter part of this period the scripture history leads us to consider God's providence towards that particular person whence Christ was to proceed, namely, David. It pleased God to select that person for whom Christ was to come, from all the thousands of Israel, and to put a most honourable mark of distinction upon him, by anointing him to be king over his people. But we are required to look up to him with veneration, as a preacher of righteousness, a prophet of the Lord, and one of the inspired penmen of the holy scriptures. His poetical compositions evince the sublimity of his genius: but they are to be regarded as superior to the productions of mere human abilities; for they are the word of God: it was the Holy Ghost who spoke by the mouth of David. These divine hymns were intended, not for instruction only, but as models of prayer and praise for the church in all ages, to assist us in our private and public devotions. They describe more clearly than any other portion of the Old Testament, him who was to come,—the consolation of Israel.⁷ They teach us with great fulness, the high dignity and mysterious person of Christ, who is David's son, and David's Lord; what office he sustains for his people, as their prophet, priest, and king; their shepherd, leader, and intercessor; that we are to view him in the different stages of his humiliation, assuming our nature, making his abode on earth in circumstances of poverty, contempt, and persecution, and at last closing a suffering life by a painful and ignominious death. The very manner in which he was to be betrayed, mocked, scourged, and crucified, is pointed out with astonishing exactness. We hear the derision of his enemies, and his own heavy complaints in his sufferings. We are led with him to the grave; but we also observe him rising from the dead, before he saw corruption. We are also told that he ascended up on high, leading captivity captive, that he has received gifts for men, even for the rebellious, also, that God the Lord might dwell among them.

It is certain that David was an eminent type of Christ; and that he frequently spake as concerning himself, what was applicable only to the great Antitype. In the Old Testament the Messiah is pointed out by the name of David, not merely because it was designed that in his human nature he should descend from the same family, but because there should be a designed resemblance in him to that illustrious progenitor. 'The blessings of redemption are on this account, called 'the sure mercies of David.' For the same reason also, long after that prince was laid in the dust, it was declared that the nation should be recovered from their captivity, and serve the Lord their God, and David their king.'⁷ 'And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David.' In the New Testament Christ is called 'the root and offspring of David.'

The covenant of grace was solemnly renewed with David, that covenant which was all his salvation, and all his desire. This was the fifth establishment of the covenant of grace after the fall; the first was with Adam, the second was with Noah, the third was with the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the fourth was in the wilderness by Moses, and now the fifth is made with David. It is to this that a large portion of the eighty-ninth psalm refers.

Finally, the reader should take notice that, towards the close of the period on the narrative of which he is now entering, God chose a particular city out of all the tribes of Israel, to place his name there. There is mention made in the law of Moses, of the children of Israel's bringing their oblations to the place which God should choose,¹ but God had never proceeded to do it till now. The city of Jerusalem having been entirely taken from the Jebusites by David, the ark was brought thither, and the very spot was pointed out by divine direction on which the temple of God, should be built. This city, as the city of God, the holy place of his rest for ever became a type of the church of Christ, the habitation of God. This was the city in which the scattered followers of Christ were gathered together after his resurrection; in which the apostles and primitive Christians were favoured with that remarkable outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost; and in which was formed the first Christian church, which is the mother of all other churches throughout the world.² 'Out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion: rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. The Lord hath chosen Zion: he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell; for I have desired it.'

SECT. I.

CHAP. I.—From their Entrance to the Death of Joshua.

THE HISTORY.

From the death of Moses, Joshua, who had a long while been his prime minister, by the command of God, undertook the conduct of the children of Israel; and as it was a very momentous charge, he was not a little anxious how he should be enabled to execute it. He saw himself indeed at the head of six hundred thousand fighting men; but then the nations which he was to subdue, were a warlike and gigantic people, that had already taken the alarm, and therefore made early preparations for a defence; had fortified their cities, and confederated their forces against him. And while he was musing on these things, to give him encouragement in his undertaking, a God was pleased to assure him, that he would not fail to

^a It is the opinion of most interpreters, that whenever God is said to speak to Moses, to Joshua, or any other pious man in the Old Testament, he does not do it by himself, but by an angel only. This perhaps might be his most common way of communicating himself; but there want not several instances in Scripture, where God himself, or, as others will have it, the eternal Logos, converses with his servants. And this he may do, either by a mental locution, wherein he objects to their minds the express idea of what such a number of words would convey; or by a corporal locution, when he assumes an apparent body, and protect and assist him in it, in the same manner as he had done his predecessor Moses, and provided he took care to obey his laws, as Moses had done, make the whole land of Canaan a cheap and easy conquest to him: and therefore without perplexing his mind any further, he ordered him immediately to set about the work.

^b The city of Jericho was just opposite to the place where he was to pass the river Jordan; and as it was the first that he intended to attack, he thought it advisspeech, in the same manner that men speak. But in the place before us, whether it were an angel, or God himself, he seems to have spoken to Joshua out of the sanctuary, from whence he had spoken to him a little before Moses' death, and gave him encouragement to perform strenuously what he is now putting upon him.—Deut. xxxi. 14, 23.

^b Jericho was a city of Canaan, which afterwards fell to the lot of the tribe of Benjamin, about seven leagues distant from Jerusalem, and two from Jordan. Moses calls it likewise 'the city of palm trees,' Deut. xxxiv. 3, because there were great numbers of them in the plains of Jericho; and not only of palm trees, but as Josephus tells us, (Antiquities, b. 4. c. 5.) balsam trees likewise, which produced the precious liquor in such high esteem among the ancients. The plain of Jericho was watered with a rivulet, which was formerly salt and bitter, but was afterwards sweetened by the prophet Elisha, 2 Kings ii. 21, 22; where upon the adjacent country, which was watered by it, became not only one of the most agreeable, but most fertile spots in all that country. As to the city itself, after it was destroyed by Joshua, it was, in the days of Ahab king of Israel, rebuilt by Hiel the Bethelite, 1 Kings xvi. 34; and in the times of the last kings of Judea, yielded to none, except Jerusalem. For it was adorned with a royal palace, wherein Herod the Great died; with an hippodromus, or place where the Jewish nobility learned to ride the great horse, and other arts of chivalry, with an amphitheatre and other magnificent buildings; but during the siege of Jerusalem, the treachery of its inhabitants provoked the Romans to destroy it. After the siege was over there was another city built, but not upon the same place where the two former stood; for the ruins of them both are seen to this day. Of what account and bigness it was, we have no certain information; but some later travellers inform us, that at present it is no more than a poor, nasty village of the Arabs.—Wells's Geography of the Old and New Testament, and Mauvroull's Journey from Aleppo.

This village, called Richa, or Rihha, was long supposed to be situated on the site of ancient Jericho. But Mr Buckingham has shown that the real site of the ancient city was about four miles higher up the valley, where he traced to a considerable extent the boundary of its walls, and found portions of ruined buildings, shafts of columns, &c., scattered about over the widely extended heaps of this ruined city, which seemed to cover a surface of a square mile. 'The once celebrated "City of Palms" cannot now boast of a single tree of any kind, either palm or balsam; and there is scarcely any verdure or bushes to be seen about the site of this deserted city. But the desolation with which its ruins are surrounded, Mr Buckingham observes, is rather to be attributed to the cessation of the usual agricultural labours on the soil, and the want of a distribution of water over it by the aqueducts, the remains of which evince that they were chiefly constructed for that purpose, than to any change in the climate or soil.—Ed.

^c Jordan is supposed to derive its name from the Hebrew word Jor, which signifies a spring, and Dan, which is a small town, and not far from the fountain-head of this river. It is certainly a river of very great note in holy writ, and of it the Jewish historian gives us the following account; "The head of this river has been thought to be Panion; but, in truth, it passes thither under ground, and the source of it is Phiala, an hundred and twenty furlongs from Cesarea Philippi, a little on the right hand, and not much out of the way to Traehonis. From the cave of Panion it crosses the hogs and fens of the lake Seemehonitis, and after a course of an hundred and twenty furlongs further, passes under the city of Julius, or Bethsaida, and so over the lake Gennesareth, or Tiberias, and then running along through a wilderness or desert, it empties itself into the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead Sea." Now since the cave Panion lies at the foot of Mount Lebanon, and the lake Asphaltites reaches able to send two spies thither, to take a view of the situation and strength, and avenues of the place. As soon as the spies were gone, he bade the officers go through the camp, and give the people notice, that within three days they were to pass the Jordan, in order to take pos-

to the very extremity of the south of Judea, the river Jordan must extend its course quite from the northern to the southern boundary of the holy land. [Burekhardt, however, who visited its source, does not notice this distribution; but says, that it rises an hour and a quarter, or about four miles, north-east from Banias, or Cæsarea Philippi, in the plain, near a hill called Tel-el-Kadi. There are, he says, two springs, near each other, one smaller than the other, whose waters unite immediately below. Both sources are on level ground, amongst rocks, of what Burekhardt calls tufwacken. The larger source immediately forms a river twelve or fifteen yards across, which rushes rapidly over a stony bed into the lower plain. The few houses at present inhabited near this spot, are called Enkeil. It is soon after joined by the river of Banais, which rises on the north-east of the city. Over the source of this river is a perpendicular rock, in which several niches have been cut to receive statues; the largest of which is above a spacious cavern, beneath which the river rises. This niche, the editor of Burekhardt sensibly conjectures, contained a statue of Pan; whence the name of Panæas given to the city, and of Παναιον to the cavern. This explains the error of Josephus; who considered this to be, not the source of a distinct river, but the second head of Jordan, after emerging from its subterranean channel.] But the largeness of this river is far from being equal to its extent. It may be said indeed to have two banks, whereof the first and uttermost is that to which the river does, or at least anciently did, overflow at some seasons of the year; but at present, (whether the rapidity of the current has worn its channel deeper, or its waters are directed some other way) so it is, that it seems to have forgot its ancient greatness: for "we," says Mr Maundrell, "could discern no sign or probability of such overflowing, though we were there on the 30th of March, which is the proper time for its inundations. Nay, so far was the river from overflowing, that it ran at least two yards below the brink of its channel. After you have descended the outermost bank, (continued he,) you go about a furlong upon the level strand, before you come to the immediate bank of the river, which is so beset with bushes and trees, such as tamarisks, willows, oleanders, &c., that you can see no water, until you have made your way through them. In this cover of the banks, lions, and other wild creatures are said to hide themselves in summer, but upon the inundation of the river, they are forced to dislodge." To which the prophet seems to allude in these words, 'he shall come like a lion from the swelling of Jordan,' (Jer. xlix. 19).—Wells and Maundrell.

The course of the Jordan is about one hundred miles; its breadth and depth are various. Dr Shaw computed it to be about thirty yards broad, and three yards or nine feet in depth; and states that it discharges daily into the Dead Sea about 6,990,000 tons of water. Viscount Chateaubriand, who travelled nearly a century after him, found the Jordan to be six or seven feet deep close to the shore, and about fifty paces in breadth. The late count Volney asserts it to be scarcely sixty paces wide at its embouchure. Messrs Bankes and Buckingham, who crossed it in January, 1816, pretty nearly at the same ford over which the Israelites passed on their first entering the promised land, found the stream extremely rapid; and as it flowed at that part over a bed of pebbles, its otherwise turbid waters were tolerably clear, as well as pure and sweet to the taste. The passage of this deep and rapid river by the Israelites, at the most unfavourable season, when augmented by the dissolution of the winter snows, was more manifestly miraculous, if possible, than that of the Red Sea; because here was no natural agency whatever employed; no mighty winds to sweep a passage as in the former case; no reflux in the tide on which minute philosophers might fasten to depreciate the miracle. It seems, therefore, to have been providentially designed, to silence cavils respecting the former: it was done at noonday, in the presence of the neighbouring inhabitants; and it struck terror into the kings of the Amorites and Canaanites westward of the river, 'whose hearts melted, neither was there any spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel.' (Josh. v. 1.) The place where the Israelites thus miraculously passed this river, is supposed to be the 'fords of Jordan' mentioned in Judg. iii. 28. —Ed.

session of the promised land, and were therefore ^a to provide themselves with victuals for their march. ^b The spies who were sent upon this hazardous expedition, got safe into the city, and took up their lodgings in a public house that was kept by a widow woman, whose name was Rahab. But they had not been long there, before intelligence was brought to the king, so that he ordered the gates to be shut, and search to be made for the men: but their hostess, having had some notice of it, hid them under some hempen stocks, which lay drying ^c upon the roof of her house, and when the king's officers came, she told them, "that there had indeed been two strangers there, who had made a short stay at her house, but that, a little before sunset, they went away, but might easily be overtaken, because they had not been long gone:" where upon they sent out messengers after them, as far as the fords of Jordan; but in vain. Having thus eluded the king's officers, Rahab goes up to the spies, and tells them, "That she was very confident their God, who was the only true God, both in heaven and earth, had delivered that country into their hands; that the actions which he had done for them, in making all opposition fall before them, had struck a panic fear into all its inhabitants; and that therefore, as she was confident that this would be the event, and had, in this instance, shown them uncommon kindness, her only request was, that when they came against the city, they would, in return, spare hers and her family's lives; for which she desired of them some assurance." An offer so generous and so unexpected, joined with so liberal a confession, could not but engage the two spies to a compliance with what she requested; and therefore they promised, and solemnly swore to her, that whenever they became masters of the city, not only she, and her family, but every one else that was found in her house, should be exempted from the common ruin.

^a The Israelites' usual food, while they sojourned in the wilderness, was manna: but as they approached the promised land, where they might have provision in the ordinary way, that miraculous bread did perhaps gradually decrease; and in the space of a few days after this, was totally withdrawn. They were now in the countries of Sihon and Og, which they had lately conquered, and the victuals which they were commanded to provide themselves with, were such as their new conquest afforded: for being, after three days, (Josh. iii. 1.) to remove very early in the morning, they might not perhaps have had time to gather a sufficient quantity of manna, and to bake it, before they were obliged to march.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b The eastern writers tell us, that these spies, whom they make to be Caleb and Phineas, were valiant and religious men, and in the prime of their youth; that to pass unobserved, they changed their habits, as if they had come from a distant country; and if any one asked them any questions, their reply was to this effect: "We are people from the east, and our companions, have heard of this powerful people, who were forty years in the wilderness, without either guide or provision: and it was reported to us, that they had a God whom they called 'the King of heaven and earth,' and who, as they say, hath given them both you and our country. Our principals have therefore sent us to find out the truth hereof, and to report it to them. We have likewise heard of their captain, whom they call Joshua the son of Nun, who put the Amalekites to flight, who destroyed Sihon and Og, the kings of Midian and Moab. Wo therefore be to us, and you, and all that flee to us for shelter! They are a people who pity none, leave none alive, drive all out of their country, and make peace with none. We are all accounted by them infidels, profane, proud, and rebellious. Whoever of us or you, therefore, that intend to take care of themselves, let them take their families and be gone, lest they repent of their stay, when it is too late." By this means they imposed upon the people; and, as Josephus informs us, went whither they would, and saw whatever they had a mind to, without any stop or question. They took a view of the walls, the gates, the ramparts, and passed the whole day for men of curiosity only, without any design. So that if any credit may be given to this account, it was but just that they who thus imposed upon the Canaanites should, in the same manner, be imposed upon by the Gibeonites.—A Samaritan Chronicle written in Arabic, p. 65, and Josephus' Antiquities, b. 5. c. 1.

^c The roofs of houses were very flat, and having probably battlements round them to secure people from falling off, as the manner of building was afterwards among the Jews, Deut. xxii. 8, were made use of for places to walk, or at any time to lay any kind of goods upon.

The gates were so closely shut and guarded, that there was no possibility for making their escape that way; but Rahab's house being happily situated upon the city wall, as soon as it was conveniently dark, she first charged them to make to the neighbouring mountains, where they might keep themselves concealed, until the messengers were returned, and then let them down by a silken cord from one of her windows, which faced the country. But before they parted, they agreed that this same cord, hung out at her window, should be the token between them; and therefore they desired, that whoever she was minded to save, might, when their army approached the city, be kept within doors. The spies, having thus luckily escaped, took Rahab's advice, and concealed themselves in the mountains, until those who were sent out to pursue them were returned to the city, and then they made the best of their way to the camp; where they informed Joshua of their whole adventure, and withal gave him to understand, that the general consternation which they found the people in, was to them a sure omen that God Almighty intended to crown their arms with success.

Pleased with this news, Joshua gave orders for the army to decamp; but before he did that, he reminded the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, of the promise they had made to Moses to assist their brethren in the conquest of Canaan; ^a which they readily consented to do, and not only in that, but in every thing else he commanded them to do, promised to obey him with the same cheerfulness that they had done Moses: so that forty thousand of them decamped with him, and fell down to the banks of the Jordan.

It was now in the time of the barley-harvest, which in these hot countries falls early in the spring, when, by reason of hasty rain, and the melting of the snow upon Mount Lebanon, the river is generally full of water, and sometimes overflows its banks: and as soon as the army was come within a small distance of the place where it was intended they should cross, Joshua sent and communicated to every tribe the order that was to be observed in this solemn march. The priests, bearing the ark, were to begin the procession; each tribe, in the order in which they used to march, were to follow. When the priests were got into the middle of the channel, there they were to stand still, till the whole multitude was got safe to the other shore; and that this wonderful passage might be more regarded, they were all enjoined to sanctify themselves, by washing their clothes, avoiding all impurities, and abstaining from matrimonial intercourse the night before.

Before they crossed the river, Joshua, by God's direction, appointed twelve men, out of every tribe one, to choose twelve stones, according to the number of their tribes, in the midst of the channel, where the priests, with the ark, were ordered to stand, and ^b there to set them up, that they might be seen from each side of the river, when the waters were abated, as a monument of this great miracle; and to bring twelve more ashore with them for the like purpose.

With these orders and instructions, the army set forward. The priests with the ark led the van; and as soon as they touched the river with their feet, the stream divided. The waters above went back, and rose up on heaps as far as the city ^c Adam; whilst those that were below, continuing their course towards the Ded Sea, opened a passage of above sixteen or eighteen miles for the Israelites to cross over, and all the time that they were thus crossing, the priests with the ark stood in the middle of the channel, till every thing was done that Joshua commanded; and then, upon their coming out of it, the river returned to its wonted course.

By this miraculous passage, Joshua having gained the plains of Jericho, encamped in a ^d place which was afterwards called Gilgal; and while the whole country lay under a great terror and consternation, God commanded ^e the ^b It has been a custom in all nations to erect monuments of stone, in order to preserve the memory of covenants, victories, and other great transactions; and though there was no inscription upon these stones, yet the number of them, and the place where they lay, which was not at all stony, was sufficient to signify some memorable thing, which posterity would not fail to hand down from one generation to another.—Patrick's Commentary on Joshua iv. 7.

^c Adam, or Adom, is a place situate on the banks of the river Jordan, towards the south of the sea of Cinnereth, or the sea of Galilee.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament.

^d Gilgal, the place where the Israelites encamped for some time after their passage over the river Jordan, was so called, because here the rite of circumcision, which had long been disused, was renewed; whereupon 'the Lord said unto Joshua, this day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt (that is, uncircumcision) from off you; wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal (that is, rolling) unto this day,' Josh. v. 9. From this expression the place received its name, and if we look into its situation, we shall find, that as the Israelites passed over 'Jordan right against Jericho,' Josh. iii. 16, and encamped in Gilgal, in the eastern border of Jericho, it is plain, that Gilgal must be situated between Jordan and Jericho; and therefore, since Josephus tells us, that Jericho was sixty furlongs distant from Jordan, and the camp of Gilgal was fifty furlongs from the same river; it hence follows, that Gilgal was ten furlongs (that is, about a mile and a quarter) from Jordan eastward. But as some learned men have observed, that five of the furlongs used by Josephus make up an Italian mile, so the distance between Gilgal and Jericho will be just two miles; which exactly agrees with the testimony of St Jerome, who makes it two miles distant from Jericho, and a place held in great veneration by the inhabitants of the country in his days.—Wells' Geography, vol. 2. c. 1.

^e The command which God gives Joshua, concerning the rite of circumcision, is this,—'Make thee sharp knives, and circumcise the children of Israel the second time,' Josh. v. 2. And after ^a The two tribes and an half had the countries which had been lately conquered, and were now given to them in possession, to preserve against the attempts of the nations from whom they had taken them; and can hardly be supposed to go, one and all, along with their brethren, to the conquest of the countries which lay on the other side of the river Jordan. In the last muster of the army, they consisted of above an hundred thousand able soldiers; and we can hardly suppose that at this time their number was decreased. The forty thousand that went over Jordan, were but a part of them, and the rest were left behind to guard their new conquests against the vanquished nations, that had abundant reason to become their enemies.—Saurin, vol. 3, Dissertation I.

rite of circumcision, which for the space of almost forty years had been intermitted, to be renewed, that the people might be qualified to partake of the ensuing passover. This was the third time of their celebrating that festival: the first was at their departure out of Egypt; the second at the erection of their tabernacle, at the foot of Mount Sinai; and now that they were arrived in a country wherein there was a sufficient provision of corn for unleavened bread, God insisted upon the observance of his ordinances: he was minded, indeed, that all things now should go on in their regular way; and therefore, for the future, he left them to the provision which this land of plenty afforded them, and ceased to supply them any longer with manna.

Gilgal was much about two miles from Jericho, and therefore Joshua might possibly go out alone to reconnoitre the city, and to think of the properest way of besieging it; when, all on a sudden, there ^a appeared to the rite was performed, God said, 'This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you,' ver. 9. Both of which passages have given no small trouble to commentators. The sharp knives are allowed to be, what our marginal notes call them, knives of flint, which stones could not but be plentiful in the mountains of Arabia, and when made very sharp, were the knives commonly made use of in the eastern countries: but St Jerome himself, as great an Hebraist as he was, could not find out what was this circumcision, which was to pass upon the Israelites a second time. Some of the Jews from these words of Jeremiah, 'I will punish the circumcised that has a foreskin,' c. ix. 25. have undertaken to prove, that it was possible to bring the foreskin again by art, which the Israelites had done, during their abode in the wilderness, and for this reason were ordered to be circumcised afresh; and those Christians who have embraced this notion, pretend to support it by the words of St Paul, 'If any man is called being circumcised ὡς Ἰσραηλῆς, let him not become uncircumcised.' But whether the recovery of a prepuce be a thing probable or not, it is certain, that all the difficulty of the words arises from the misunderstanding the idiom of the original, and may easily be removed, if they were translated, or paraphrased thus,—Let the ceremony of circumcision, which has been so long discontinued, be renewed, as it was heretofore. While the Israelites lived in Egypt, we do not read of any neglect of this rite of circumcision among them; but while they abode in the wilderness, there are several reasons that might oblige them to omit it, until they arrived in the promised land, when they were to renew the ordinance of the passover, and previous to that, were all to be circumcised; because no uncircumcised person, nor any one who had a son or a man-servant in his house uncircumcised, was capable of being admitted to it, (Exod. xii. 43.) 2d. 'The rolling away the reproach of Egypt,' is supposed by some to relate to the reproaches which the Egyptians used to cast upon the Israelites, namely, that the Egyptians, seeing the Israelites wander so long in the wilderness, reproached and flouted them, as if they were brought to be destroyed there, and not conducted into the promised land, from which reproaches God now delivered them, when, by enjoining circumcision, he gave them assurance, that they should shortly enjoy the country which no uncircumcised person might inherit. Our learned Spencer thinks the reproach of Egypt to be the slavery to which they had long been there subject, but were now fully declared a free people, by receiving a mark of the seed of Abraham, and being made heirs of the promised land. But the most common opinion is, that by the 'reproach of Egypt' is meant nothing else but uncircumcision, with which the Israelites always upbraided other people, and particularly the Egyptians, with whom they had lived so long, and were best acquainted; and admitting this to be the true (as it is the most unconstrained) sense, this passage is a plain proof, that the Israelites could not learn the rite of circumcision from the Egyptians, as some pretend, but that the Egyptians, contrariwise, must have had it from them.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7; *Spencer De Leg. ^a Who this person was that appeared to Joshua, is not so well him a person clothed in armour, and standing at some distance, with a drawn sword in his hand. Undaunted at this unusual sight, Joshua advances to him, and having demanded of what party he was, the vision replied, that he was for the host of Israel, whose captain and guardian he was; and as Joshua, in humble adoration, was fallen prostrate before him, he ordered him, in the manner he had done Moses at the burning bush, to loose his sandals from off his feet, and then proceeded to instruct him in what form he would have the siege carried on, that the Canaanites might perceive that it was something more than the arm of flesh that fought against them.

The form of the siege was this:—All the army was to march round the city, with seven priests before the ark, having in their hands trumpets made of rams' horns, six days successively. On the seventh, after the army had gone round the city seven times, upon a signal given, the priests were to blow a long blast with their trumpets, and the people on a sudden set up a loud shout; at which instant the walls of the city should fall so flat to the ground, that they might directly walk into it without any let or obstruction. These orders were put in execution; and accordingly, on the seventh day, the walls fell, and the Israelites entered. They put every one, men, women, and children, nay the very beasts to the sword, and spared no living creature, but Rahab only, and such relations as she had taken under the protection of her roof, according to the stipulation which had been made with her. For Joshua had given the two spies a strict charge beforehand, that when the town was going to be sacked, they should repair to her house, and convey every thing safe out that belonged to her; which accordingly they did, and then the whole army fell on, and set fire to the city, and destroyed every thing in it, except the silver and gold, and such vessels of brass and iron as were to be put into the treasury of the house of the Lord, as they had done once before ¹ in a case of the like nature: and that it might never be rebuilt again, Joshua ^b denounced a prophetic imprecation on the man agreed among commentators. Some are of opinion that it was an angel, who, because the Hebrew calls him Gebir, is supposed to be Gabriel; but there are several reasons, in this very account of his apparition, which denote him to be a divine, and not a created being. For, in the first place, besides his assuming the title of 'the captain of the host of the Lord,' an image under which God himself is frequently represented in Scripture, Joshua's calling him 'Jehovah,' or the 'Lord,' a name which neither Joshua should have given, nor he accepted of, had he been no more than an angel; his falling down and worshipping him, which he durst not have done, since God alone is to be adored, nor would the other have permitted, but rather have reproved him, as we find one of them did St John, (Rev. xxii. 10.) are the surest evidence of the divinity of his person. For, when instead of reproving him for doing him too much honour, we find him commanding him to do more, by requiring him to loose 'his shoes from off his feet,' insisting upon the highest acknowledgment of a divine presence that was used among the eastern nations, we cannot but think ourselves obliged (with a learned rabbin) freely to confess, "That this angel who suffered himself to be worshipped, and by whose presence the place where he appeared was sanctified, so that Joshua was commanded to 'put off his shoes,' no doubt was the very same whom all the angels of heaven do worship."—Job. a Cuch. upon the Genaræ of the Sanhedrim, vol. 3. (namely, that it should occasion the utter ruin of his family) that should attempt it.

^a Ai was a little city, about twelve miles distant from Jericho; and as Joshua knew that it was neither populous nor well defended, he detached a small body, of 3000 men only, to go and attack it. But, contrary to their expectation, the inhabitants of the place sallied out upon them, and having slain some few, put the rest to flight, and pursued them as far as their own camp. This defeat, how small soever, struck such a damp upon the people's courage, that ^b Joshua was forced to have recourse to God, who immediately answered him, (by Jericho; he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it.' (Josh. vi. 26.) "This anathema," says Maimonides, "was pronounced, that the miracle of the subversion of Jericho might be kept in perpetual memory; for whosoever saw the walls sunk deep into the earth," as he understands it, "would clearly discern, that this was not the form of a building destroyed by men, but miraculously thrown down by God." Hiel, however, in the reign of Ahab, either not remembering, or not believing this denunciation, was so taken with the beauty of its situation, that he rebuilt Jericho, and, as the sacred history informs us, "laid the foundation thereof in Abiram, his first-born, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake by Joshua, the son of Nun." (1 Kings xvi. 34.) However, after that Hiel had ventured to rebuild it, no scruple was made of inhabiting it; for it afterwards became famous upon many accounts. Here the prophet sweetened the waters of the spring that supplied it and the neighbouring countries. Here Herod built a sumptuous palace. It was the dwelling-place of Zachæus; and was honoured with the presence of Christ, who vouchsafed likewise to work some miracles here.—Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

^a We have this place mentioned in the history of Abraham, who both before and after his going into Egypt, pitched his tent between Bethel and Ai, or Hai, as it was then called; and from both Gen. xii. 8. and Josh. vii. 2. it appears that this city lay to the east of Bethel, about three leagues from Jericho, and one from Bethel, as Masias informs us; and the reason why Joshua sent so small a detachment against it was, because the place in itself was neither strong nor large. For when it was taken, the number of the slain, both in it and Bethel, which, as some think, was confederate with it, were "but twelve thousand, both of men and women." (Josh. viii. 25.) The providence of God, however, was very visible, in sending so small a party against Ai; for if the flight of three thousand men put the Israelites into such a consternation, as we read Josh. vii. 5, 6, what a condition would they have been in if all the people had been discomfited, as doubtless it would have happened, while the guilt of Achan's sacrifice remained unpunished.—Wells' Geography, vol. 2. c. 4.

^b The spirits of the army, as Josephus tells us, were so sunk upon this disorder, and cast down into such a desperation of better things to come, that after they had spent the whole day in fasting, weeping, and mourning, Joshua addressed himself, with a more than ordinary importunity, to Almighty God, in words to this effect: "It is not any temerity, O Lord, or ambition of our own, that has brought us hither to make war upon this people, but a pure deference and respect to the persuasion of thy servant Moses, that has incited us to this undertaking, and not without a warrant of many signs and miracles, to convince us, that he had reason and authority on his side, when he told us, that thou thyself hadst promised us the possession of this country, and to give us victory over all our enemies. But what a change is here, all on a sudden, in the disappointment of our hopes, and in the loss of our friends! As if either Moses' prediction had not been of divine inspiration, or otherwise thy promises and purposes variable. If this be the beginning of a war, we cannot but dread the further progress of it, for fear that this miscarriage, upon the first experiment, should prove only the earnest of greater evils to come. But, Lord, thou alone, that art able to give us relief, help us, and save us. Vouchsafe unto us comfort and victory; and be graciously pleased to preserve us from the snare of despairing for the future." Jewish Antiquities, b. 5. c. 1.

Urim as is supposed,) that his commands had been sacrilegiously infringed; and therefore ordered him to have the offender punished with death, and directed him to a method how to discover who he was.

Before the taking of Jericho, ¹ Joshua had cautioned the people not to spare any thing that was in it, but to burn and destroy all that came in their way, except silver and gold, and brass, and iron, which were to be consecrated to the Lord: but notwithstanding his strict charge against reserving any thing that was either devoted to this general destruction, or consecrated to the Lord, a man of the tribe of Judah, whose name was Achan, took some of the rich plunder and concealed it in his tent. To find out the person therefore, Joshua, early next morning, called all the tribes together before the tabernacle, where, ^d by casting the lot, first upon the tribes, and so proceeding from tribe to family, from family to household, and from household to particular persons, the criminal was at last found to be Achan; who upon Joshua's admonition, confessed the fact, namely, that he had secreted ^d a royal robe, two hundred shekels of silver, and a large wedge of gold; and when upon search, the things were produced in the presence of all the people, they took him, and all his family, his cattle, his tent, and all his moveables, and carrying them to a neighbouring valley, which, from that time, ^e in allu-

^c Some Jewish doctors are of opinion, that in the discovery of the guilty person, there was no use made of lots at all, but that all Israel being ordered to pass by the high priest, who, on this occasion had his pectoral on, in which were the twelve stones, with the names of the twelve tribes engraven on them, when the tribe to which the guilty person belonged, was called, the stone in which was the name of that tribe, changed colour, and turned black; and so it did when the family, the household, and the person was called. But this is a mere fiction. There is much more probability in the opinion of those who suppose that, at first, twelve lots or tickets were put into one urn, on each of which was written the name of one of these twelve tribes; that when one of the twelve tribes was found guilty, then were there as many lots put in as there were families in that tribe; after that, as many as there were householders in that family; and at last, as many as there were heads in that household, until the criminal was detected. But others will have it, that this was done by the high priest alone, who, by a divine inspiration, at that time, was enabled, without any more to do, to declare who the culpable person was.—Saurin's Dissertations, vol. 3. Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries on Joshua vii.

^d In the original, this robe is called a garment of Shinar, that is, of Babylon; and the general opinion is, that the richness and excellency of it consisted not so much in the stuff whereof it was made, as in the colour whereof it was dyed, which most suppose to have been scarlet, a colour in high esteem among the ancients, and for which the Babylonians were justly famous. Bochart, however, maintains, that the colour of this robe was various, and not all of one sort; that the scarlet colour the Babylonians first received from Tyre, but the party colour, whether so woven or wrought with the needle, was of their own invention, for which he produces many passages out of heathen authors. Such as:—"I would not prefer the gaudily coloured Babylonian robes, which are variegated with Egyptian needlework." (Mart. Ep. b. 8.) "The land of Memphis affords these gifts; the comb of Egypt is superior to the Babylonian needle." (Ibid. l. 14.) with many more citations out of several other writers. However this be, it is certain that the robe could not fail of being a very rich and splendid one, and therefore captivated either Achan's pride, or rather covetousness; since his purpose seems to have been, not so much to wear it himself, as to sell it for a large price.—Bochart's Phaleg, b. 1. c. 9.; Saurin, b. 3. Dissertation 3.

^e Though his name was primarily Achan, yet, ever after his execution he was called Achar, (so the Syriac version, Josephus, sion to that man's name, was called the valley of Achar, " there they stoned him, and those belonging to his family, as accomplices in his crimes. Whatever goods or utensils he had, these they consumed with fire, and so raised a great heap of stones over all, that thereby they might perpetuate the memory of the crime, and deter others from the like provocation.

After this execution of the divine justice, God ordered Joshua to attempt the conquest of Ai once more, and promised him success; which might best be obtained, as he told him, by laying an ambuscade somewhere behind the city, towards Bethel. ^b 30,000 men were therefore drawn out, and sent away by night upon this expedition, with instructions to enter the city as soon as the signal, which was to be a spear with a banner upon it, was given them: and early next morning, he himself marched with the remainder of his forces against the city. As soon as the king of Ai perceived him, he sallied hastily out of the town, with all his troops, and all his people, and fell upon the Israelites, who, at the first onset, fled as if they had been under great terror. But this was only a feint, to draw the enemy into the plain; and therefore as soon as Joshua saw, that, by stratagem, the city was pretty well emptied, he gave the signal to the ambuscade; which finding it now defenceless, immediately entered, and set it on fire.

By the ascent of the smoke, Joshua discerned that his men had got possession of the town; and therefore facing about, he began to charge the enemy very briskly; who, little expecting that the Israelites would rally, began now to think of retreating to the city; but when they saw it all in flames, and the party which had set it on fire issuing out, and just going to fall upon their rear, they were so dismayed and dispirited, that they had power neither to fight nor flee. So that all the army was cut to pieces; the city was burned, and made an heap of rubbish; every soul in it, man, woman, and child, were put to the sword; and the king, who was taken prisoner, was ordered to be hanged upon a gibbet till Athanasius, Basil, and others mentioned by Bochart, name him,) which signifies the troubler of Israel.—Patrick's Commentary on Joshua viii.

^a Since the law against sacrilege condemns transgressors to the flames, and God commanded the person here guilty to be burned accordingly, (Josh. vii. 18.) the Jews affirm that Achan was actually burned: and whereas it is said in the text that 'he was stoned,' they think that this was done not judicially, but accidentally, by the people, who were so highly provoked, that they could not forbear casting stones at him as he was led to execution.—See Munst. on Joshua vii.

^b Some are of opinion, that this detachment of thirty thousand made up the whole force that was employed in this expedition against Ai: and that, out of these, 5000 were sent to lie in ambush, that, at a convenient time, they might set fire to the city: but this is so directly contrary to God's command, of Joshua's 'taking all the people of war with him,' which accordingly in chap. viii. 3, 11, we are told he did, that there is no foundation for it. And therefore it is reasonable to suppose, that the whole body designed for the ambuscade consisted of 30,000 men; and that the 5000 mentioned in the 12th verse, was a small party detached from these, in order to creep closer to the city, while the 25,000 kept themselves absconded behind the mountains, until a proper signal was given, both from the city, when this small party had taken it, and from the grand army, when they had repulsed the enemy, that then they might come out from their ambush, and intercept them as they were making their flight.—Patrick's Commentary on Joshua viii.

sunset, when he was taken down, thrown in at a gate of the city, and a great heap of stones raised over him.

After this action was over, the cattle, and all the spoil of the city was, by God's appointment, given to the soldiers; and as Joshua was now not far distant from the mountains of Gerizim and Ebal, this reminded him of the command which ¹ Moses had given about reading the law, with the blessings and curses thereunto annexed, from those two mountains; which he not only ordered to be done, but had an altar likewise erected, whereon not only sacrifices were offered, to give God the glory of all his victories, but ^c an abridgment of the law, or some remarkable part of it, was likewise engraven, at the same time that the whole of it was read in a large assembly of all the tribes.

Joshua's success against the two towns of Jericho and Ai, and the terrible slaughter he had made among their inhabitants, had ^d so alarmed the kings on that side the Jordan, that they confederated together, and entered into league for their mutual defence; but the Gibeonites, foreseeing the destruction that was hastening upon them, endeavoured by a stratagem to gain a peace with the Israelites, which they effected in this manner.—They chose a certain number of artful men, who ^e were

^c It is a question (as we said before, p. 321, in the notes) among the learned, what it was that was written upon these stones. But besides other conjectures already enumerated, some think it not unlikely to have been a copy of the covenant, by which the children of Israel acknowledged that they held the land of Canaan of God, upon condition that they observed his laws, to which they and their posterity had obliged themselves; for this was the third time that the covenant between God and his people was renewed, and therefore the contents of that covenant, might be very proper at this time to be thus monumentally recorded.—Patrick on Deut. xxvii. 3. and Josh. viii. 32.

^d The Jews in the Talmud tell us likewise, that a farther cause of the Gibeonites' fear was, the inscription which they had met with upon Mount Ebal, where, among other parts of the law which Joshua, as they pretend, wrote upon stones, they found the orders which both he and Moses had received from God, utterly to extirpate all the inhabitants of the land of Canaan.—Saurin, b. 3. Dissertation, 4.

^e It is a question among the casuists, whether the Gibeonites could, with a good conscience, pretend that they were foreigners, and tell a lie to save their lives? And to this Puffendorf, (Droit de la Nature,) b. 4. c. 2, thus replies: "The artifice of the Gibeonites," says he, "had nothing blameable in it, nor does it properly deserve the name of a lie: for what crime is there in any one's making use of an innocent fiction, in order to elude the fury of an enemy that would destroy all before them? Nor did the Israelites indeed properly receive any damage from this imposture: for what does any one lose in not shedding the blood of another, when he has it in his power to take from him all his substance, after having so weakened and disarmed him that he is no more able to rebel against him?" But the opinion of this great man seems to be a little erroneous in this case. Had the Israelites indeed been a pack of common murderers, who, without any commission from heaven, were carrying blood and desolation into countries where they had no right; or had the Gibeonites been ignorant that a miraculous providence conducted these conquerors, the fraud which they here put upon them might then be deemed innocent: for there is no law that obliges us under the pretence of sincerity, to submit to such incendiaries, and mercilefs usurpers, as are for setting fire to our cities, and putting us and our families to the edge of the sword. But the case of the Gibeonites was particular; and if in other things they went contrary to truth, in this they certainly adhered to it, when they told Joshua, 'We are come, because of the name of the Lord thy God, for we have heard of the fame of him, and all that he did in Egypt, and all that he did to the two kings of the Amorites, that instructed to feign themselves ambassadors come from a far distant country, in order to obtain a league with the people of Israel; and, to gain credit to this their pretence, they dressed themselves in old clothes, had old clouted shoes on their feet, carried dry musty bread in their bags, and the bottles wherein they kept their wine, were ^a all sadly tarnished and torn. ^b In this plight were beyond Jordan,' &c. (Josh. ix. 9, 10.) The idea which they had conceived of the God of Israel should have put them upon some other expedient than that of lying and deceit. They should have inquired, as far as the obscure dispensation they were under would have permitted them, into the cause of God's severity against them. They should have acknowledged, that it was their grievous sins which drew down this heavy judgment upon their nation; and after they had repented thereof in sackcloth and ashes, they should have committed the rest to providence, never doubting, but that he who had changed the very course of nature to punish the guilty, would always find out some means or other to save the penitent; but this they did not do; and therefore they were culpable.—Saurin, vol. 3. Dissertation 1.

^a These bottles were not of glass, or clay, as those in use among us, but were made of leather, in which they formerly, and even now in some countries, kept their wine.

^b Chardin informs us that the Arabs, and all those that lead a wandering life, keep their water, milk, and other liquors, in leathern bottles. "They keep in them more fresh than otherwise they would do. These leathern bottles are made of goat-skins. When the animal is killed, they cut off its feet and its head, and they draw it in this manner out of the skin, without opening its belly. They afterwards sew up the places where the legs were cut off, and the tail, and when it is filled they tie it about the neck. These nations, and the country people of Persia, never go a journey without a small leathern bottle of water hanging by their side like a scrip. The great leathern bottles are made of the skin of an he goat, and the small ones that serve instead of a bottle of water on the road, are made of a kid's skin." These bottles are frequently rent when old and much used, and are capable of being repaired when bound up. This they do, Chardin says, "sometimes by setting in a piece; sometimes by gathering up the wounded place in manner of a purse; sometimes they put in a round flat piece of wood, and by that means stop the hole." Maundrell gives an account exactly similar to the above. Speaking of the Greek convent at Bellmount, near Tripoli, in Syria, he says, "the same person we saw officiating at the altar in his embroidered sacerdotal robe, brought us the next day, on his own back, a kid and a goat's skin of wine, as a present from the convent." (Journey, March 12.) These bottles are still used in Spain, and called borrachas. Mr Bruce gives a description of the girba, which seems to be a vessel of the same kind as those now mentioned, only of dimensions considerably larger. "A girba, is an ox's skin, squared, and the edges sewed together very artificially, by a double seam which does not let out water, much resembling that upon the best English cricket balls. An opening is left at the top of the girba, in the same manner as the bung-hole of a cask. Around this the skin is gathered to the size of a large handial, which when the girba is full of water, is tied round with whipcord. These girbas generally contain about sixty gallons each, and two of them are the load of a camel. They are then all besmeared on the outside with grease, as well to hinder the water from oozing through, as to prevent its being evaporated by the heat of the sun upon the girba, which in fact happened to us twice, so as to put us in imminent danger of perishing with thirst." (Travels, vol. iv. p. 331.) See Harmer, vol. I. p. 132.

they came to the camp at Gidgad; and being introduced to Joshua, they told him, 'That the fame of many miracles which God had wrought for them in the land of Egypt, and the wonderful successes wherewith he had blessed their arms against every power that had oppos'd them in their coming to that place, had reached even their remote and distant country; for which reason their states and rulers had sent them a long way, that by all means imaginable, they might obtain a peace with a people so renowned all the world over, and so favoured and honoured by God.' And then showing their clothes, shoes, and other tokens of the long journey they had taken, they solemnly assured them, that all these things were quite new when at first they set out from home, and thence left them to judge how distant and remote their country was.

This plausible story, confirmed, as they thought, by so many evidences, gained credit with the Israelites, so that they entered into an amicable alliance with them; and the other took care to have the treaty immediately ratified, both by Joshua and all the princes of the congregation. In three days' time the imposture was discovered; and they who pretended to come from a distant country were found to be near neighbours, and some of those very people whom Joshua was commissioned to destroy. So that when the thing came to be rumoured about, the people began to murmur against their princes for their indiscretion, and were for having the league cancelled; but as it was confirmed by a solemn oath, this they could not do without incurring the divine displeasure. And therefore, though they might not take away their lives, they might, nevertheless, hold them in a state of servitude, and, as long as they lived, make them useful drudges, hewers of wood, and drawers of water, and the like, which would both punish them much, and prove fully as beneficial to the commonwealth; and with this apology the people were appeased. Joshua, however, sent for some of the chief of the Gibeonites; and having expostulated the cheat with them, which they excused upon the score of saving their own lives, he told them what the determination of the princes was, namely, that they should remain in a state of perpetual bondage; which they received without any manner of murmuring, and humbly acquiesced in whatever was thought proper to be imposed upon them.

The confederate princes, hearing of this separate treaty which the Gibeonites had made with Israel, were resolved to be revenged of them for their desertion of the common cause; and accordingly, joining all their forces together, they came and invested their town. The Gibeonites in this distress, not daring to trust to their own strength, sent an express to Joshua for speedy help; who set out with an expedition, and, by quick marches, and the favour of the night, came upon the enemy sooner than they expected, and early next morning fell upon them, and routed them. In this expedition God had all along encouraged Joshua, and promised him success; and therefore, as the confederate forces were endeavouring to escape, and save themselves by flight, he poured such a storm of hail upon them as destroyed more than what perished by the sword.

e Josh. x. 11. The common English translation of Joshua, reads, 'The Lord cast down great stones from heaven.' Some Joshua, on the other hand, was very desirous to make the most of this happy opportunity; and therefore, in full chase of victory, he addressed himself to God, that the sun and moon might stand still, and so prolong the day until he had completed his victory; which God was pleased to grant. So that this was the most memorable day that ever happened, wherein the 'Almighty listened to the voice of a man,' to change the course of nature, and stop the motion of those rolling orbs.

The confederate kings being thus put to flight, and either frightened at the storm of hail, or at the close pursuit of the enemy, made to a cave near ^a Makkedah, and there ran in to hide themselves. But Joshua, having intelligence of it, commanded the cave to be blocked up, and a guard to be set over it, and so continued his pursuit, that he might cut off as many as he possibly could before they reached to their fortified towns. In his return he ordered the cave to be opened, and the kings to be brought forth; and when execution was done upon them, he caused their bodies to be hanged upon several trees until the evening, when they were taken down, and cast into the cave, where they thought to have hid themselves; so that the place of their intended sanctuary became their sepulchre. After this signal victory, Joshua took all the southern parts of Canaan; which afterwards belonged to the tribes of Judah, Simeon, Benjamin, Dan, and Ephraim: and having thus ended his second campaign, he returned with his army to the camp at Gilgal.

Here he continued for some time without entering upon any fresh action, until several princes of the north of Canaan, under Jabin king of Hazor, confederated together, and raised a vast number of forces, which encamped not far from ^b the waters of Merom; and what writers are of opinion that this was hail, of which violent storms frequently occur in Arabia, but that this was larger, and more violent than usual; others maintain that Joshua is to be understood literally of a shower of stones; such a circumstance, so far from being impossible, has several times occurred. The Romans, who looked upon showers of stones as very disastrous, have noticed many instances of them. Under the reign of Tullus Hostilius, when it was known to the people of Rome, that a shower of stones had fallen on the mountain of Alba, at first it seemed incredible. They sent out proper persons to inquire into this prodigy, and it was found that stones had fallen after the same manner as a storm of hail driven by the wind. (Tit. Liv. b. 1. decad. 1. p. 12.; Idem, b. xxv. xxx. xxxiv. xxxv. et alibi passim.) Some time after the battle of Cannæ, there was seen upon the same mountain of Alba, a shower of stones, which continued for two days together. In 1538, near a village in Italy, called Tripergola, after some shocks of an earthquake, there was seen a shower of stones and dust, which darkened the air for two days, after which they observed that a mountain had risen up in the midst of the Lucerne Lake. (Monfaucon Diar. Italic. c. 21.) Dr A. Clarke, in his commentary on this passage, has given a long and interesting account of various showers of stones and hail which have fallen in various places, and to which the curious reader is referred. As a most stupendous miracle was wrought in this instance, in causing the sun and moon to stand still, there can be no doubt that the shower of stones whether hail or otherwise was also miraculous.—Ed.

^a It was a city in the tribe of Judah, about eight miles distant from Eleutheropolis; which place, though it is nowhere mentioned in the Scripture history, because it was built after the destruction of Jerusalem, is nevertheless frequently taken notice of by Eusebius and Jerome, as a point from whence they measure the distances of other places. Its name imports a 'free city,' and was itself situate in the tribe of Judah.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2. c. 4.

^b These waters are generally supposed by learned men to be 'made the army more formidable, was the great number of horses and ^d armed chariots they had, whereas the Israelites were all on foot. This, however, did not in the least discourage Joshua, who, in pursuance of the instructions which God had given him, immediately took the field, marched directly towards the enemy, fell suddenly upon them, and put all, except ^e those that made the lake Semechon, which lies between the head of the river Jordan and the lake of Gemmesareth; since it is agreed on all hands, that the city Hazor, where Jabin reigned, was situate upon this lake. But others think, that the waters of Merom, or Merome, were somewhere about the brook Kishon; since there is a place of that name mentioned in the account of the battle against Sisera, Judg. v. 21. And it is more rational to think, that the confederate kings advanced as far as the brook Kishon, and to a pass which led into their country, to hinder Joshua from penetrating it, or even to attack him in the country where he himself lay encamped, than to imagine, that they waited for him in the midst of their own country, leaving all Galilee at his mercy, and the whole tract from the brook of Kishon, to the lake Semechon.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3. c. 5; Reland's Palest. b. 1. c. 40; and Cabinet on Josh. xi. 5.

^c Their whole army, according to Josephus, was computed to amount to three hundred thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and two thousand chariots; and to oppose against these the Israelites had no horse in their armies, because God had interdicted them, (Deut. xvii. 16.) lest a traffic into Egypt for that sort of cattle should be a snare to entangle them in idolatry; or lest, having a quantity thereof, they should put their confidence rather in them, than in the divine assistance; for which reason the prophet denounces a 'woe upon them that go down into Egypt for help, and stay on horses, and trust in chariots, because they are many; and in horsemen, because they are strong, but they look not to the Holy One of Israel, neither seek they the Lord.'—Is. xxxi. 1.

^d The chariots, which the ancient historians usually call currus falciferi, covini falciferi, quadriga falcata, (scythe-bearing chariots,) &c., are described after the following manner:—"The beam to which the horses were fastened, was armed with spikes with iron points, which projected forward; the yokes of the horses had two cutting falchions, of three cubits' length: the axle-trees had fixed to them two iron spits, with scythes at their extremities; the spokes of the wheels were armed with javelins, and the very felloes with scythes, which tore every thing they met with to pieces. The axle-tree was longer, and the wheels stronger than usual, that they might be the better able to bear a shock, and the chariot less liable to be overturned." The charioteer, who was covered all over with armour, sat in a kind of tower made of very solid wood, about breast high, and sometimes men well armed were put into the chariot, and fought from thence with darts and arrows. So that a dreadful slaughter these machines must at first have made, when they met with the enemy's troops; but in time, when men came to find out the way of declining them, they did not do so much execution, and were consequently disused.—See Diodorus Siculus, b. 17; Quint. Curtius, b. 4; Xenophon. Cyropæd. b. 6; Lucretius de Rer. Nat. b. 6.

^e Some Jewish authors will needs have it, that when Joshua went into the land of Canaan, he proposed three things to the inhabitants thereof, either that they should leave the country, or come and make their submission, or take up arms and fight him. But this is said, in some measure to excuse the Jewish general, and to mollify the rigour of his proceedings. His express command from God was, to extirpate the seven nations, without making any treaty, or giving quarter: and though the Gibeonites by guile had obtained a kind of league with him, yet the conditions which he thereupon proposed were so very hard, that they could not but deter others from making the like attempt. It is not therefore to be wondered, that the Canaanites, who saw themselves driven to the necessity either of death or slavery, after they had tried the fate of their arms so often to no purpose, should endeavour to make their escape from a people everywhere victorious, and who were enjoined to be cruel and remorseless by their very God who had given them this success. Nor can we suppose but that God, who was minded to make room for his own people, did (according to his promise, Exod. xxiii. 27.) inject upon this occasion a terror so extraordinary into the natives of the country, and make them desire to be gone. And when they their escape into other countries, to the sword; hamstringed their horses, and burned their chariots with fire. Jabin had been the head of the confederacy against him; and therefore he killed him, and caused his city to be burned to the ground; but the other cities, whose inhabitants were slain in battle, he left standing, and gave the plunder of them to the soldiers.

Thus Joshua subdued all the land of Canaan ^a by degrees. He put its inhabitants, its kings, who were one and thirty in number, and all the giants that dwell therein, except some few that still remained among the Philistines, to the sword; and having now extended his conquest as far as it was convenient at that time, he began to think of dividing the country among the tribes that were yet unprovided for, and of dismissing the two tribes and an half who had accompanied him in the wars, but had their habitations already settled by Moses, on the east side of the river Jordan. To this purpose he appointed commissioners, who should take an exact survey of the country, and bring in a full report without delay; which when he had done, ^b the country was divided into were desirous to be gone, they had the ports lying upon the Mediterranean sea very commodious for their purpose. For whether the towns of Tyre and Sidon were at this time built or no, it is certain, that the places where these towns stood, could not but be proper harbours for shipping; and as the Phœnicians were still masters of the sea coasts, by their assistance the Canaanites might make their escape into what part they pleased. The Phœnicians, much about this time, did certainly send out a vast many colonies; but as it cannot be supposed, that so small a country should produce such swarms, the greatest part of them are presumed to be the refugees of Canaan, who made their escape by shipping to all the coasts which lay round the Mediterranean and Ægean seas, and even to other parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa, as the learned Bochart has given us a large account in his Canaan, from page 345 to page 699.—Cabinet's Dissertation on the country where the Canaanites, pursued by Joshua, saved themselves.

^a These great achievements may be allowed to have taken up some years. The history indeed informs us, that 'Joshua made war a long time with all these kings,' Josh. xi. 18. And from the words of Caleb, wherein he gives Joshua an account of his age, and that it was five and forty years since he was sent a spy to Kadesh-Barnea, there cannot be well less than between six and seven years spent in this war; and why the war was so long continued, God himself assigns this reason:—'I will not drive them out from before thee in one year, lest the land become desolate, and the beasts of the field multiply against thee: by little and little will I drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased and inherit the land,' Exod. xxiii. 29, 30.

^b Those who are minded to know what particular towns and territories fell to each tribe, had best consult what Josephus, in his Jewish Antiquities; Jerome, de Loris Hebraicis; Reland de Urbibus et Vicis Palestine; Masius, in Joshuan; Fuller, in his Pisgah-sight; Raleigh, in his History, part I. b. 2.; Wells, in his Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.; Patrick, Poole, Le Clerc, and several others, in their commentaries, have said on this subject. We shall make this one remark, which Masius, in his rich Commentary upon Joshua, furnishes us with, namely, that as Jacob and Moses, at the approach of their deaths, foretold the very soil and situation of every particular country that should fall to each tribe; so, upon this division by lots, it accordingly came to pass. To the tribe of Judah there fell a country abounding with vines and pasture grounds (Gen. xlix. 11.) To that of Ashur, one plenteous in oil, iron, and brass, (Deut. xxxiii. 24, 25.) To that of Naphtali, one extending from the west to the south of Judea, (Deut. xxxiii. 23.) To that of Benjamin, one in which the temple was afterwards built (Deut. xxxiii. 12.) To those of Zebulun and Issachar, such as had plenty of seaports, (Gen. xlix. 13.) To those of Ephraim and Manasseh, such as were rich in their precious fruits, (Deut. xxxiii. 14.) And to those of Simeon and Levi, no particular countries at all; for as much as the former had a portion with Judah, and the other was interspersed among the several tribes. Since, therefore, as equal portions, for which each tribe, according ¹ to God's directions, cast lots. But because some tribes were larger, and some territories richer than others, Joshua and Eleazar, together with the princes of the people, took care to adjust the proportion of the land to the largeness of the tribe, and in subdividing that, to consider the number of each family and household; pursuing exactly the orders which God gave to his servant Moses: ² 'Unto these the land shall be divided for an inheritance, according to the number of names. To many thou shalt give the more inheritance; and to few, thou shalt give the less inheritance.—Notwithstanding, the land shall be divided by lot;—according to lot shall the possession thereof be divided among many, and few.'

Having thus divided the country on the west side of the Jordan, Joshua had a little place given him for his own habitation, not far from Shiloh, where, after the wars, the tabernacle was set up, that he might have an opportunity of consulting God upon any occasion; and, after all things were in this manner regulated, he called together the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, who had served for almost seven years, as auxiliaries in the wars of Canaan, and gave them an honourable dismissal. "He acknowledged that they had duly executed the condition which they promised to Moses, in accompanying their brethren, and helping them to subdue their enemies, and commended their courage and fidelity for so doing. He exhorted them, now that they were going to separate from the tabernacle, never to neglect the service of God, but to bear always in mind those venerable laws which he had given them by his great legislator. He advised them to distribute a share of the rich booty they had taken from the Canaanites, among their brethren on the other side of Jordan; because, though they had not partaken of the peril of the late war, they had nevertheless done them great service, in protecting their families from the insults of their enemies on every side." And ^c with these acknowledgments and exhortations, together with many sincere wishes for their prosperity and welfare, ^d he sent our commentator reasons, each particular lot answered so exactly to each prediction, it must needs be the height of inobedience or stupidity not to acknowledge the divine inspiration in these predictions, and the divine direction in these lots.

^c Josephus, in the speech which he introduces Joshua making to the Reubenites, &c., at their parting, concludes with these words:—"But, I pray you, let no distance of place set limits to our friendship. The interposition of rivers must never divide our affections; for on which bank soever, we are all Hebrews still. Abraham was the common father of us all, let our abode be where it will. It was from one and the same God that all our forefathers received their being; and that God we are all to worship, according to the ordinances and institutions left us by Moses. So long as we stand firm to that way of religion, we may be sure of the favour and protection of that God for our comfort; but whenever you apostatize into an hankering after strange gods, the God of your fathers will cast you out."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 5. c. 1.

^d The Chronicler Samaritanum, if we may believe what it reports, pages 92, 93, tells us that when Joshua sent the Reubenites away, he appointed Nephtali to be his deputy on the other side of Jordan; that he clothed him with a royal robe, put a crown on his head, and made him ride on a horse of state, with a crier went before him, proclaiming, "This is the king of the two tribes and a half, the president of justice, the director of affairs, and the general in the camp. Let his determination be conclusive. In all difficult cases let him desire an answer from them away; but they had not been long gone, before a sad misunderstanding had like to have happened between them and the other tribes.

Upon their arrival on the other side of Jordan, they erected an altar near the place where they and their brethren had miraculously passed over, not for any religious use, but as a memorial to succeeding generations, that though they were parted by the river, yet they were of the same extract and religion, and held an equal right to the tabernacle at Shiloh, and to the worship of God performed there, that the inhabitants of the other side had. But whether those on the other side were misinformed or misapprehended their intent, so it was, that they fell into a violent rage against them, as apostates from the true religion; and immediately took up arms for the vindication of the worship and religion of their forefathers, and to avenge the cause of God upon the heads and chief authors of this defection. But before they proceeded to these extremities, they were advised by their rulers to suspend the execution of their wrath, until they had sent a deputation to them in order to know the reason of their building such an altar; which accordingly they did, and made choice of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, with ten other persons of eminent distinction, to go upon the embassy. As soon as they were come into the land of ^a Gilead ^b they represented the great surprise that the rest of the tribes were in at their building this altar; and told them very roundly, that they feared it portended a defection into idolatry. To dissuade them, therefore, from that, they put them in mind of the calamities which God had formerly sent upon them for their worship of Baal-peor; and that if so lately he had been so severe upon them for the offence of one man, namely, Achan only, what might they not expect when two tribes and a half were going to make a general revolt! And as they suspected that the absence of the tabernacle might give some occasion to this innovation, they invited them to come and live among them, where they might not want an opportunity of serving God, according to the custom of their ancestors.

Concerned to hear the ill opinion which their brethren had thus conceived of them, the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, ^c protested their innocence of any idolatrous intention, and made a solemn appeal to God, that so far were they from setting up any altar in opposition to his, that the only design of that structure was, to perpetuate their title to the service of the tabernacle, and to prevent their latest posterity from being excluded from it. Which when Phinehas and the rest of the deputies heard, they expressed no small satisfaction; and as they related the account of the whole matter upon their return, the people were infinitely pleased with the result of their embassy, and changed their angry thoughts of war into the tender affections of brotherly love and peace: while the Reubenites, on the other hand, to take away all further umbrage of suspicion, called the altar by the name of Ed, as being intended for a standing witness, (for so the word signifies,) that, though they lived at a distance from the rest of their brethren, yet had they both but one origin, and one God, who was the common God and father of all Israel.

Thus were the Israelites, on both sides of the river Jordan, settled in a quiet possession of their conquests: when Joshua, being now grown old, and perceiving the time of his death approaching, called a general assembly of the princes and magistrates, and as many of the common people as could be got together upon this occasion, to Shechem; and having, in a very tender and affectionate speech, enumerated the many blessings which God's providence had bestowed upon them and their ancestors; how he had preserved them in all their dangers and distresses, and relieved them in all their wants; and had made them victorious over all their enemies, and from a mean beginning, raised them to the highest degree of reputation, and brought them into the quiet possession of a land that abounded with all manner of plenty; in gratitude to so great a protector and benefactor, he exhorted them to a faithful observance of his laws, and invited them to a solemn renewal of the covenant which their forefathers had made with him. Which when they had done, he not only recorded the covenant in the book of the law, but

Eleazar the high priest: and if any one shall contradict his sentence, or withdraw from his allegiance, it shall be lawful for any one to kill that man, and the whole congregation shall be blameless."

^a Gilead, which took its name from Gilead the son of Machir, and grandson of Manasseh, is often put for the whole country that lies on the east side of Jordan, which the children of Israel took from the Moabites, Midianites, &c.

^b Josephus makes Phinehas the speaker upon this occasion, who delivers his commission in words to this effect:—"We are very sensible that the crime charged upon you at present is too heinous to be punished by words only; but we have not taken up arms, hand over head, to execute a vengeance according to the degree of the iniquity. For it is out of respect to our allies, and in hopes that second and sounder thoughts may bring you to better reason, that we are engaged upon this embassy, and speak in this assembly. We do but desire to be sincerely informed, upon what motives, and with what design you have now raised this altar. If you have done it out of any pious end, we have no quarrel with you; but if you are gone over to a false worship, it is for our God, and our religion, that we must draw our swords against you. We speak our fears; for we cannot think it credible yet, that a people so well instructed in the will and in the laws of God, our friends and allies that we have but just now parted with; a people newly established in the lot of a plentiful possession by God's special grace and providence; we cannot, I say, believe you to be so insensible and unmgrateful, as to abandon the holy tabernacle, the ark, the altar, and the worship of your forefathers, to join with the Canaanites in the worship of false gods. Or, if unhappily you should have been so misled, do but repent, and disclaim your error, and return to that reverence you owe to the laws of God, and of your country, and you shall be still received," &c.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 5. c. 1.

^c If we can suppose any truth in the Samaritan tradition, Nepheli, who is said to have been Joshua's lieutenant over the two tribes and a half, may very properly be thought the person who answered Phinehas in these words, which Josephus thus puts in his mouth:—"We are not conscious of having ever departed from our alliance, neither are we, in any sort, guilty of that allegation of novelty, in erecting this altar, which is now charged upon us. We know but one God, and that God is the God of all the Hebrews; and but one altar, which is the brazen altar before the tabernacle. As for this altar here, which we are suspected for, it was never intended for any religious use, but only for a civil memorial to future times of our friendship and alliance, and rather to keep us steady in our ancient religion, than to be any ways introductive to the violation of it. We causally appeal to God, that we had no such thought in setting up this altar as is imputed to us: and therefore let us intreat you to have a better opinion of your brethren for the future, than to think us guilty of so mortal an apostasy from the rights and customs of our progenitors, a sin not to be expiated in any of the sons of Abraham, but with the loss of his life."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 5. c. 1.

set up a great stone likewise, under an oak, near a place of religious worship, as a testimony against them, in case they should prevaricate from God's service; and being now in the 110th year of his age, ^a not long after this he died, and was buried at Timnath-serah, in Mount Ephraim, a place which the Israelites, in acknowledgment of his great services, had given him. ^b

In a short time after, Eleazar the son of Aaron, the priest, who lived near Joshua, and died soon after him, was buried not far from him, in one of the hills of Ephraim, ^c a place which the Israelites had in like man-

^a Jesus the son of Sirach gives us a long commendation of Joshua, (Eccles. xvi. 1.) &c.; but Josephus is more concise in his character, where he tells us,—"That he was a man of political prudence, and endued also with a singular felicity of popular eloquence in expressing his thoughts; brave and indefatigable in war; and no less just and dexterous in peace; and, in short, that he was a person qualified for all great purposes." He is generally reputed to be the author of the book that goes under his name. In the 26th verse of the last chapter it is expressly said, that "he wrote these things," (Eccles. xvi. 1.) The son of Sirach has made him successor to Moses in the prophetic ministry. And both the church and synagogue have all looked on the book as canonical. The truth is, Joshua was the only sacred penman we know of that the Israelites had in his age. After he had finished the division of the land, it is said, chap. xxiii. 1. that he had many years of great leisure, which he very probably employed in giving an account of the death and burial of Moses, and from thence continued a narrative of what had been transacted under his own administration, filling it up with a general terrier of the settlements of the tribes, which was highly expedient for the Israelites to have recorded, in order to prevent confusion about their inheritances in future ages. Now if this supposition be right, the work of Joshua must begin where that of Moses ended, namely at the 31th chapter of Deuteronomy, and ended at the 27th verse of the 24th chapter of Joshua. For as Joshua at the end of Deuteronomy, added an account of Moses' death; so what we find from the 28th verse of the 24th chapter of Joshua to the end of that book, was unquestionably not written until Joshua and all the elders his contemporaries were gone off the stage, and was therefore added to the end of the book of Joshua by some sacred penman, (most probably by Samuel,) who was afterwards employed to record the subsequent state of affairs of Israel.—Stackford's Connection, vol. 3. b. 12; and Patrick's Commentary, on Josh. xxiv. 33. But there is not the like certainty of another book of Joshua's, which the Samaritans preserve with much respect, and make great use of in the support of their pretensions against the Jews; neither can we tell whether Joshua was the author of that prayer which the Jews repeat as oft as they go into the synagogues, and begins thus:—"It is our duty to praise the Lord of the universe, and to celebrate the creation of the world; for he hath not made us like unto the nations of the earth, but hath prepared for us an inheritance infinitely richer and greater, &c.—Wagensail's Fiery Darts of Satan, p. 223; and Calnet's Dictionary, under the word.

^b Josh. xxiv. 30. "And they buried him in the border of his inheritance, in Timnath-serah." This place is in Judges called Timnath-heres, because of the image of the sun engraven on his sepulchre, in memory of that famous day when the sun stood still till he had completed his victory, (chap. x.) This is asserted by several of the Jewish authors. Memorials alluding to particular transactions in the lives of great men, were frequently made use of to adorn their tombs. Tully has recorded concerning Archimedes, that a sphere and a cylinder were put upon his monument.—Patrick in locum.

^c This place is, in the Hebrew called the hill of Phinehas; it being customary in those days for men to call places by the name of their eldest son. But then the question is—To whom did the Israelites give this hill? The most probable answer is, that they gave it to Eleazar; for he being the high priest at the time of the division of the land, they thought proper to give him a peculiar portion, distinct from other cities of the priests, which were all in the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon, and none in the tribe of Ephraim, (Josh. xxii. 9, 17, 19.) And they made choice of this country the rather, that he might be near the tabernacle, which ner presented him with, and which afterwards descended to Phinehas, his son and successor in the priesthood. And as the funerals of these two great men, so near the same time and place, called to remembrance the bones of Joseph, which, at his request, ^d had been brought out of Egypt, but not yet interred: the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh took this opportunity to perform their obsequies to the remains of their great progenitor, in a parcel of ground near Shechem, which Jacob having formerly bought, had ^e given to his son Joseph, and was now become the inheritance of his posterity.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

² "Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? Who is like unto thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? Thou, in thy mercy, hast led forth the people, whom thou hast redeemed; thou hast guided them in thy strength, unto thy holy habitation. The people shall hear and shall be afraid; sorrow shall take hold on the inhabitants of Palestina. The elders of Edom shall be amazed; the mighty men of Moab shall tremble, and all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away. Fear and dread shall fall upon them. By the greatness of thine arm they shall be still as a stone, till thy people pass over, O Lord till thy people pass over, whom thou hast purchased: thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for them to dwell in; in the sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hand hath established."

These words are part of that triumphant song, which Moses made upon the destruction of the Egyptians in the Red Sea. They are plain predictions of what befell the Israelites forty years after, and a declaration they are, that the conquest of their country, was not only by the order and appointment, but by the immediate help and assistance of God; ³ "for," as the Psalmist expresses it, "they got not the land in possession through their own sword, neither was it their own arm that helped was at Shiloh, and near to Joshua, who lived at Shechem, to be ready on all occasions, to advise him and consult the oracle for him. But then against this there lies an objection, namely, that no Levite or priest was to have any portion in the division of the land; and therefore it is a received opinion among the Jews, that either Eleazar or Phinehas had this inheritance in right of his wife; though we cannot see why the high priest especially, who was certainly the second person in the government, might not have a mansion-house, and some domains allotted him, for the greater state and dignity of his living, without any great infringement upon the general laws.—Patrick's Commentary on Joshua xxiv. 33.

^d It may reasonably be thought, that the bodies of the rest of the sons of Jacob, from whom the twelve tribes descended, were brought into Canaan, to be there interred, as Josephus relates from ancient tradition, Antiquities b. 2. c. 1; and as St Stephen confirms it, (Acts vii. 16.) For though Joseph excelled them in all dignity, and gave this special charge about his body, yet every tribe, no doubt, had as great a regard for their progenitor, and would be inclined to do the same for their fathers, that Joseph's descendants did for him; but whether they buried them in the sepulchre of Machpelah, or in some eminent place in their own tribe, as Joseph was, there is no one that gives us any account.—Patrick's Commentary on Joshua xxiv. 32.

them; but thy right hand, and thine arm and the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour unto them.⁷ And if God so immediately concerned himself in the conquest of the country, we need not wonder, that we hear of the people who were to defend it, being amazed, and trembling, and melting away for fear. The Jewish doctors have a tradition, that the vast heaps of waters, piled upon one another, while the Israelites passed over the river Jordan, being seen by the people of Jericho, and other adjacent places, occasioned so general a consternation that they never once thought of maintaining the pass. And indeed their consternation must have been very great, when we find them inclosing themselves within their walls, and suffering the Israelites to surround them seven days successively, without even once attempting to make a sally. They saw, in short, that a power, superior to all human opposition, was engaged against them; and therefore whatever prior measures they had taken for their mutual defence, upon the approach of an army commanded by one, who, when he pleases,¹ maketh the devices of the people ineffectual, and casteth out the counsels of princes,² they were all broken and disconcerted.

It cannot be denied, indeed, but that in ancient times, there was a great affinity between the business of an hostess and an harlot. Those who kept inns, or public houses for the entertainment of strangers, made no scruple of prostituting their bodies; and for this reason perhaps it is, that, in the Hebrew tongue, there is but one word, namely, zonah, to denote persons of both professions. For this reason very likely it was, that the Septuagint, speaking of Rahab, gives her the appellation of an harlot, and, as the Septuagint was at this time the common translation of the Jews, for this very reason, the two apostles,³ St Paul, and St James, as they found it in the translation, might make use of the same expression. It is to be observed, however, that as the expression is capable of another sense, the Chaldee paraphrast calls her by a word, which comes from the Greek πανδοχευτρια, or, a woman that kept a public house, without any work of infamy; and therefore charity should incline us to think the best of a person, whom both these apostles have ranked with Abraham, the father of the faithful, and propounded as an example of faith and good works; who was admitted into the society of God's people; married into a noble family of the tribe of Judah; and of whose posterity Christ, the Saviour of the world, was born.

To save the lives of the innocent is certainly a very commendable thing; but whether it may be done by the help of dissimulation and falsehood, or whether Rahab, in concealing the spies, and pretending to the king's messengers, that they were just gone, did not incur the sin of wilful lying, is a question not so very easy to be resolved. Men, as they are members of a civil society, have certainly a right to truth, and the very design of speech is to be the conveyance of our real sentiments to one another; but some casuists are of opinion, that circumstances may so happen, as to make it both lawful and necessary, not only to disguise the truth, but to impose upon others by a false information. Suppose a madman, for instance, with a drawn sword in his hand, should pursue a friend of mine, with a full intent to kill him; and my friend, by the benefit of some short turning, gives him the drop, so that, having lost sight of him, he comes and demands of me, which way he took; but I, instead of setting him right, point the assassin another way; in this case, I presume, I commit no crime, because the man, in these circumstances, has forfeited all right to truth; nor could I indeed impart it to him, without making myself instrumental to my friend's murder. This, in a great measure, was Rahab's case. Her design was to save the spies from the hands of those that were sent to apprehend them; but in vain had she formed such a design, unless she was resolved to put it in execution; and yet, what other way had she of executing it, but by telling a lie? It had been to no purpose for her to have hid them on the roof of her house, if, for the sake of truth, she had thought herself obliged to discover the place of their concealment; if her silence had given any umbrage of suspicion to their pursuers; if she had not, in short, by a bold assertion, diverted their inquiry some other way. In this case the design, and the means of executing it were inseparable. And yet, since a design, which could no ways be executed without the help of a lie, is both praised and proposed in the Scripture, as a pattern for the church to imitate, what right have we to condemn it? Or, upon what presumption can we imagine, that Rahab would have acted more agreeably to the mind of God, in discovering the spies out of respect to truth, than she did, in preserving them by virtue of a feigned story?⁴ But there is another way of accounting for Rahab's conduct, and that is this:⁵ The author of the epistle to the Hebrews informs us, that⁵ 'by faith she perished not with them that believed not, when she had received the spies with peace; where the Greek words are not τοις απιστοις, with the unbelievers, but τοις απειθοσασιν, with the disobedient, or those that were not persuaded of the truth of what was told them. But how the inhabitants of Jericho can be said to be unconvinced or disobedient, if God had revealed nothing to them, or required nothing of them, we cannot conceive. Some information must have been given both to them and Rahab, otherwise they could not be condemned for disobedience, nor she commended for her faith, that is, for believing and acting according to the will of God, made known unto her. Upon the supposition, then, that the design of God towards the inhabitants of Canaan was some way or other revealed to Rahab married Salmon, a prince of Judah, by whom she had Boaz. Boaz was father of Obed, Obed of Jesse, and Jesse of king David; so that Jesus Christ did not disdain to reckon this Canaanitish woman among his ancestors.—Calmet's Dictionary.

the king and people of Jericho, and both he and they had been sufficiently warned to save themselves from the destruction that was coming upon them, if they would not obey; but if Rahab did and acted conformably to the information that was given her, her whole behaviour will not only stand clear of every criminal imputation, but be highly commendable, and justly deserve a rank among those illustrious patterns which the apostle proposes to our imitation, as being a person justified not only by her faith,¹ but her works likewise, 'when she received the messengers, and sent them out another way.'

The declaration which their kind protectress makes to them,² 'I know that the Lord hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us, and that all the inhabitants of the land faint because of you, for the Lord your God, he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath,' bespeaks the full persuasion of her mind; and therefore, not doubting, but that the Ruler of the universe had an uncontrollable right to dispose of all kingdoms and countries according to his good pleasure, she judged it reasonable 'to obey God rather than man,' and thereupon endeavoured, as much as in her lay, to deliver up the land to the true owners, to those whom God, by his donation, had made its rightful proprietors.

An order from heaven most certainly releases the subject from his allegiance to his prince, and the citizen from the engagement he lies under to those that are of the same society; and therefore Rahab, having such an order, or at least what was equivalent to it, was at full liberty to espouse what party she pleased, and must have been perfidious to God, and forgetful of her own preservation, if she had acted otherwise than she did. For³ even setting aside her faith,^a for which she is so justly commended in the gospel, if she had heard of the destruction of Pharaoh in Egypt, and of the other two kings on the east side of Jordan, the king of Jericho can hardly be supposed to be ignorant of their fate: and therefore it was as natural for her to be terrified at it, and to provide for her safety, as it was for him to make a brave resistance, or perish in the attempt. If therefore what the Scripture seems to intimate be true, namely, that Joshua was obliged to offer peace, before he made use of the sword against any of the Canaanitish nations; it was as lawful for her, or any other subject, to accept this peace, as it was glorious perhaps for a monarch to refuse it. At least we cannot but think, that the refusal of such advantageous terms from an irresistible conqueror, at the risk of being all infallibly massacred by him, for the sake of a king, who, for aught that appears to the contrary, might be a petty tyrant, or for the sake of a people whom fear had rendered incapable of making any tolerable resistance; when perhaps the difference of being under the natural monarch, if he was really such, or the conqueror, was inconsiderable, or, it may be, on the side of the latter: we cannot but think, I say, that such a refusal would have been an instance of patriotism, not to be expected from a Canaanite, and much less from such a young hostess, as Rahab must have been, since we read of her being the mother of Boaz, above thirty years after this. So that, upon the whole, she acted a part that might naturally be expected from her, no ways inglorious in itself, and highly agreeable to the will of God, when she adjoined her-self to those, who, by his almighty arm, were so visibly supported; and abandoned the interests of those, who, upon so many accounts, were very justly devoted to destruction.

What the Spirit says unto the church at Thyatira, 'I gave her space to repent of her fornication, but she repented not; behold, I will cast her into a bed, and them that commit adultery with her into great tribulation, and I will kill her children with death, and give unto every one according to his works,'⁴ is very applicable to the several nations in the land of Canaan. Four hundred years were to intervene between the commencement of the promise to Abraham, and this completion of it; and the reason which God gives for this long delay is, that⁵ 'the iniquity of the Amorites,' and by the Amorites he means all the other nations of Canaan, 'was not yet full: "And⁶ even though," as the author of the book of Wisdom argues, "he could have destroyed them all with one rough word, yet executing his judgments by little and little, he gave them place of repentance, not being ignorant that they were an haughty generation, and that their malice was bred in them, and their cogitation would never be changed." For instead of reforming, the only effect which this delay had, was to make them more confirmed in wickedness, and because⁷ 'this sentence against their evil works was not speedily executed, therefore were their hearts the fuller set in them to do evil.'

What the nature and heinousness of their iniquities were, we may best learn from⁸ the many precautions which God gives his people against them; "for he hated them," as the⁹ same author has drawn up the articles of accusation against them, "for doing most odious works of witchcraft, and wicked sacrifices, for their merciless murdering of children, devouring of man's flesh, and feasting upon blood;" and if we may suppose that God, some way or other, had given these nations sufficient notice of his intended severity against them if they did not repent; had abundant reason to preserve his own people from the infection of the abominations; and before their extirpation was executed, did¹⁰ by his servant Joshua, offer them conditions of peace: though the divine counsels are a secret to us, yet, even upon this face of things, we cannot find any fault with his treatment of them, since when he had given them 'space to repent, and they repented not,' his justice was certainly then at liberty to take what vengeance his divine wisdom should think fit.

And indeed this seems to be one of the reasons why God divided the river for the Israelites, who were to be the instruments of this his vengeance, to pass over, namely, that thereby he might inject a terror into the inhabitants of Canaan, and so facilitate the conquest of their country. On the side of Jordan, the kings of the neighbourhood feared no invasion. The depth of the river, especially at the time of its overflowing, which was in the harvest, when the Israelites¹ passed it, was barrier sufficient, they thought, against all that the Israelites could do. For in those days, pontoons were things never heard of in military expeditions; and the ^a stream is, even at this day, allowed to be too fierce and rapid for any one to swim over: and therefore, as they expected no danger from that quarter, and might for that reason draw out no forces to defend that side of their frontier; so the sacred historian has taken care to inform us, that, ² ‘ when all the kings of the Amorites which were on the side of Jordan westward, and all the kings of the Canaanites which were by the sea, heard that the Lord had dried up the waters of Jordan from before the children of Israel, until they were passed over, their hearts melted, neither was there spirit in them any more.’

And as this miraculous passage could not but fill their enemies with confusion, so it added, no doubt, fresh courage to the Israelites, when they came to consider, that the same God, about forty years before, had wrought the like miracle for them in their passage of the Red Sea; that then he divided the waves,³ to confirm the commission which he had given Moses, and now had parted the stream, to strengthen the authority of his successor, Joshua, and to give them assurance that ⁴ ‘ he would be with the one, as he had been with the other, and empower the latter to make good their possession of ‘ the land of promise,’ even as he had enabled the former to accomplish their deliverance ‘ out of the land of bondage.’

In all rivers whatever, there questionless are some shallower places than ordinary, or some passages, either by boats or bridges, that may be called fords; but that the Jordan, at this time, was either so vastly overflown as to render these fords impassable, or that the Israelites crossed it at places which the enemy never thought of, and where none of these passes were to be found, is pretty evident from the Canaanites making no preparation to defend their coasts on the river side, and from the great consternation we find them in, when once they understood that the Jewish army had got over. For, whatever opinion we, at this distance of time, may have of the matter, they justly inferred, that the suspension of a river’s course could be effected no other way than by a divine power, either immediately acting itself or by the instrumentality of its angels. And though there possibly may be some instances in history, wherein, by the violence of adverse winds, the course of rivers has either been retarded, or ^b driven back; yet as we read of no such wind concerned in this event, the prediction of Joshua, and the promises of God concerning this miracle, the time in which he chose to work it, and the analogy it bears with what before was wrought at the Red Sea; these, and several other circumstances, make this transaction beyond compare, and rank it, not only among those prodigies which very rarely come to pass, but among those stupendous works, which, contrary to the laws of nature, the great Author and Ruler of the universe, for the preservation of his people, and the manifestation of his own glory, is sometimes observed to do.

⁵ ‘ He that is born in thy house, or he that is bought with thy money, must needs be circumcised, and my covenant shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant; and the uncircumcised man-child, whose flesh of his foreskin is not circumcised, that soul shall be cut off from his people: he hath broken my covenant.’ These are the words of the precept, and they seem to be so very urgent and express, that one would really think the ordinance was intended not only for a distinction between Jew and Gentile, but for an institution likewise, to take away the guilt of original sin. And yet, even upon this supposition,⁶ the people’s frequent moving from place to place, the uncertainty of their decampments, and the inconvenience of their travelling, which would make it dangerous for children to be circumcised before a march, might be some apology for their omitting the observation of this rite, even though they had no divine dispensation for it.

⁷ It is one of the general rules among the Jews, that no precept, (always meaning no ceremonial precept, for some precepts there are that were to be observed, even at the expense of their lives,) whose observation occasions death, is to be attended to because the Scriptures say, that ‘ he who observeth these laws shall live,’ not die, ‘ by them.’ But how frivolous soever this reason may be, it is certain, that in case they apprehended any danger from the operation, they carried this dispensation so far, as to exempt the next child from having this ordinance pass upon him, if so be that his brother before him died of the wound which he received in circumcision. And for a farther excuse, they add, that during their

^a That the sacred writings do constantly represent this river as not fordable, except at some particular places, very probably made by art, that the countries on each side may have a freer communication, is plain from the passages to which these several citations, (Josh. ii. 2; Judg. iii. 28, and xii. 5; 2 Kings ii. 14,) do refer. That it was not a poor and inconsiderable stream, such as some have represented it, is evident from the account of Thevenot, (in his Travels, p. 193,) who himself went near the place where the Israelites passed over, and describes it to be ‘ half as broad as the Seine at Paris, very deep, and very rapid;’ which agrees very well with what Maundrell (in his Journey from Aleppo, p. 83) says of it, namely, ‘ That its channel is twenty yards over, deeper than a man’s height, and runs with such a current, that there is no swimming against it:’ and that, whatever the present condition of Jordan may be, it is certain, when the Israelites came into Canaan, it was a much larger river than now it is; for even in Pliny’s time (Natural History, b. 5.) its channel was much larger than what it now runs in, having then the title of Annis Ambitosus; and in the days when Strabo wrote, (according to his Geog. b. 16,) even vessels of burden might navigate in it.—Shuckford’s Connection, vol. 3. b. 12.

Granting that we admit the truth of the poetical story, which would be stretching our belief to its utmost limits: and supposing it possible that the waters of the Jordan, running at such a rapid rate as they are known to do, (see note, pp. 363-4.) could have been kept back by a wind blowing against the course of the stream; it is evident that it would have been impossible for a multitude of men, women, and children, to have marched across in the course of that wind. The simplest way, therefore, is to admit the miracle on the testimony of the inspired writer, and not search for natural causes, which involve us in a labyrinth of difficulties.

sojourning in the wilderness for one crime or other, their forefathers were generally under the divine displeasure, in which condition it would have been a profanation of the sacrament to have administered it.

But then, if the other notion of this ordinance be admitted, namely, that it was no more than a note of distinction between the Israelites and other nations, as the Israelites were now alone in the wilderness, there was no danger of their mixing with others, and consequently less reason for their observation of this distinguishing rite, until they should enter upon the possession of a country where every kind of idolatry surrounded them on all hands.

Thus, whether we look upon the rite of circumcision as a sacrament of initiation into the Jewish church, or a character of distinction only between them and other people, the Israelites might, without the imputation of much guilt, omit the outward observance of it, if so be that they did but attend to what was the true intent and meaning of it, namely, ¹ 'the circumcising the foreskin of their hearts;' ² 'for he is not a Jew (as St Paul excellently argues) who is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision, which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew, who is one inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men, but of God.'

In like manner, the observation of the Sabbath-day was a precept of severe injunction; but whether the destruction of Jericho happened on that day, or any other of the week, as the Israelites were ordered to compass the city for seven days successively, it is certain that one of these days must necessarily have been the Sabbath; and yet we must not suppose that they committed any great offence in what they did, because the same authority which made the law for the observation of it, gave now a full license for the profanation of it. The person who met Joshua, and prescribed the form of the siege of Jericho, by his assumption of divine honours and appellations, was doubtless the same who delivered the law from Mount Sinai: and therefore we need not question but that now he acted in as full power in suspending, since his orders could not be executed without such suspension, as he then did in enjoining the observation of the Sabbath; and it is in allusion, as some imagine, to this very passage, that our blessed Saviour pronounced that maxim in the gospel, ³ 'the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath.'

However this be, it is certain, that before our Saviour's days, the Jews carried the observation of the Sabbath to a great degree of rigour. In the time of the Maccabees, they would not so much as defend themselves against the assault of their enemies on that day, ⁴ but yielded their throats to be cut, rather than stir a hand in their own vindication: whereas this example of their forefathers investing, if not sacking, Jericho on the Sabbath-day, might have taught them, one would think, that in cases of this nature, it was allowable, not only to defend themselves, but to prevent their enemies amoying them, nay even to fall upon and destroy them, whenever a favourable opportunity presented itself on that day.

In the conquest of Jericho, however, some have imagined that rams' horns were not proper materials whereof to make trumpets; that they are not so easily perforated, nor can they ever be brought to make a sound shrill and extensive enough for their particular purposes; and therefore they conceive, that brass or silver, or any other metal, had been more convenient for this use; whereupon ⁵ they derive the word Jobel, in the singular, which we render a ram's horn, not from the Arabic, which signifies a ram, but from Jubal, the name of him who was the first inventor of musical instruments: and according to this sense, the trumpets which the priests upon this occasion used, may be said to have been fashioned according to those which Jubal first invented.^a

This interpretation of the words, which is no bad one, removes all the incongruity that may seem to arise from the matter whereof these trumpets were composed: but then, it is to be considered, that as the first instruments of this kind were probably made of horns, so has the notion of the impossibility of boring a ram's horn been sufficiently confuted by our learned Spencer. The truth is, every one knows, that in the inside of it there is a softer part, which may be drawn out by art; after which it is hollow all the way up, except four or five inches towards the top, part of which is sawed off, to make it broad enough for the mouth, and then the rest is easily bored. But whether there is any foundation for that fancy of the Jews, that these horns were retained in the proclamation of some of their greatest festivals, in memory of Isaac's being rescued from his father Abraham's knife, by the substitution of a ram in his stead, is a point that we leave to the speculations of the curious.

Whatever materials these trumpets were made of, it is impossible to conceive that there should be any power in their sound to demolish cities; and though the noise of a great number of people might be very loud, yet still it would require a miracle in Joshua to know what the just proportion was between their noise, and the strength of the walls of Jericho, since the least deviation in this respect would have defeated the whole experiment.

What the effect of gunpowder, or of other sulphureous matter fired under ground, or in the bowels of the earth, is, no one that has seen either the springing of a mine, or felt the convulsions of an earthquake, needs be told; but that no stratagem of this kind could be employed in the siege of Jericho, is manifest, because the invention of gunpowder is a novel thing; nor had the Israelites been long enough on the western side of Jordan, to have undermined its walls, even though they had had the secret of some inflammatory stratum, to have lodged under them. On the contrary, the whole process of this siege, if we may so call it, was managed at such a rate, as plainly discovered an expectation of a miracle to be wrought: for had not this been the case, instead of sauntering about the walls for seven days, they should have been working in their trenches, and carrying on their approaches, as we now call it.

The art of war was then but in its infancy; and as the manner of undermining and blowing up the most ponderous bodies, was what the ancients were unacquainted with, so was the battering-ram an invention of a later date than some imagine. ¹ Pliny indeed seems to say, that Epeus first made use of it at the siege of Troy; but in all probability, ² Ezekiel is the earliest author that mentions this machine, and perhaps the first time that it was employed was under Nebuchadnezzar, at the siege of Jerusalem.

But there is no need to ransack history for the confirmation of this system, which ³ they who propose it do nevertheless acknowledge, that though the walls of Jericho might have fallen without any extraordinary act of divine power, yet by the circumstances of the whole account, it appears that this event was altogether miraculous. Nor should Joshua's denouncing an anathema over the vanquished city be thought a thing unprecedented, or a token of a furious and implacable spirit, since the like practice has been observed by some of the greatest generals of other nations; forasmuch as ⁴ Agamemnon, after he had taken Troy, denounced a curse upon those who should, at any time, attempt to rebuild it; the Romans published a decree of execration against them who should do the like to Carthage; and when ⁵ Crassus had demolished Sidon, which had been a lurking-place to the tyrant Glaucias, he wished the greatest evils imaginable upon the head of that man who should but so much as build a wall about the place where it once stood.^a

Of all the questions in the Jewish schools, there is none more difficult than what we are to understand by the Urim and Thummim, which Moses takes notice of as something belonging to the attire of the high priest, and which enabling him to give responses to such as, by his mediation, came to consult God. ⁶ The two words are variously translated; but in the main, all the translations amount much to the same purport; and as this sacred thing, be it what it will, was to be placed on the high priest's breast, it very properly reminded him of the great qualifications requisite in those of his order; light, or sufficiency of spiritual knowledge; and perfection, or the virtue and sanctity of his life.

The general opinion indeed is, that this Urim and Thummim were one and the same thing. But an ingenious writer of our own nation, conceives them to be two different oracles, and applied to different purposes; that Urim was the oracle whereby God gave answer to those who consulted him in difficult cases, and Thummim, that whereby the high priest knew whether God did accept the sacrifice or no; that therefore the former is called 'light,' as giving knowledge, which dispels the darkness of our minds; and the other 'integrity,' or 'perfection,' because they whose sacrifices God accepted, were accounted Thummim, that is, 'just and righteous in his sight:' in short, that by the former, the Jews were ascertained of the counsel or will of God; by the latter, of his favour and good acceptance. But this distinction has not met with a general approbation, because, however there may be ⁸ passages where the one is mentioned without the other, yet in this case, the one, which is generally the Urim, may well enough be supposed to include both.

The Jewish doctors are mostly of opinion, that the Urim and Thummim were nothing else but the precious stones, which were set upon the breastplate; and that ⁹ by the shining or protuberating of the letters in the names of the twelve tribes, engraven upon the twelve stones, the high priest when he came to consult God, could read the answer: but in this opinion there are some difficulties hardly to be surmounted. For besides that all the letters in the Hebrew alphabet are not to be found on the pectoral, since there are four, namely, Heth, Teth, Zade, and Koph, manifestly wanting; ¹⁰ the question is, by what rules the high priest could make a combination of these letters, supposing there were enough of them, and so put them together, as to spell out the divine oracle; because it is not pretended that these letters moved out of their places, but only swelled, or raised themselves above the rest? Suppose, for instance, that any six of these letters should have swelled, or shone with a more than ordinary lustre, yet how should the high priest know to dispose of them in right order, and which should be first, and which last? If it be said—By the spirit of prophecy; this vacates all the necessity of the Urim and Thummim; because a prophetic spirit would teach him what he desired to know, without any farther assistance.

^a All these cvents were long posterior to the destruction of Jericho, and though they had not, the conduct of Agamemnon or Crassus could have served nothing to the vindication of Joshua. The case appears to have been this,—Jericho was taken and destroyed in so singular a manner that it seems to have been the wish of the Hebrew leader, approved by God, to preserve a memorial of one of the greatest miracles that were wrought for Israel, by leaving the ruins of the city as a monument, to the latest posterity, of the power of the God of Israel, and his hatred of polytheism, and of such vices as sprang from polytheism, and were practised in Jericho. Accordingly Joshua adjured the elders of the people, or made them bind themselves by a solemn oath, to leave the ruins of the city as a perpetual warning to their posterity of the consequences of idolatry and vice; and to give additional sanctity to the oath, he pronounced a curse upon any one of them or their descendants, by whom it should be violated. The sacred records indeed inform us, that the Jews borrowed of the Egyptians 'jewels of silver, and gold, and raiment:' but they nowhere intimate, that the Jewish high priest borrowed his pontifical, and particularly his oracular habit, from them; and therefore to think that God who declares himself so positively against the idolatrous practice of the Gentiles, should, by these images of pagan invention, take the ready way to give them countenance and encouragement; or to think, that the Jews, who were expressly commanded not to 'learn the way of the heathen,' and 'after the doings of the land of Egypt, where they had dwelt, not to do;' were permitted, nay, commanded to make use of this magical and superstitious rite, is such a heap of odd and wild conceits, as no unprejudiced mind can ever entertain.

Others therefore are of opinion, that it was the tetragrammaton, or ineffable name of God; and others, that it was no more than the two plain words Urim and Thummim, written or engraved on some plate of gold or precious stones, which, when placed upon the pectoral, would give it an oracular power: ² but the most probable opinion is, that it was no corporeal thing at all, but only a certain virtue, which God was pleased to give to the breastplate, at its consecration, of obtaining an oracular answer from him, whenever the high priest should put it on in order to ask counsel of him, in the manner that he had appointed; and that the names of Urim and Thummim were given it, only to denote the clearness and perspicuity which those answers of God had, namely, that they were not like the heathen oracles, enigmatical and ambiguous, but plain and manifest, and such as never fell short of perfection, either in the fulness of the answer, or the certainty of the truth of it.

Whether this oracle was only consulted in the great and important affairs of the state, or might be advised with in questions of a low nature, is not entirely determined by the learned; but the most prevailing opinion is, that the high priest, who was the only officiating minister in this ceremony, was not allowed to address it for any private person, but only for the king, the president of the sanhedrim, the general of the army, or some other public governor in Israel; and that not upon private affairs, but such only as related to the public interest of the nation, whether in church or in state.

When therefore any such matter happened, wherein it was necessary to consult God, the custom was for the high priest to put on his robes and breastplate, and so present himself, not within the veil of the holy of holies, for thither he never entered but once a year, on the great day of expiation, but without the veil in the holy place, and there standing with his face directly towards the ark, or mercy-seat, whereon the divine presence rested, he propounded the matter; and at some distance behind him, but without the holy place, stood the person for whom the oracle was consulted, in devout expectation of the answer, which (as ³ it seems most congruous to the thing) was given him in an audible voice from the mercy-seat, which was within behind the veil.

Here it was that Moses went to ask counsel of God in all cases; and from hence he was answered in an audible voice: and in like manner, when the high priest presented himself before God, according to the prescription of the divine law, it is reasonable to believe, that God gave him an answer in the same way that he did Moses, that is, by an audible voice from the mercy-seat: and for this reason it is, that such address for counsel is called 'inquiring at the mouth of God,' and the holy of holies (the place where the mercy-seat stood, and from which the answer was given) is so often in scripture styled, 'the oracle;' because from thence were the oracles of God delivered to such as came to ask counsel of him.

"Such was the standing oracle which the Israelites might have had recourse to upon all important occasions; and if, in their league with the Gibeonites, they were too hasty and precipitate, their unadvisedness is only to be blamed, and not the insufficiency of that means which God had appointed for their better information. The short of the matter is, the pretended foreign ambassadors drew them in by a wile and artifice. The story of their old shoes and mouldy bread was so well contrived, and seemed so very plausible, that they took the thing for granted, as we say. ⁵ 'They took of their victuals,' as the text expresses it, or received them without any farther inquiry, upon the account of the staleness of their provision, and ⁶ 'asked not counsel of the mouth of the Lord;' and therefore, no wonder that God should suffer them to be outwitted, when they had an infallible director so near at hand; and yet in a matter of such moment as that of entering into a national treaty, never once bethought themselves to consult him.

But there was a greater error in their conduct with relation to the Gibeonites. The orders and directions which God gave them, when they entered into a state of war, were to this effect—⁷ That to all cities which, upon their summons surrendered to them, they were to give quarter; to save their lives, but at the same time to make them their slaves and tributaries; but that to such as slighted their summons, and stood upon their defence, they were not to use the same treatment. If they were a distant nation, or not belonging to the country of a The Jewish doctors think, that the custom of consulting God by Urim and Thummim continued no longer than under the tabernacle: for it is a maxim among them, that the Holy Spirit spake to the children of Israel by Urim and Thummim, while the tabernacle lasted; under the first temple, that is, the temple of Solomon, by the prophets; and under the second temple, or after the captivity of Babylon, by the hath-eol, or daughter of the voice, by which they mean a voice sent from heaven, such as was heard at our Saviour's baptism and transfiguration, (Mat. iii. 17.) Our learned Spencer seems to have adopted this opinion, and endeavours to support it by these arguments, namely: That the Urim and Thummim were a consequence of the theocracy of the Hebrews; for while the Lord immediately governed his people, it was necessary, that there should always be a means at hand, whereby to consult him upon affairs that concerned the common interest of the whole nation; but since the theocracy ceased, when the kingdom became hereditary in the person and family of Solomon, and the interest of the nation ceased to be common, after the division of Israel into two monarchies, the oracles of the Urim and Thummim must necessarily cease. And accordingly, if we consult the sacred history, we shall meet with no foot-steps of this applying to God, from the building of Solomon's temple, to the time of its destruction; and after its destruction, all are agreed, that this oracle was never restored again.—Spencer De Urim et Thummim, c. 2.

Canaan, upon their taking any place, they were to put the men only to the sword, sparing the women, and children, and other living creatures that were found in it; but if they were a neighbouring, or Canaanitish state that stood out and resisted, they were to destroy all without exception; and save alive nothing that breathed. In the whole, however, there was this injunction, that of what country soever the people were, and whether they resisted or resisted not, the Israelites were to make no¹ 'covenant with them, nor with their gods;' and the reason hereof is this,—² That as a league between two nations implies, in the very notion of it, their having upon some terms given their faith to each other, to observe punctually what had been stipulated between them; and as, when such public faith was given and taken, the parties to the treaty swore solemnly to each other by their respective gods; the Israelites, who looked upon the gods of these nations as vanity and nothing, who were obliged to³ 'overthrow their altars, burn their groves, hew down their images, and utterly extirpate their religion, were totally debarred from entering into any treaty or alliance with them, because they could not recognise their idols as gods, nor take any public faith from the worshippers of them. For so the people seem to say to the Gibeonites, at their first coming into the camp to propose a treaty, 'peradventure you dwell among us,'⁴ 'are some of those neighbouring nations, whom we are ordered to destroy, whose gods we are to drive out, and whose country we are come to take possession of,'⁵ 'and how shall we make a league with you?' 'The interdiction we are under will not permit us; and therefore, if you pretend to impose upon us in this matter, the covenant of course is null and invalid;' and so in reality it was.

It is reasonable, however, to imagine, that after the fraud of the Gibeonites was discovered, the princes of Israel might reflect upon their neglect, in not consulting the divine oracle before; and as the peace, which they had entered into was plainly repugnant to God's command of exterminating all the Canaanites, the question was, what they should do in this case? whether abide by the treaty, and so postpone the command; or execute the command, and so disannul the treaty? The whole stress of the question turns upon this,—⁶ Whether God commanded the Israelites to destroy all the people of Canaan absolutely, and without exception; or whether he allowed them to spare such as voluntarily submitted themselves, and came to implore their pity and protection? The words of the injunction in this case are full, and express enough: ⁷ 'When thou goest nigh unto a city to fight against it, then proclaim peace unto it, and if it make thee answer of peace, and open unto thee, then shall all the people that are found therein be tributaries to thee, and shall serve thee. Thus shalt thou do unto all the cities which are very far off from thee, and which are not of these Canaanitish nations. But of the cities of these people, which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth, but shalt utterly destroy them, that they teach thee not to do all their abominations, which they have done to their gods.' But here some great writers have observed, that this utter extinction of the Canaanitish nations, considering the reasons that are given for it, both here and⁸ elsewhere, is to be looked upon⁹ as a permission, rather than a positive command, and should, at least,¹⁰ be understood with this limitation: 'unless they immediately submitted, renounced their idolatry, and did every thing that was enjoined them.' And to this purpose¹¹ the Jews have a tradition, that Joshua, before he declared war against the seven nations, wrote letters to them, wherein he offered them three conditions,—that if they were minded to depart, they should quit the country immediately; if they were desirous to make peace, they should come and treat with the Israelites; but that if they intended to fight it out, they might betake themselves to their arms: and they farther add, that the first of these conditions the Gergashites embraced, and fled into Egypt; the second the Gibeonites accepted, and made a league with Joshua; and the third the confederate kings made their choice, when they took up arms against the Israelites, and were all defeated.

But this is no more than a bare hypothesis, invented on purpose to solve the difficulty, and seems not to have near so good a foundation as that which supposes that the princes of Israel, remembering their former omission, and their insecurity in acting upon their own bottom, might, in this perplexity, have recourse to God for advice, and that this answer might be, 'that the league should be ratified.' Of this indeed we have no express mention in Scripture; but in so short a history of such a variety of transactions as that of Joshua is, we may well imagine, that several circumstances may be omitted. For that some such ratification of this treaty was determined by God, we have great presumption to believe,¹² from the severe punishment which he afterwards inflicted upon the Israelites, and the posterity of Saul, for his having slain some of the descendants of these Gibeonites, not improbably¹³ at the sacking of the town of Nob. For though this action of Saul's was cruel and inhuman, because the decree for the extirpation of the Canaanites was now extinct; yet what made it more heinous and provoking to God, was the infraction of the treaty, which had subsisted about four ages, and which cost the lives of seven of that bloody prince's sons and grandsons to atone.

The heathens, it must be owned, had no small respect and veneration for oaths: whenever they took one, it was in the most solemn and religious manner.¹⁴ They looked upon the gods as inspectors and witnesses of what they said, more especially at such a time as this. They believed that the furies were appointed to be avengers of all perjury; and that as¹⁵ disgrace attended it in this world, so destruction would pursue it in the next. And as this was the general notion of most heathen nations, so the Gibeonites, who had hitherto conceived a good opinion of the God of Israel, would have been strangely scandalized, had they found his people prevaricating with their oaths, even though they were made upon a false supposition. For fear, therefore, lest any dishonour should fall ultimately upon that divine Majesty whose servants they were, the princes of the congregation unanimously agree, and there seems to be something of a divine inspiration in this their unanimity, and declare it as their joint opinion, 'We have sworn unto them, by the Lord God of Israel,' and therefore without breaking our oath, or forfeiting his favour, 'we may not touch them.'

It was the same commendable zeal for the honour of God, that made the Israelites on one side of Jordan conceive such angry resentments against their brethren on the other, upon suspicion that they had apostatized from his worship into the idolatry of the nations that were round about them. The two tribes and a half, upon their return from the wars, erected an altar, in memory of their relation to the tribes and tabernacle which they had left behind them.² This altar, it seems, was of an height somewhat extraordinary; and as it was the custom for heathens to worship their gods, which were generally celestial bodies, upon high places, as presuming that thereby they made nearer approaches to them; their brethren on the west side of the river conjectured from thence, that this was an altar raised for the worship of the sun, or some other planetary god. But if even they were mistaken in that conjecture, sufficient reason they had to suspect that it was intended for no good purpose, since God had expressly forbidden them to offer their sacrifices at any other place but the tabernacle, or upon any other altar but that which was built by his appointment: for these are directions which Moses gives them: 'Ye are not yet come to the rest, and to the inheritance which the Lord your God giveth you: but when you shall be put in possession of it, ye shall not do after all these things, that we do here this day, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes: but in the place which the Lord shall choose, in one of thy tribes, there shalt thou offer thy burnt-offerings; thither shalt thou come, and there shalt thou do all that I command thee.'

Now when they had sufficient reason, as they thought, to suspect their brethren of a defection into idolatry, what should they do? Why, herein they punctually follow the rules which God himself had prescribed them in such a case: 'If thou shalt hear say, in one of thy cities which the Lord thy God hath given thee to dwell there, saying, Certain men, the children of Belial, are gone out from among you, and have withdrawn the inhabitants of their city, saying, Let us go, and serve other gods, (which ye have not known,) then shalt thou inquire, and make search, and ask diligently; and behold, if it be truth, and the thing certain, that such abomination is wrought among you, thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword; destroying it utterly, and all that is therein, and the cattle thereof, with the edge of the sword; and thou shalt gather all the spoil of it into the midst of the street thereof, and shalt burn with fire the city and all the spoil thereof, every whit, for the Lord thy God; and it shall be a heap for ever, it shall not be built again.' And if the Israelites on the west of Jordan, having this cause of suspicion, pursued these orders to a tittle, who shall say that they did amiss, or that their zeal for God's glory was rash and precipitate? They took the properest method, which was sending an embassy, for the discovery of the truth; and if, upon inquiry, their fears were found to be groundless, yet it seems to be an error on the better side, as we commonly say, and an instance of no contemptible prudence, in matters of so dangerous a consequence, always to suspect the worst.

It may be doubted perhaps, whether the Israelites were a people of the greatest bravery in the world, but it may truly be said, that there was no necessity for their being so; because, upon all occasions they had the Lord of hosts to protect them, and to fight their battles for them. Supported by his aid,³ how did one of them chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, except their rock had sold them, and the Lord had shut them up?⁴ But when this was the case, no wonder at all, that 'the hearts of the people melted away and became like water.'

The short of the story was this,—They had all along hitherto been victorious; had subdued a country beyond Jordan; passed that river, and conquered the capital of the adjacent province by miracle: and now having sent out a party to summon a small place to surrender, upon the first sally that the inhabitants make, they are all on a sudden seized with a panic, forget their courage, and flee, without so much as striking a stroke. This they could not but perceive was the effect of God's displeasure, and therefore, considering themselves in an enemy's country, they had just reason to dread, that if God should desert them in this situation of their affairs, the people of the land, hearing the report of their defeat, would come, and, as Joshua expresses it,⁵ 'environ them round, and cut off their name from the earth.'

Good reason therefore had the Israelites to be disconsolate, when they found that God, to whom they owed all their valour and victories, had forsaken them. But in the mean time, how did they behave upon this occasion? Why 'they fell to the earth upon their knees,' in humble supplication to God for mercy; they continued all the day long in fasting and praying, and expressed their sorrow, and the sense of their unworthiness with the usual tokens of grief. And was not this better than to become obdurate under God's afflicting hand, as were the Egyptians? Nay, was not this the very behaviour by which the Ninevites moved the divine mercy to reverse the sentence of excision that had gone out against them? So that, all things considered, the Israelites, in this regard are not to be blamed: since they who had lost 'the rock of their might,' and had 'the terrors of the Lord set in array against them, were far from fearing where no fear was.'

And in like manner, if to the reasons we have already alleged for their conduct at Jericho, we add this one consideration, namely, that they were just now entering upon their conquests; that this was the first city they had manner:—"Joshua did not think fit to break the peace which he had granted, because it was confirmed by the awful solemnity of an oath, lest, whilst he was blaming the perfidiousness of others, he himself should be worse than his word, and forfeit his own honour."—De Officiis, b. 3, c. 10.

taken on the west side of Jordan; and that the people they had to contend with, were to be terrified into submission rather than entreated, we cannot but be of this opinion, that an example or two of high severity, at the first setting out, was no less than necessary to reduce the country more speedily, and with a less effusion of blood; as well as to verify the promise of him who appointed them: ¹ 'This day will I begin to put the dread of thee, and the fear of thee upon the nations that are under the whole heaven, who shall hear report of thee, and shall tremble and be in anguish because of thee.'

Without entering therefore into any farther vindication of the Jewish nation, we may safely say, that in the cases we have had under consideration, they were neither zealous nor timorous, nor cruel without a cause; that in the first of these cases, they expressed their concern for God's honour; in the second their dread of his departing from them; and in the third, their obedience to his command.

It is a law of God's own enacting, that ² 'the fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers, but every man shall be put to death for his own sin:'³ but then we are to consider, that this law was given to man, and not to God, who has certainly a more absolute right and sovereignty over men, than one man has over another. That as the Israelites at this time lived under a theocracy, and in a proper sense had God for their civil governor, every wilful transgression, such as Achan's was, must have been deemed, not only a violation of the divine command, but a crime of lese majesty likewise; and that in crimes of this kind, the practice of all ^a governments, ancient as well as modern, has been, to make children suffer for the iniquity of the parent, (as in cases of attain of blood, and confiscation of estate,) and that with the reputation of the highest equity. Upon the supposition then that Achan's family were not accessory to their father's crime, yet God who gave them life, had undoubtedly a full power to take it away, at what time, or in what manner he thought fit; and if in cases of high treason among men, it is thought reasonable to devolve some part of the parent's penalty upon the children, there is this farther argument why Achan's family should be made to suffer with him, because God could not express his severity against sin, nor take their lives away, at a more convenient opportunity than in the beginning of a new empire, and when each man's right and property was going to be settled; that such a dreadful example of his indignation against stealth might deter others, if not for their own, at least for their dear children's sake, to abstain from such dangerous and pernicious practices.³ The Jews have a maxim, "That he who is an accomplice in any crime, is as culpable as the person who commits it;" and therefore, if we suppose that Achan's family was privy to what their father had done, and did conceal it, there could be no injustice in including them in the punishment. It may be pretended, perhaps, that some of them were infants, and so must be deemed innocent; but the text says nothing of this: it only calls them ⁴ 'sons and daughters;' and considering that Achan, in all probability, was an old man, as ⁵ being the fifth descendant from Judah, it seems most likely, that his children ⁶ were grown up, and so capable of knowing, and of either concealing or discovering the fact.

But, after all, there is no occasion for our running ourselves into any difficulty. The text does not say, neither is it any way implied, that Achan's sons and daughters were executed with him. In the sentence denounced against him, we find no mention made of them, and why then should we suppose that they were partakers in his punishment, any other ways than as they were brought out to be spectators of it?⁶ And a piercing sight no doubt it was, for persons so nearly related to behold the sad fate of their chief, first stoned to death, and then with all his goods and chattels, as well as those accursed things for which he was condemned, committed to the flames. His oxen, and asses, and sheep, are here taken notice of, to let us see that Achan was a wealthy man, and therefore was inexcusable in committing this fact. And though they were not capable of sin, nor consequently of punishment properly so called; yet as they were made for man's use, they might fairly die for his instruction, namely, to convince him of the sad and contagious nature of sin, which even involves innocent creatures in its plagues; and emblematically to show him, how much sorer punishments are reserved for man, who having a law given for the conduct of his life, and the gifts of reason and will to restrain him from the transgression of it, will adventure upon things forbidden, and thereby contract greater guilt, and draw upon himself severer expressions of the divine wrath.

God indeed styles himself 'The Lord of hosts,' and had so immediate a hand in the conduct of Israel, that every military achievement of theirs might very properly be ascribed to him: but when he ordered Joshua ⁷ 'to go up against Ai, and to lay an ambuscade behind it,' he might, notwithstanding this, leave the whole glory of the invention and execution of it to him as an able and expert general; for if he had always wrought miracles in favour of his people, and left nothing for Joshua to perform, we cannot see how he could have merited the character of an extraordinary man.

In other events, where the whole may be said to be under the guidance of God, he takes care to direct every particular of the transaction. In passing the river Jordan, and surrounding the walls of Jericho, he prescribes the form and order of the people's march, and how, upon every occasion, they were to behave; but here, in the affair of Ai, he contents himself with merely suggesting the means, as things that Joshua was no stranger to, and leaves to him the contrivance and application of them. This stratagem indeed is the first that we find any mention of in Scripture; but we must not from thence infer that there was never any before put in execution. The art of war began very soon, and was carried on, no doubt, with great application. The whole excellence of its management consists in circumventing and doubling upon the enemy with dexterity; and therefore, no question but that the wits of mankind were always employed in taking advantage of each other, and in gaining a victory with the least expense of blood on their own side. ¹ The Romans fell frequently into the snares which were laid for them, because their generals were men of no military skill; and therefore, to excuse their ignorance, they alleged that they made war like honest men, without deceit or artifice. And if Alexander disclaimed the use of stratagems, it was because he knew the cowardice of his enemies, and how easy a matter it was to gain a conquest in a fair and open field. For it is not to be doubted, but that had he been to attack any other nation, except the effeminate Persians, he would have taken his friend Parmenio's advice, and, without blushing at a victory gained by good management, fallen upon his enemy under cover of the night.

(To Brutus, b. 1. Epis. 12.) ^b Bishop Patrick, Dr A. Clarke, and others, take the same view as our author, and it seems to be the correct one. Achan's family were brought out to the valley, that they might see and fear, and be for ever deterred, by their father's punishment, from following his example.—Ed.

However this be, that stratagems are lawful in war we have good presumption to think, from God's directing Joshua to make use of one; and though he does not, as other warriors do, employ any of these at a pinch, or because he cannot accomplish his designs without them; though he could, with one single act of his will, have destroyed the city of Ai, and all the inhabitants thereof, and without suffering his people to strike one blow, have put them in possession of the promised land; yet choosing to act by secondary means, he proceeded in the ordinary way, and leaving a good deal to Joshua's skill and management, assisted him only at some critical conjunctures, that, by a prolongation of the war, the reputation of his people might be raised, and more frequent opportunities occur for the display of his miraculous works.

² Josephus, indeed, seems not to have consulted the honour of Joshua much, when he ascribes the delay of the conquest of Canaan to the weakness of his army, and the impregnable strength of the places he was to attack. But ³ some other Jews make the matter much worse, when they tell us, that he desired to prolong the war, not only to retain the office and dignity of being captain-general, but because he was informed by the oracle, that as soon as the conquest was finished, he himself was to die. God, however, seems to have given us much better reasons for this retardation, when he acquaints Moses with his intention: ⁴ 'I will not drive the Canaanites out from before thee in one year, lest the land become desolate, and the beasts of the field multiply against thee;' and when he complains of their sad defection after the death of Joshua, ⁵ 'I will not henceforth drive out any from before them of the nations which Joshua left when he died, that through them I may prove Israel, whether they will keep the way of the Lord to walk therein, as their fathers did keep it, or no:' whereupon, the historian tells us, that God accordingly 'did leave these nations without driving them out;' and adds another reason for their continuance in the country, namely, that the Israelites, by having an enemy to contend with, might be trained up in the art and mystery of war: for ⁶ 'these are the nations,' says he, 'which the Lord left to prove Israel, that by them they might teach those war, who before knew nothing of it.'

So that here are three reasons given us, why God delayed the entire subjection of Canaan, namely, because the children of Israel were as yet too few in number to replenish the whole country; because God by keeping the Canaanites in being, was willing both to make trial of his people's obedience, and to train them and their posterity, for some ages, up in military discipline and exercise.

But there is another reason which Joshua, in his dying speech, assigns for their not enlarging their conquests to the utmost bounds which God had given them: ⁷ 'Take good heed therefore,' says he, 'unto yourselves, that ye love the Lord your God; else if ye do in anywise go back, and cleave unto the remnants of these nations, even those that remain among you, and shall make marriages with them, and go in unto them, and they to you; know for a certainty, that the Lord your God will no more drive out any of these nations from before you.'

So that the promise which God made to the Israelites was conditional; and as they manifestly falsified their part of the obligation, by engaging first in affinity, and then in idolatry with the nations, which they were bound to destroy; so God might very well think himself released from his, and under no farther concern for their success, or the enlargement of their conquest; ⁸ but as they had been the ministers of his vengeance, in punishing the disorders of the Canaanites, they, in their turn, were now made the instruments of his chastising the disobedience of his own people: ⁹ 'They shall be snares and traps to you, and scourges in your sides, and thorns in your eyes, until ye perish from the good land which the Lord your God hath given you.'

And indeed if we consider how violently, in after ages, the Israelites were opposed by their enemies, and by many battles and captivities, harassed and diminished in their numbers, we shall find no necessity of enlarging their possessions: because the country which they conquered in the first six years, was spacious enough to contain them. ¹⁰ The promise, however, which God made was sufficiently accomplished in the reigns of David and Solomon, when the kingdom of Israel was in its zenith; and though its territories did not extend to the Euphrates, yet its dominion did, since all that tract of land between Jerusalem and that great river was either subdued, or made tributary to them.

Upon the whole therefore it is evident, that the author of the book of Joshua, be he who he will, in the three instances which we have been considering, has left no imputation upon God; forasmuch as though he commanded Achan to be put to death, yet it does not appear that his children suffered with him; or if they did, there is presumption to believe that they were accomplices in his crime: though he ordered the taking of Ai by a stratagem, yet the whole form and contrivance of it he left to the general; and though the Israelites did not actually possess all that he had promised them, yet this was occasioned by their own disobedience and cowardice, and the falsification of those conditions, upon which the full conquest of the land of Canaan was suspended.

There is but one objection more, in the course of this period, which is usually alleged against the sacred history, and that is, the seeming contradiction of the ark's being said to be at Shechem, when it was, in reality, at Shiloh; but in answer to this, some have imagined, that as Joshua was now grown old and infirm, the ark¹ upon this occasion, was removed from Shiloh, the settled place of the divine residence, to Shechem, the place of Joshua's habitation, that he might with greater solemnity, and in the presence of God, whereof the ark was the proper emblem, deliver his charge to the people. But other learned men have observed, that by² 'the sanctuary of the Lord,' we are to understand, not the 'ark of the covenant,' but only some certain place of religious worship, such, very probably, as the Jewish oratories were. That the holy ark was not, on this occasion set up here at Shechem, is evident, they say, from that prohibition given by God,³ 'Thou shalt not plant a grove of any trees near unto the altar of the Lord thy God, which thou shalt make thee, neither shalt thou set up a pillar, which the Lord thy God hateth:' whereas in this sanctuary, we read both of an oak planted, and a pillar, or statue erected under it; which is certainly such a violation of the divine command, as Joshua, upon no occasion, can be supposed capable of incurring.⁴ It is a very probable opinion, therefore, that the place where Joshua set up this monumental pillar, was one of those which the tribe of Ephraim, to whom Shechem belonged, had consecrated, and set apart for a proseucha, or a place to assemble in for public prayer; and that they made choice of this rather than any other, to perform their devotions in, because it was that particular spot where God appeared to Abraham, and promised his posterity the possession of the land of Canaan.

^a That there were such oratories, or places of public

^a Epiphanius, who was a Jew bred, and born in Palestine, speaking of some heretics, (b. 1. hæres. 61.) whom he calls Massalians, and who, according to his account, were neither Jews, Christians, nor Samaritans, but pagans, tells us, that they nevertheless pretended to worship the one true God, and for that purpose had certain open places, which they called proseucha. And that the Jews, as also the Samaritans, had places for religious worship of the same denomination, he proves from the Acts of the Apostles, (chap. xvi. 13.) where Lydia is said to have met St Paul, and to have heard him preach in that place, which 'seemed to be a place of prayer.' There is also at Shechem, which is now called Neapolis, continues he, about a mile without the city, a proseucha, a place of prayer, like a theatre, which was built in the open air, and without a roof, by the Samaritans, who affected to imitate the Jews in all things. Juvenal, in his third satire, describing the manner in which some wild young fellows were wont, in their drunken frolics, to affront and abuse every poor man they met with in the streets in the night time, brings them in speaking thus; "Tell me immediprayer among the Jews, and that they were generally beset, or shaded with trees, is evident from such a variety of testimonies, that it can hardly be contested; but whether they were of so early a date as Joshua's time, or not rather introduced after the captivity of Babylon, is a question not easy to determine. In the main, however, we may conclude, that whether the ark of the covenant was occasionally brought to Shechem, or at Shechem there happened to be such an oratory, as in after ages became frequent in Judea, there can be no incongruity in the sacred penman's saying, that the sanctuary of the Lord (since either the ark or the oratory might merit that name) was at Shechem. There is another solution, however, of this difficulty, which ought not to be disregarded.⁵ Shechem and Shiloh were about twelve miles distant from each other, and in the midway between them, was Timnath-serah, the place where Joshua lived. Since, therefore, the text informs us, that⁶ 'he gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem, and called for their elders, for their heads, for their judges, and for their officers, and they presented themselves before God;' we may reasonably suppose, that though all the people met at Shechem, yet their elders and chief officers only presented themselves before God. That so great a multitude could not meet together, and encamp in any place but where there is a proportionable compass of ground, is a matter self-evident; and that, in the confines of Shechem, there was a large and open country, extending ately in what unprotected niche I will seek you;" whereby he either intimates, that he was some poor wretch, who dwelt in a house that could not keep out wind and weather, but, like the Jewish proseucha, was all open above; or he alludes to the state of the Jews at that time, who were banished out of Rome by Domitian, and had no place of shelter, but their oratories, which were without the walls of the city. For that the Jews had their proseucha about the city of Rome, is evident from that passage in Philo, (de Legatione ad Caium.) wherein he commends the clemency and moderation of Julius Caesar, who knew that the Jews had such places of public worship, where they always assembled on the Sabbath-day, and yet gave them no molestation, as Caius had done. Josephus (in his life, sect. 54.) makes mention of a proseucha at Tiberias in Galilee, and in several places of the New Testament, the same term is made use of in the same signification; (see Mede's Discourse 18.) But then the question is, whether it be not a mistake in some learned men, to apply a usage, that is mentioned at such and such a time, to a people who lived many ages before.

Philo Judeus, (de Legatione ad Caium.) speaking of the barbarous outrage of some Gentiles against the Jews, dwelling then at Alexandria, acquaints us, "That of some of their proseucha, they cut down the trees, and others they demolished to the very foundations." The poet Juvenal alludes to the very same custom of having trees planted where the Jewish oratories were, when, speaking of a fortune-teller of that nation, he thus describes her:—"The trembling Jewess secretly importunes for alms, though she be the interpreter of her country's laws,—the great priestess of the tree—and the faithful ambassadress of high heaven." (Sat. 6.) And in another place, complaining that through the corruption of the times, the once sacred grove of Capena, which had formerly been the habitation of the muses, and the place where Numa was wont to meet the goddess Ægeria, was now let out to the beggarly Jews for a proseucha, his expressions are these:—"Here, where Numa used to meet his mistress by night, are now to be found groves and shrines sacred to the Jews, the whole furniture of which is but a coffer and some hay; for every tree is commissioned to give a hire, and the muses being now expelled from it, the wood is gone a begging." (Sat. 3.) For it is hard to conceive what affinity there should be between Jews and trees, unless it be from the custom, that their oratories were usually shaded with them.

perhaps as far as Shiloh, and very commodious for their reception, we have the attestation of holy writ. But then, since it is impossible for one man to speak to such a number of people and be heard, Joshua very probably singled out the chief and principal of them, such as he foresaw would succeed him in the government after his demise, and these he took with him to Shiloh, a place in the neighbourhood, where was the ark, or sanctuary of the Lord, that he might there, with the greater solemnity, give them his final charge, which they, in their turns, might deliver to their respective tribes.

Thus we have endeavoured to satisfy the several objections, which are usually made against some passages in the sacred history, during the government of Joshua: and if profane testimonies would be of any force, we might produce the accounts which their historians give us of Neptune's drying up the river Inachus, and of Agamemnon's denouncing a curse against any one that should repair Troy, to justify the narrative we have in Scripture of the miraculous passage of Jordan, and the resentment and indignation which Joshua conceived against Jericho. The ancient Hercules was certainly the same with Joshua. He is said to have waged war in behalf of the gods, against Typhœus, and the rest of the giants of old, even as Joshua fought the battles of the Lord against the inhabitants of Canaan, men of a vast stature, and at that time under the displeasure of heaven. In conformity to the sacred record of God's destroying the confederate army of the Amorites with hailstones, the ancient heathens say, that Hercules was thus assisted in his war against the sons of Neptune; and Plutarch, in his life of Timoleon, tells us, that a terrible storm of hail, in the face of the Carthaginian army, gave him, though he had but very few forces to encounter them, a complete victory over them. The sun standing still is no new story. Callimachus ^a represents him as stopping the wheels of his chariot to hear the melody of a chorus of nymphs, wherewith he was so delighted, that it made him prolong the day: and though they are mistaken in the cause, yet the ancient poets discover a tradition of this miraculous event, ^b when they describe the heaven's blushing, and the sun's standing still at the sight of the unnatural murder which Atreus committed. For if Statius mistake not, this bloody fact happened in the time of the Theban war, which, according to the best chronologists, was much about the time of Joshua's conquest of Canaan. But even supposing Statius, or any other author from whom he took the hint, are mistaken in their chronology, ^c the time of Phaeton's life, whose story of misguiding the chariot of the sun, is supposed to take its rise from hence, will synchronize with the year of the sun's standing still in the days of Joshua. So that, as to the most wonderful transactions which in this space of time we meet with in holy writ, God has not left himself without a witness; forasmuch as the heathen writers, though with some variation or disguise, according to the humour of their mythologists, are known to relate the same things.

CHAP. III.—Of the Shower of Stones, and the Sun's standing still.

OF all the miraculous things that happened in Joshua's wars with the people of Canaan, the shower of stones which God sent upon his enemies, while they fled, and the stop which he put to the course of the sun, that he might have a longer space to destroy them in their flight, are the most remarkable, and do therefore deserve a more particular consideration.

The former of these events the sacred history represents in this manner.—¹ 'And it came to pass that as they,' namely, the army of the Amorites, 'fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to Beth-horon, the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died.' They were more which died of the hailstones, than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword.² But the difference among commentators is, whether we are to understand this miracle of a shower of stones, properly so called, or of a shower of hail.

The learned Calmet, in a dissertation prefixed to his commentary upon Joshua, has taken a great deal of pains to show, that the stones, which the Lord is said to have cast upon the Amorites, were not ordinary hailstones, (since it would be incongruous, as he thinks, to interest God in so common an occurrence,) but real solid stones, which he supposes, might have been engendered in the air by a whirlwind carrying up sand or gravel into a cloud, and there mixing it with some such oily or nitro-sulphureous matter as might consolidate, and form it into a combustible body: that so, when by frequent agitation, it came to be fired, it might burst through the cloud, and scattering itself upon the explosion, might fall down upon the earth in the nature of a perfect shower of stones.

That great quantities of stones have in this manner been discharged from the clouds, is evident from several historians. Diodorus Siculus³ informs us, that as the Persian army was on their march to plunder the temple at Delphos, thunder and lightning, and a violent storm of stones fell in their camp, and destroyed a great number of men.³ In the reign of Tullus Hostilius, when news was brought to the government, that it had rained stones upon mount Alba, those who were sent to inquire into the matter, brought word, not only that the fact was true, but that these stones had fallen from the skies with an impetuosity equal to the most violent storm of hail. 'Not long after the battle of Cannæ, the same author assures us, that a storm of the same kind, fell on the same mountain, which lasted for two whole days; and events of this nature, attested by the best authors, have been so frequent at Rome, at Capua, at Lavinium, and several other places in Italy, that a man must be destitute of all modesty, who pretends to deny them absolutely.

^a His words are these:—"Jupiter Apollo never came near that beauteous choir, but checking his chariot, he would gaze in ecstasy, and cause the morning rays to linger."—Callimachus to Diana.

^b "Jupiter more slowly rolled away the darkness from the humid sky, and, as I think, with merciful care, delayed the driven-back air, while the fates forbade it; but the unaccustomed darkness remained only till the sun had resumed his usual strength."—Statius' Thebais, b. 1 and 5.

Nay, not only great quantities of smaller stones, but sometimes stones of a prodigious size, have been known to fall from the clouds, whereof this learned author,¹ among many others, gives us several instances, both of ancient and modern date. But then it is justly to be questioned, whether these authors have not suffered themselves to be imposed on by the too confident narrations of others. We may suppose indeed, that whirlwinds, or hurricanes, may raise the sand or gravel, and carry it on high, or some sudden irruptions of subterraneous fire may discharge great quantities of cinders, or ashes, into the air, where meeting with some exhalations of a sulphureous oily, or nitroline quality, they may, by the pressure of the clouds, be condensed and hardened into a stony substance; yet, how any cloud should be able to support such a quantity of smaller stones, much more of vast massy ones, as would be necessary to destroy the army of the five confederate kings, and to continue falling down upon them from Beth-horon to Azekah, places which lay in different tribes, and can hardly be supposed less than twelve or fourteen miles distant, (to say nothing of the many apertures in the earth, which must have been seen afterwards in these parts, upon the supposition that the thing was effected by volcanoes,) is a matter not altogether so credible.^a

^a Since our author wrote much light has been thrown on the disputed subject as to showers of stones, either large or small; and the fact has been established that the descent of such bodies is by no means uncommon. They are solid semi-metallic substances which fall from the atmosphere, and are known by the name of aerolites, or meteoric stones. As it is possible that such bodies were employed by the Almighty in this instance to effect his purpose, we subjoin a short account of them, and the conjectures as to their origin. The larger stones have been seen as luminous bodies moving with great velocity, descending in oblique directions, and frequently with a loud hissing noise, resembling that of a mortar-shell when projected from a piece of ordnance; they are sometimes surrounded with a flame, tapering off to a narrow stream at the hinder part, are heard to explode, and seen to fly in pieces. Of course these appearances have been observed only in the night; when the stones have fallen in the daytime, the meteor has not been observed, but the report and the shower of stones only have been noticed. The same meteoric mass has often been seen over a great extent of country; in some instances 100 miles in breadth, and 500 in length, which implies that they must have had a great elevation. Indeed from various calculations, it appears, that during the time in which they are visible, their perpendicular altitude is generally from 20 to 100 miles; and their diameter has, in some instances, been estimated to be at least half a mile. Their velocity is astonishing. Though rarely visible for more than a minute, yet they are seen to traverse many degrees in the heavens. Their rate of motion cannot according to calculation, be generally less than 300 miles in a minute. From the dimensions of these moving bodies, which certainly have not been overrated, since they have been known to illuminate, at once, a region of one or two hundred miles in extent, we are warranted in the conclusion that the stones which come to us from them, form but a very small portion of their bulk, while the main body holds on its way through the regions of the heavens. The velocity with which the pieces strike the earth is very great, frequently penetrating to a considerable depth, and when taken up, they have been found, in some cases, still hot, and bearing evident marks of recent fusion. Such falls have happened in cloudy as well as in clear weather, which leads

The truth is, there is no reason for carrying this miracle so high; since a shower of hailstones will not only do the work every whit as well, but seems to be the genuine import of Joshua's words, who having acquainted to the belief that they are wholly unconnected with the state of the atmosphere. The most remarkable circumstance respecting them is, that they invariably resemble each other in certain easily cognizable characters, both as respects their external properties and chemical composition, so as to render it possible for a mineralogist or a chemist to recognize them with certainty, though he should have no information of their origin or fall. Those specimens in which earthy matter preponderates, resemble pretty closely certain varieties of the trachytic rocks, or ancient lavas, but they invariably contain, disseminated through their substance an alloy of iron and nickel, which has as yet never been discovered among the productions of our earth. The earthy minerals of which they are composed, are feldspar, olivine, and augite—the former greatly preponderating; and of metallic substances, besides the native iron, magnetic iron pyrites is a frequent ingredient. The alloy of iron and nickel often contains chrome, manganese, and cobalt, in minute proportions. This alloy varies in the proportion which it bears to the earthy matters, in stones which have fallen at different times: sometimes it is scarcely to be detected without the aid of the microscope; at other times it forms more than one half the bulk of the stone, and immense masses are found consisting entirely of native iron: such masses are called meteoric iron, while the expression meteoric stones is applied more strictly to those in which the earthy minerals preponderate. These last are invariably coated on the outside with a thin black incrustation, and have in general a spherical figure in which we often observe indentations, similar to those which are presented by a mass that has been impressed with the fingers. These constant characters, as respects their fall, and chemical and mechanical composition, indicate a common origin, and have given rise to a variety of hypotheses to account for their phenomena. We can only hint at these hypotheses. Some attribute them to terrestrial, and others to lunar volcanoes. They have again been supposed to be concretions formed in the regions of our atmosphere; while others have considered them as small planets circulating about the sun or earth, which, coming in contact with our atmosphere, take fire from the resistance and friction which they meet with in passing through it. With regard to the first supposition, namely, that these stones proceed from terrestrial volcanoes, it will be sufficient to observe, that no remarkable irruption has been known to have happened at or near the time of their fall; and that such bodies have been found at the distance of some thousand miles from any known volcano; besides the immense force that would be necessary to project bodies of such enormous dimensions as these meteors are known to possess, far exceeds any force that we can conceive of, not to notice the want of similarity between meteoric stones and ordinary volcanic exuvia. As to the theory that they proceed from volcanoes in the moon, it has a greater degree of probability. The same force that would project a body from the moon to the earth, would not, if it were exerted at the earth's surface send the same body to the distance of ten miles, in consequence of the superior gravity of our planet and the density of the atmosphere. It is computed that a body projected from a favourable spot on the moon's surface,—say the centre of her disk opposite the earth,—with a velocity about four times that commonly given to a cannon ball, or 8220 feet per second, would carry it beyond the centre of attraction, and consequently into the sphere of the earth's activity; whence it must necessarily either fall to the surface of the earth, or circulate about us as a satellite. A body so projected from the moon to the earth, would take three days in its passage; which is not so long but that it might retain its heat, particularly as it is doubtful whether in passing through a vacuum, or very attenuated medium, it would be possible for the caloric to escape, not to say that it might acquire a fresh accumulation of heat, by passing through the denser parts of our atmosphere. Besides, eruptions, resembling those of our volcanoes, have been frequently observed in the moon; and her atmosphere is extremely rare, presenting but little resistance to projected bodies. This theory might perhaps be tenable if we had only to account for those showers of stones which come to our earth's surface; but these it has been seen, are a very trifling part of the main masses from which they descend, and which are

us that the Lord cast down great stones upon the Amorites, adds, by way of explication, 'that they were more that died by the hailstones than by the sword;' where it is reasonable to suppose, that had there been great stones as well as hail, the death of the greater numbers of those that perished would not have been attributed to the hail only.

It is some confirmation of this exposition, that we find the Septuagint, in both places of the text, translating it Αἰθους Χαλαζίας, which Josephus¹ calls "a violent tempest of hailstones of a prodigious size;" and the author of² Ecclesiastics thus recounts the whole matter: "With hailstones of a mighty power he made the battle to fall violently upon the nations, and in the descent of Bethoron, he destroyed them that resisted."

believed to be in some instances more than a mile in circumference. And since it is conceived that we experience a shower of these stones every few months in some part of the world, it is obvious that at this rate the whole mass of the moon most soon be shot away. Nor is this all. Among a number of bodies, thrown at random from the moon, it is not probable that one in 10,000 would have precisely that direction and that rate of motion which would be requisite to cause it to pass through our atmosphere, without falling to the ground. With regard to the theory of these bodies being concretions formed in the air, there is one principal objection, namely, that the velocity with which they strike the earth, estimated by the depth to which they have been known to penetrate, is so great as to indicate their having fallen from heights far exceeding the limits of the terrestrial atmosphere. The remaining theory, especially that modification of it which conceives these meteoric masses to be terrestrial comets, appears encumbered with fewer difficulties than either of the others. The solar comets, it is well known, revolve round the sun in very eccentric orbits. In one part of their revolution, they sometimes come so near as almost to strike his body. They then move off far beyond the orbits of all the planets; and in some instances are gone hundreds of years before they return. The earth, it is imagined, in like manner is furnished with its system of comets, whose size and periods of revolution are proportioned to the comparative smallness of the primary body about which they revolve, and which like the solar comets, fly off in very elliptical orbits; and during the greatest part of their circuit are too far distant to be visible. In their approach to the earth, they fall within our atmosphere; by the friction of the air they are heated, and highly electrified, and the electricity is discharged with a very violent report, accompanied with the detachment of a portion of the mass, which descends in fragments to the earth. This hypothesis certainly accounts, in a very happy manner, for most of the phenomena attending the fall of aerolites. The velocity of the meteor corresponds with the motion of a terrestrial comet, passing through the atmosphere in an elliptical orbit. A body moving near the earth with a velocity less than 300 miles in a minute, must fall to its surface by the power of gravitation. If it move in a direction parallel to the horizon, more than 430 miles in a minute, it will fly off in the curve of a hyperbola; and will never return, unless disturbed in its motion by some other body besides the earth. Within these two limits of 300 miles on the one hand, and of 430 on the other (some allowance being made for the resistance of the air, and the motion of the earth), the body will revolve in an ellipsis, returning in regular periods. Now, the velocity of the meteors, which have been observed, has generally been estimated to be rather more than 300 miles in a minute. In some instances it is perhaps too great to suffer the body ever to return; but in most cases, it is calculated to be such as would be necessary in describing the lower part of an elliptical orbit. Various lists of the periods, places, and appearances of these showers of stones have been given from time to time in the scientific journals. One of the latest and most complete is that published in the first volume of the Edin. Phil. Jour., compiled partly from a printed list by Chladni, and partly from a manuscript one of Mr Allan, read some years ago, at the Royal Society of Edinburgh.

introduces God as threatening, that³ 'he would plead against him with pestilence, and with blood, with an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone.' And in another place, speaking of false prophets, who seduced his people, into an opinion of their security, as if they had been fortified within a wall, he pursues the metaphor, and tells those who daubed it with untempered mortar, 'that it should fall: for there shall be an overflowing shower,' says he, 'and ye, O great hailstones, shall fall, and a stormy wind shall rent it.' So that from these and several other passages of the like nature, we may learn, that in executing his judgments upon the face of the earth, hailstones are very frequently arrows in the hands of the Almighty: and of what force they are to do execution, we are advertised in what befell the Egyptians, when, as the sacred history has related it,⁵ 'The Lord sent thunder and hail, and the fire ran upon the ground: and the Lord rained hail upon the land of Egypt; so there was hail, and fire mingled with hail, very grievous, such as there was none like it in all the land of Egypt, since it became a nation. And the hail smote throughout all the land of Egypt, all that was in the field, both man and beast: it smote every herb of the field, and brake every tree of the field.' Nor are there examples of a later date wanting, especially in our philosophical transactions, of the vast havoc and destruction that hailstones (from⁶ one to five pounds weight) have done in several places; killing both man and beast, and laying the whole country waste, for some sixty or seventy miles round. And therefore, since it is agreed on all hands, that hailstones have frequently fallen large enough to destroy never so great a number of people, when naked and defenceless against their blows, what need is there for our having recourse to any other solution?

A shower of hail, indeed, may be supposed to proceed from a mere natural cause; but when the event happened at the very instant wherein God promised to assist his people against their enemies; when, though it might have annoyed either army, it fell only on that which God had before determined to ruin; and fell so very heavily upon it, as to destroy more than the sword of the conquerors had done: such an event as this, I say, cannot but be looked upon as a miraculous interposition of providence, how fortuitous soever the course of second causes may be. In working miracles, God usually employs natural causes and productions. He does not create any new thing for the purpose: but makes use of what is already created, in a new and extraordinary manner: and therefore, though the shower of hail, and probably the wind too, which made it fall with such impetuosity, were both of them natural: yet the sending them at the very nick of time, and directing them to fall upon the enemy only, in this there was manifestly the hand of God, and something supernatural.

The other miracle is thus related in holy writ. Joshua said, in the sight of all Israel, Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou moon in the valley of Ajalon: and the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselves of their enemies.

Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hastened not to go down about a whole day; and there was no day like that, before or after it, that the Lord hearkened unto the voice of a man; for the Lord fought for Israel.¹ Now, for the better understanding of these words, we must observe,

1. That nothing is more common in Scripture, than to express things, not according to the strict rules of philosophy, but according to their appearances, and the vulgar apprehension concerning them. The sun and moon, for instance, are called ¹ ‘two great lights;’ but however that title may agree with the sun, it is plain, that the moon is but a small body, much less than many others in the planetary system, and that it has no light at all, but what it borrows, and reflects from the rays of the sun; and yet, because it is placed near us, it appears to us larger than other heavenly luminaries, and from that appearance the holy Scriptures give it such an appellation.

And in like manner, because the sun seems to us to move, and the earth to be at rest, the Scriptures speak a great deal of the pillars, and bases, and foundations of the earth, and of the sun’s ² ‘rejoicing, like a giant, to run his race;’ and of ³ ‘his arising and going down, and hastening to the place where he arose,’ &c. Whereas it is certain, that ⁴ if the sun were made to revolve round about the earth, the ^a general law of nature would thereby be violated; the harmony and proportion of the heavenly bodies destroyed; and no small confusion and disorder brought into the frame of the universe: but, on the contrary, if the earth turning upon its own axis every day, be made to go round the sun in the space of a year, it will then perform its circulation, according to the same law which the other planets observe; and, without the least exception, there will be a most beautiful order and harmony of motions everywhere preserved through the whole frame of nature. As therefore the Scriptures were designed to teach us the art of holy living, and not to instruct us in the rudiments of natural knowledge, it can be deemed no diminution either to their perfection, or divine authority, that they generally speak according to the common appearance of things, and not according to their reality or philosophic truth. The plain matter of fact is, that in the early ages, both before, and long after the days of Joshua, the most learned astronomers had no notion of the improvements which our modern professors have since attained to. They never once dreamed of the earth’s rotation, upon its own axis; but according to common appearance, were fully persuaded, that the sun and moon, had their respective courses. Upon this supposition they formed their schemes, and thought themselves able to answer every phenomenon by them. And therefore, if God had prompted Joshua to desire the prolongation of the day in a manner more agreeable to our new astronomy, or to record the miracle in terms more suitable to it, this would have been a plain contrariety to all the rules of science then in use. The people who heard him utter the words, ‘Earth, rest upon thy axis,’ would have thought him distracted, and those who read his account of what had happened, if related in suitable expressions, would have decried it as false in fact, or passed it by with contempt and disregard, as a wild fancy or blunder of his own.

2. In relation to the places over which the two heavenly bodies were to stand, the sun ‘over Gibeon,’ and the moon ‘over the valley Ajalon,’ we must observe, that, even upon the supposition of the sun’s motion, the Jewish general cannot be thought to speak in a proper and philosophic sense. For since the sun is almost a million of times bigger than the earth, and some millions of miles distant from it, to justify the strict sense of the words, a line drawn from the centre of the sun to that of the earth, must exactly pass by Gibeon, which we know it cannot do, because no part of the Holy Land lies within the tropics: and therefore we must conclude, that Joshua here speaks according to the outward appearance of things, which makes the sense of his words plain and intelligible.

Wherever we are, if so be we are not hindered by objects immediately surrounding us, we can cast our eye upon part of the surface of the earth, and at the same time take into our prospect some small extent of the firmament of heaven, which seems, as it were, to cover the other; and each celestial body, which we perceive in this extent above, appears to us to be directly over such and such part of the earth, as we alternately turn our eyes to: and it was thus, that the sun, when Joshua spake, seemed to him, and to those that were with him, to ‘be over Gibeon, and the moon to be over the valley of Ajalon.’ This valley, in all likelihood, took its name from some adjacent town; but then, as there are three Ajalons mentioned in Scripture, one ⁵ in the tribe of Ephraim, another in ⁶ Zebulun, and another in ⁷ Dan, it is reasonable to think, that the place here spoken of was in Dan, the most remote province from Gibeon; for we must suppose that these two places were at some considerable distance, otherwise Joshua could not see the sun and moon both appear at the same time, as it is probable they were both in his eye when he uttered these words.

3. In relation to the time when this miracle began, and how long it lasted, the Scripture expression is, that the ‘sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hastened not to go down about a whole day:’ which words can import no less, than that the sun stood still in the

^a Besides this general argument of Mr Keil’s, Mr Whiston has one, which he accounts no less than a demonstration: “If the earth,” says he, “have an annual revolution about the sun, it must affect the apparent motion of all the other planets, and comets; and notwithstanding the regularity of their several motions in their own orbits, must render these regular motions, to us, as living upon the moving earth, sometimes direct, and that swiftly or slowly; sometimes stationary, and sometimes retrograde, and that swiftly or slowly also; and all this, at such certain periods, in such certain places, for such certain durations, and according to such certain circumstances, as geometry and arithmetic will certainly determine, and not otherwise. Now that this is the real case in fact, and that every one of these particulars are true in the astronomical world, all that are skilful in that science do freely confess, even those who do not think fit to declare openly for this annual revolution of the earth, which yet is the natural and certain consequence of that concession.”—(Whiston’s Astron. Princ. of Relig.) The reader that is desirous to know more both of the annual and diurnal motion of the earth, may consult Dr Derham’s Prelim. Disc. to his Astro-Theol.

meridian, or much about noon, and that in this position it continued for the space of a civil or artificial day, that is, for twelve hours. But ¹ Maimonides is of opinion, and in this he is followed ² by some Christian writers, that there was no such cessation of the sun and moon's motion, but that the whole purport of the miracle was this:—"That God, at Joshua's request, granted him and his soldiers such a degree of spirits, activity, and despatch, as enabled them to gain a complete victory, and do as much execution in one day as might otherwise have taken up two." But this is a construction so repugnant to the genuine sense of the words as to need no formal confutation.

There is something more, however, to be said to the notion of other learned men, who with regard to the time when Joshua might send up his request, and the miracle begin, think it more probable that he should pray for a longer day, when he perceived the sun just going to leave him, than when it was in its height. But Joshua, no doubt, had reasons for what he did: he was an old experienced general, eager for a complete victory, and able to compute what time it would take to achieve it: so that his fear of losing any part of the present advantage, might make him pray that the day might be thus prolonged until he had obtained the whole. If the sun, in its declension, had stopped its course, it might have answered his purpose perhaps; but then it had given a juster handle to the suggestions of those who would deny the whole merit of the miracle. For, if the retardation of the sun had not happened until it was going to set, ³ Spinosa might, with a much better grace, have attributed the extraordinary length of this day to the refraction of its rays from the clouds, which at that time were loaded with hail; or ⁴ Peirerius, to some aurora borealis, or parhelium, which, after the setting of the sun, might appear about the territories of Gibeon, and so be mistaken for the sun's standing still: but now, by fixing it in its meridian point, all these cavils are effectually silenced; and ⁵ God, no doubt, who heard him so readily, inspired the Hebrew general with that wish or prayer, which otherwise perhaps would never have come into his head.

4. In relation to the book of Jasher, (or of just and upright men,) which Joshua quotes as a voucher of the truth of this miracle, the opinions of learned men are much divided. ⁶ Some think, that it was the book of Genesis, which is here so called, because it treats of the lives of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, three of the most righteous men that the world then knew. The Targum of Jonathan calls it 'the book of the law,' as containing not only the chief precepts which God gave his people, but several promises likewise of the wonders which he intended to work for them. ⁷ Josephus, and some interpreters after him, will have it to be certain annals of the lives and particular adventures of some Jewish worthies, and of other things remarkable that happened to that nation; though others again suppose that this was only a collection of some verses, which the Israelites thought themselves concerned to learn by heart, the better to remember the miracles which God had been pleased to vouchsafe them. But whatever the subject of this book was, or "whether it was composed in prose or verse, it is a groundless conjecture to say, ⁸ that it was wrote in a figurative and hyperbolical style, or that the quotation which Joshua takes from it, is so to be understood. The design of the quotation is only to confirm what Joshua affirms, that the sun did stand still, that of Jasher, in what style soever it was written, must necessarily be supposed to do the same: otherwise it would have been to no purpose to have cited it.

It cannot be denied, indeed, but that, upon some occasions, the sacred penmen do use figures, and poetical expressions: but then the sense and chain of the discourse do easily discover it when they do so. Whenever they intend to express themselves in a figurative manner, there is usually something going before, which prepares the reader for it: and besides that figurative expressions cannot be long continued, there is always something apparently in them, that can by no means be reduced to a literal sense. But now, in the Scripture account of this transaction, where do we perceive any thing like this? ⁹ Joshua, seeing the enemy put to the rout, begs of God to give him a complete victory, and, at the same time, out of the zeal and fervour of his mind, commands the sun and moon not to advance any farther, until he had effected his desire. The sacred historian tells us, that, at his command, these heavenly luminaries actually did stand still; and to evince the credibility of a thing so marvellous, having produced the testimony of another author that makes mention of the same event, he thereupon concludes, that ¹⁰ "there was no day like that, before it or after it, that God hearkened to the voice of a man." Here, we see, are all the tokens imaginable of a simple, literal, and historical narration: and the reader must therefore be strongly prejudiced against the belief of all miracles whatever, who can possibly distort such plain and uniform expressions into any figurative or metaphorical sense, in order to evade the force of this.

"But if there really was such a miracle wrought, it is somewhat strange, that the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, when he certainly makes mention of things of less moment, should entirely forget this, or that we should have no memorial of it recorded by any profane a M. Le Clerc has taken the pains to varyify the two places where mention is made of the sun's standing still, by the transposition of some words, in order to make it appear at least probable, that the author of the book of Joshua, in quoting them out of that of Jasher, had only reduced them to historical prose by the contrary transposition. But besides the difficulty of telling us what kind of verses these are, since the art of scanning us Hebrew pœsy has been lost as long as St. Jerome's days, if he supposes them to be only rhymes and cadences, it is no uncommon thing, we know, to meet with several passages both in the scriptural and other prose writers, which, with a small variation of the text, are capable of this harmonious turn, and yet were originally never so intended. It is to be observed, however, that though the words, 'so the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hastened not to go down about a whole day,' are probably cited from some ancient record, yet the preceding ones, 'and the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies,' (Josh. x. 13.) are the author's own, wherein he talks, not in the loftiness of a poet, but in the plainness and simplicity of an historian: and therefore it writer. God is not so prodigal of his miracles, one would think, as to reverse the whole order of nature, and stop the sun in its regular course, merely that a victory might be obtained in one day, which, every whit as well, might have been gained in two; though it cannot be denied, but that, if it was so, his 'hearkening to the voice of Joshua,' gave him a pre-eminence far above Moses, forasmuch as all his miracles were nothing in comparison of this, even though the Scriptures say expressly, that 'there rose not a prophet, in all Israel, like unto Moses, in all signs and wonders, which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, and in the wilderness.'

The author of the epistle to the Hebrews, in ² the chapter now under debate, meant no more, than to give his reader some notable instances of the wonderful power of faith. To have been too curious in the choice of these instances, especially when he wrote to persons of the same nation, and who were as well acquainted with these things as himself, would have savoured too much of art and human wisdom, which inspired authors always professedly avoid; and to have been too prolix in the commemoration of them, would have spoiled the form of his epistle, by swelling that part of it beyond its due proportion.

The apostle himself seems to be sensible of this; and therefore we find him cutting himself short, omitting some, and reckoning up several other instances in the gross; and ³ 'what shall I more say? For the time would fail me, to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephtha; of David also, and Samuel, and all the prophets.' You see, that in the catalogue of his worthies, he observes no great method in enumerating them, nor does he so much as mention Joshua, though his character be vastly superior to that of Gideon, and others that he takes notice of; and therefore, if his omitting this particular of the 'sun's standing still' may be deemed a sufficient argument against its reality, by parity of reason, all the other miraculous transactions which he has thought proper not to mention, such as the plagues of Egypt, the wonders in the wilderness, the passage of Jordan, and several others of the like nature, must be reputed destitute of truth, how frequently soever they may be recorded in other parts of holy writ.

And in like manner, though we find no mention made of this wonderful event in heathen writers, yet this is no valid objection against it, because it happened many ages before there were any historians or chronologers, that we know of, extant to record it. Or if we think that a fact so very remarkable could have hardly escaped a general observation, why may we not suppose, that the public archives or monuments wherein it was recorded, in the long and obscure time that intervened before any of our present historians arose, have been lost; and that nothing has been transmitted to us, (except what we have in sacred writ,) but an uncertain tradition, clouded with fable, and poetical fictions.

It can hardly be thought, indeed, but that the humour which the poets had, ^a of imputing to magic the power of stopping the stars in their courses, and what they relate of their heroes and demigods being able to lengthen days or nights, as it best served their military or amorous purposes, proceeded from something; and to what can we ascribe it more properly, than to a glimmering knowledge which they might from tradition have of this miraculous event? But however this be, it is certain that the argument drawn from the silence of heathen authors, can be of no validity against the truth of this miracle, since it did not happen in any age when the earliest of them lived, and might therefore be what they knew nothing of; since all their works have not descended to us, and in what is lost, they perhaps might have related it, as in what is extant, we are sure they say nothing to contradict it.

³ It must be reckoned a point of justice then, and a kind of right belonging to all nations, to be determined, in what concerns the history of any country, by the history of those people, who are presumed to be better acquainted with their own affairs than any strangers can: and therefore we cannot, without apparent prejudice, deny this privilege to the Hebrew writers, even though we find some heathen testimonies not entirely according with them. But when nothing of this is pretended; on the contrary, when as far as those dark times would permit, there is a concurrence and harmony between them, there can be no shadow of reason for calling in question their veracity, unless the things which they relate be either impossible or contradictory, which, in the case before us, can never be affirmed; because it is sure and self-evident, that the Author of nature, who gave being and motion to the sun and stars, may stop that motion, and make them stand still, when, and as long as he pleases; especially when their rest will contribute to his glory, as it certainly did in this instance, as much as their continued motion does.

God indeed never works any miracle, but upon a just and proper occasion; but then we ought to remember, that this battle against the confederate kings, was fought not offensively, but defensively, on the side of Israel, in order to save a people whom they had solemnly taken under their protection. The Gibeonites, as is generally supposed, were a commonwealth, for which reason they might not enter into a league with the five kings; and as a free people, they had a right, no doubt, to take all proper measures for their safety. Joshua, therefore, could not but look upon the confederacy against them as cruel, and unjust, and himself obliged in honour not to refuse the oppressed the succours they requested of him, upon any pretence whatever; since God's honour was likewise concerned in the preservation of a people who had entered into an alliance with his own inheritance, is, at least, a bold assumption to say, that a writer, who barely appeals to another for the truth of a single instance, has taken the whole from him. The most that can be fairly concluded from such an appeal is, that the fact is equally affirmed by both, either in the same or equivalent terms; whereas, had the terms of the 'sun's standing still in the midst of heaven' been intended to mean no more, than that there remained so much light after its setting, occasioned by some unusual refraction, as made the whole army think it was still above the horizon, no honest man, for fear of imposing on his reader, would have cited them, without modifying their sense, or giving them an explanation.—Saurin's Dissertation on the Defeat of the Five Kings, and Universal History, b. 1. c. 7.

and had their alliance ratified by the mouth of his high priest, and with the sanction of his most blessed name. Upon these considerations, Joshua loses no time, but marches all the night to their assistance; and on the next day, God is pleased to reward his faithfulness and zeal with a most miraculous victory, whereby he not only rescued his allies, but made all the land of Canaan sensible likewise, that a greater and more powerful God was on Israel's side than any whom they worshipped,¹ by stopping the sun and moon (which were two of the principal deities whom those idolatrous people adored) in the midst of their course.

God might, no doubt, in the compass of two days, have enabled the Israelites to have gained a complete conquest over their enemies, without the expense of a miracle, as these men call it. But then, had this been obtained by the dint of the sword only, it would have been imputed to their superior valour and strength, and deemed no more than the common fate of war; or had there nothing more remarkable happened in it, than a shower of large hailstones, this might have been thought owing to chance, or natural causes, or at most, been only known in that neighbourhood; whereas, the stopping of the two great luminaries, in the height of their career, (which could not but be universally seen and felt,) was enough to convince these poor deluded people, that the gods, whom they trusted in, were subject to the God of Israel, and at the same time deter the Israelites from falling into the like idolatry, from² 'kissing their hand, as Job expresses that form of worship, 'when they beheld the sun as it shined, or the moon walking in its brightness;' to convince them, I say, that³ 'the gods of the heathens were but idols,' and that it is the Lord who made, and who ruleth in the heavens.

It cannot be questioned but that the fame of this miracle raised Joshua's reputation to an high degree, nor⁴ can we see any inconvenience in admitting, that this was a more remarkable miracle than any which Moses ever did; because it does not therefore follow, that Joshua, in other respects, was a person of greater eminence than Moses. Our blessed Saviour tells his disciples,⁵ 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on me, the works that I do, shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do: because I go unto my Father. And yet he gives us to understand, in another place, that⁶ 'the disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord.'

Elisha was the servant and attendant on the prophet Elijah, and yet it is certain, that, according to our estimate, he did more and greater miracles than his master did; for even⁷ 'after his death his body prophesied;' as the son of Sirach expresses it; 'he did wonders in his life, and at his death were his works marvellous.' And therefore we need not account it a strange thing, that we find Joshua here doing a miracle, which in our opinion surpasses all that ever Moses did: because God's making use of the ministry of one man, rather than another, in his surpassing works of wonder, is no certain proof of the man's superior merit; since in this, as well as any other dispensation, he is at perfect liberty⁸ 'to choose,' if he pleases, 'the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty; yea, and base things, and things that are not, to bring to nought things that are, that no flesh should glory in his presence.

But after all, we talk of greater and less miracles, when in reality, there are no such degrees of comparison between them. For what is it that makes us account one work of this kind greater than another? if it be, because we conceive more difficulty in doing it; this, with regard to God, the sole author of all miracles, is a great mistake, for as much as all things are equally easy to his almighty power. The motion, and other properties of every created being were at first impressed by him: 'He spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast;' and with the same facility, he can retard or suspend their operations; for they have no power of resisting the very first beck of his will. Since every thing, therefore, that is contrary to the ordinary course of nature requires the interposition of an almighty power, and whatever is not impossible in itself, is equally possible to God; with him there can be no difference between passing the Jordan and passing the Red Sea, between drawing water out of the stony rock and arresting the sun in the firmament of heaven; 'for 'whatever he pleased that did he, in heaven, and in the earth, in the sea, and in all deep places.'

Some of the Objections to the Credibility of the Old Testament Considered and Answered.

SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.

SOME of the objections which infidels have advanced against the credibility and divine authority of the Old Testament scriptures, and more especially against the part of them that has now been surveyed, are frivolous: others are founded on a mistranslation of the original; and all of them may be easily and satisfactorily answered.

1. The first which I shall notice, is the command of God to the Israelites, to destroy the seven nations of Canaan, and to take possession of their land. The transaction to which this injunction refers, is explained by Bishop Watson in his Apology for the Bible, in a manner which most persons consider to be satisfactory. The dispensation complained of, and which is supposed to be irreconcilable with the justice and the benevolence of the Deity, is as consistent with these attributes of the divine nature, as many occurrences which happen in the ordinary course of providence. "If it be consistent," as has been remarked, "with the justice and benevolence of the Supreme Being, that the Jewish nation, his own peculiar people, should, on account of the enormity of their sins, be in their turn attacked in their inheritance; be subjugated to a foreign power; become the prey and plunder of a long succession of capricious, cruel, and avaricious tyrants: have their city and temple at length assaulted; be loaded with every possible calamity which pestilence, famine, and torture, their own mutual treacheries and animosities, and the implacable enmity and ingenuity of their adversaries, could invent, during the continuance of this tremendous siege; if it be consistent with the same adorable attributes, that upwards of a million of them should fall victims to so complicated a scourge, and that the wretched remnant who escaped, should be suffered to wander about as outcasts and vagabonds over the face of the whole earth, equally despised and derided by every nation among whom they might acquire a temporary abode; if it be consistent with these attributes, that this terrible visitation should be persevered in for a period of at least eighteen centuries, thus punishing from age to age, the children for the sins of their fathers; if the case before us, which we cannot but believe, be consistent with the justice and benevolence of the Deity, surely the case recorded, a case of far inferior vengeance, demands no great credulity to obtain our assent, nor strength of reasoning to reconcile it with the moral perfections of the Supreme Being."¹ It is not the fact, however, that the Canaanites were all destroyed. The Gibeonites and Jebusites, were permitted to live. Rahab was saved, because she professed her faith in God.

It is to be observed, that the destruction of the nations of Canaan was not an arbitrary infliction of vengeance, but the merited punishment of their wickedness. This is fully proved by the eighteenth chapter of Leviticus, where, after mentioning their corrupt and abominable practices, it is said, 'In all these the nations are defiled which I cast out before you; for all these abominations have the men of the land done.' They were early idolaters; sacrificed their infants to idol deities; they were addicted to unnatural lusts, and sunk in every kind of vice. It was on account of these enormities, which were general and habitual among them, that the nations of Canaan were destroyed. This is expressly affirmed: 'In all these, the nations are defiled which I cast out before you: and the land is defiled: therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it.—Ye shall not commit any of these abominations, that the land spue not you out also, as it spued out the nations which were before you.'² The very land is represented as sick of its inhabitants; of their odious and brutal practices: of their corruption and wickedness. This was the reason for destroying them; and not, as has been imagined, to make way for the Israelites.

God's treatment of the persons guilty of those crimes was impartial, without distinction, and without respect of nations or individuals. The words which point out the divine impartiality, are those in which Moses warns the Israelites against falling into any of the like wicked courses: 'That the land,' says he, 'cast not you out also, when you defile it, as it cast out the nations that were before you; for whoever shall commit any of these abominations, even the souls that commit them, shall be cut off from among their people.—Ye shall not walk in the way of the nations which I cast out before you: for they committed all those things, and therefore I abhorred them; as the nations which the Lord destroyed before your face, so shall ye perish: because ye were not obedient unto the voice of the Lord your God.'

Nor were the Canaanites destroyed without warning, and much patience and long-suffering on the part of God. The stroke was suspended during several generations, till their wickedness rendered its infliction inevitable. In the 15th chapter of Genesis, God says to Abraham that his descendants of the fourth generation should return into that country, and not before: 'for the iniquity of the Amorites,' says he, 'is not yet full.'

Even when this period arrived, they were still permitted to flee elsewhere, as in fact many of them did, or to renounce their idolatries, and serve the God of Israel; in which case it appears that mercy was exercised to them. The case of the Gibeonites, and of Rahab, already referred to, would seem to favour this view of the subject. We are told³ 'that there was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel, save the Hivites, the inhabitants of Gibeon; all other they took in battle:' from which words it is inferred, that the Canaanites might have had peace, if they had thought proper to accept the proposed terms. Had they submitted to these terms, they would have turned from idols to the worship of God; ceased from the practice of wickedness, and consequently would not have been a snare to Israel, by teaching them to do after their abominations.⁴

The objection therefore is not, and cannot be, to the destruction of the Canaanites: because, when God, for the wickedness of a people, sends an earthquake, or a fire, or a plague amongst them, there is no complaint of injustice, especially when the calamity is known, or expressly declared beforehand, to be inflicted for the wickedness of such a people. It is rather regarded as an act of exemplary penal justice, and, as such consistent with the character of the moral Governor of the universe. The wickedness of the Canaanites accounts for their destruction. To that merely no objection can therefore be made. The manner in which this was effected is that which is complained of. But where is the great difference, as Dr Paley observes, even to the sufferers themselves, whether they were destroyed by an earthquake, a pestilence, a famine, or by the hands of an enemy? Where is the difference, even to our imperfect apprehensions of divine justice, provided it be, and is known to be, for their wickedness that they are destroyed? But this destruction, you say, confounded the innocent with the guilty. The sword of Joshua, and of the Jews, spared neither women nor children. Is it not the same with all other national visitations? Would not an earthquake, or a fire, or a plague, or a famine amongst them, have done the same. Even in an ordinary and natural death, the same thing happens. God takes away the life he lends, without regard, that we can perceive, to age, or sex, or character. But, after all, promiscuous massacres, the burning of cities, the laying waste of countries, are things dreadful to reflect upon. Who doubts it? So are all the judgments of Almighty God. The effect, in whatever way it shows itself, must necessarily be tremendous, when the Lord, as the Psalmist expresses it, moves out of his place to punish the wicked. But it ought to satisfy us—that it was for excessive, wilful, and forewarned wickedness, that all this befell them, and that it is all along so declared in the history which recites it.

Besides, satisfactory reasons may be assigned for giving to the mode in which the Canaanites were punished the preference to every other. The superiority of their own gods above the gods of the nations which they conquered was, in the opinion of the people of those early ages, evinced, by their giving them victory in war. This being the actual persuasion which then prevailed in the world, how were the neighbouring nations, for whose admonition this dreadful example was intended, how were they to be convinced of the supreme power of the God of Israel above the pretended gods of other nations, and of the righteous character of Jehovah—that is, of his abhorrence of the vices which prevailed in the land of Canaan: how were they to be convinced so well, or at all indeed, as by enabling the Israelites, whose God he was known and acknowledged to be, to conquer under his banner, and drive out before them, those who resisted the execution of that commission with which the Israelites declared themselves to be invested, namely, the expulsion and extermination of the Canaanitish nations? This convinced surrounding countries, and all who were observers or spectators of what passed, first, that the God of Israel was a real God: secondly, that the gods which other nations worshipped were either no gods, or had no power against the God of Israel: and, thirdly, that it was he, and he alone, who possessed both the power and the will to punish, to destroy, and to exterminate, from before his face, both nations and individuals, who gave themselves up to the crimes and wickedness for which the Canaanites were notorious. Nothing of this sort would have appeared, or with the same evidence, however, from an earthquake, or a plague, or any natural calamity. These might not have been attributed to divine agency at all, or not to the interposition of the God of Israel.

First, the destruction of the Canaanites, then, was an act of penal justice. It was merited by their wickedness. Secondly, the infliction of this punishment by the instrumentality of the Israelites, made it more manifestly appear to proceed from the God of Israel, by whose miraculous power the devoted nations were subdued. Thirdly, their general destruction was not only just, but it was rendered necessary, to prevent the pernicious example of their crimes from gradually seducing the children of Israel to the practice of their vices and abominations. 'Thou shalt utterly destroy them, that they teach you not to do after all their abominations, which they have done unto their gods.' Fourthly, the supreme moral Governor of the world was impartial in this exercise of punitive justice, because he threatened his chosen people with similar retribution, if they should be guilty of similar crimes. Fifthly, this dispensation regarding the Canaanites, which has been the subject of cavil and complaint, is shown to be as consistent with the justice and benevolence of God, as many occurrences which happen in the ordinary course of providence. Sixthly, the circumstances of the Jews when they inflicted this punishment on the Canaanites, prove that they acted by divine commission. If we suppose the contrary, we must believe that Moses in this instance indicated a line of conduct directly opposed in its tendency to the peaceful habits which the facility given to the Jews required and implied. "Up to a certain point they were to be trained in the worst possible discipline for peaceful citizens; to encourage every disposition opposite to those inculcated by the general spirit of the law. Those who were to be merciful to the meanest beast—who were not to exercise any oppression whatever towards a stranger of another race, on the capture of a Canaanitish city, were to put all to the sword.—At a given point their arms were to fall from their hands, the thirst of conquest subside; and a great unambitious agricultural republic, with a simple religion, an equal administration of justice, a thriving and industrious population, brotherly harmony and mutual good-will between all ranks, domestic virtues, purity of morals, gentleness of manners, was to arise in the midst of the desolation their arms had made, and under the very roofs, in the vineyards and corn fields, which they had obtained by merciless violence."

11. Another class of objections made to the divine authority of the Scriptures of the Old Testament is founded on a mistranslation of the original. Thus, ¹ God is said in the authorized version to have directed the Israelites to borrow of the Egyptians: it should have been rendered, to ask or demand. They were instructed to ask that which was their due: and the minds of the Egyptians were so overruled that they readily complied with the demand which was made. ² 'My (that is God's) breach of promise.' This is highly improper: it should have been rendered, my displeasure or indignation. ³ According to the common translation Jephthah is represented as promising to offer his daughter in sacrifice: but when the particle vau, is translated or instead of and, the objection founded on this passage falls to the ground. 'Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, if thou shalt surely give the children of Ammon into my hand, then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh out of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall either be the Lord's, or, I will offer it up for a burnt-offering.' That is, if what meets me on my return, be what the law allows for a burnt-offering, I will offer it, if not, it shall be, in as far as the nature of the case will admit, consecrated to God. ⁴ The dying charge of David to Solomon, relative to Shimei, has been often the subject of cavil to sceptics; but the objection is founded on a mistranslation: the Hebrew word should be read disjunctively, as in the former passage; and then we have, 'Neither hold him guiltless, for thou art a wise man: nor his hoary head bring thou down to the grave with blood.' That is, he is an artful, designing, dangerous person, who requires to be strictly watched; but nevertheless spare his life, and do not let him die by the hand of justice.

The conduct of David towards the Ammonites, as described 2 Sam. xii. 31, in 'putting them under saws and harrows of iron,' has been represented as an instance of extreme cruelty. The subject of complaint is founded on a mistranslation. The Hebrew prefix ב, (beth) signifies to as well as under; and to put the people to saws, harrows, axes, and the brick kiln, means no more than to employ them in the most menial and laborious offices. "This form of expression," as Mr Horne remarks, "is an Anglicism as well as a Hebraism; and we still say to put a person to the plough, to the anvil. We render the passage thus: 'He,' David, 'brought forth the people that were therein, and put them to saws and to harrows of iron, or iron mines, and to axes of iron, and made them pass through the brick kiln.' In a similar passage, ¹ Dr Kennicott has proved, that in place of the word, cut with saws, the word he put them should be inserted: so that this passage must be rendered and understood in the same manner as the former.

Finally, we are always to bear in mind that the character of this was peculiar to itself, in its not being intended to recover violated rights, or to procure indemnity for past injuries, or security against future; but to vindicate the cause of God against the incorrigible, and to exhibit them as examples of divine retribution. Regard to the interests of those who engaged, was not the only, or the prevailing principle of this war. The main object was, the manifestation of the righteousness and honour of God as the supreme moral Governor of the world. His authority, his attributes, and even his being had long been treated with the utmost indignity; and this was the peculiar method which he prescribed for their full vindication.

III. A third class of objections is founded on alleged contradictions to morality. An acquaintance with the manners and customs of eastern nations, so different from those of the moderns, will account for the circumstances which have been adduced either from ignorance or from design, as offensive to the feelings of delicacy.

It is also necessary to recollect the peculiar and extraordinary constitution of the Jewish polity and government. God was the immediate and temporal sovereign of the Jews, whose laws were enforced by present rewards and punishments. There were certain sins, such as idolatry, which were regarded as a renunciation of his authority, as high treason against the state, and which were therefore punished with death.

IV. It is alleged, that some of the things which are mentioned in the Old Testament are contradicted by philosophy. In consequence of the progress of science, this objection is now seldom advanced, at least by well informed persons. We have already adduced proofs from natural history of the reality of the deluge. Science also furnishes evidence in confirmation of the truth of the Mosaic account of the creation. "The structure of the earth," says Professor Jamieson, "and the mode of distribution of extraneous fossils or petrifications, are so many direct evidences of the truth of the Scripture account of the formation of the earth; and they might be used as proofs of its author having been inspired, because the mineralogical facts discovered by modern naturalists were unknown to the sacred historian. Even the periods of time, the six days of the Mosaic description,—are not inconsistent with our theories of the earth."² Nor are the phenomena of the heavenly bodies at all contradictory to the Mosaic history. To the objection, that the historian speaks of light before the creation of the sun, and calls the moon a great light, when every one knows it to be an opaque body, modern philosophy furnishes the answer. It has discovered, that the sun is not the original source of light; and therefore Moses does not call either the sun or the moon a great light, though he represents them both as great luminaries or light-bearers. Surely the moon is as much an instrument of conveying light, as the reflector placed behind the lamps of a light-house, for the purpose of transmitting to the mariner at sea the light of those lamps which would otherwise have passed in an opposite direction to the land. Though the moon is not a light in itself, yet is that secondary planet a light in its effects, as it reflects the light of the sun to us. And both the sun and the moon are with great propriety called great,—not as being absolutely greater than all other stars and planets, but because they appear greater to us, and are of greater use and consequence to this world. And now, after all our improvements in philosophy and astronomy, we still speak of the light of the moon, as well as of the sun's motion, rising, and setting. And the man who in a moral, theological, or historical discourse, should use a different language, would only render himself ridiculous.

In like manner, had objectors referred to the original Hebrew of Gen. i. 6, 7, 8, (which in our English authorized version, as well as in other modern versions, is erroneously rendered firmament, after the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin versions,) they would have rendered it expanse; and they might have known that it meant the air or atmosphere around us, in which birds fly and clouds are formed, and that it had no reference whatever to a solid firmament; though such an idea was entertained by the ancient Greek philosophers, who, with all their boasted wisdom, were nearly as ignorant of the works, as they were of the nature of God. And does not this circumambient air divide the waters from the waters, the waters of the sea from the waters which float above us in clouds and vapours? For ³ 'there is a multitude of waters in the heavens, and He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth.'

Moses also represents the earth at first in a state of fluidity. "The Spirit of God," says he, 'moved upon the face or surface of the waters.' The apostle Peter also speaks of the earth as being formed out of a fluid: 'The earth standing out of the water and in the water.' The same tradition reached also some of the ancient heathen philosophers; and Thales, in particular, one of the seven wise men, and the wisest of them all, as Cicero informs us, said that all things were made out of the water. Others, after him, taught the same doctrine; and is it in the least degree contradicted or disproved by modern discoveries? On the contrary, is it not more and more confirmed and illustrated by them? It is well known that if a soft or elastic globular body be rapidly whirled round on its axis, the parts at the poles will be flattened, and the parts on the equator, midway between the north and south poles, will be raised up. This is precisely the shape of our earth; it has the figure of an oblate spheroid, a figure bearing a close resemblance to that of an orange. Now, if the earth was ever in a state of fluidity, its revolution round its axis must necessarily induce such a figure, because the greatest centrifugal force must necessarily be near the equatorial parts, and consequently there the fluid must rise and swell most. It has been demonstrated by experiment, that the earth is flattened at the poles and raised at the equator: and thus do the Scriptures and philosophy agree together, and confirm each other. The Scriptures assert that the earth was in a state of fluidity; and philosophy evinces that it must have been in such a state from its very figure.

It has been alleged also that the circumstance of the sun and moon standing still, which is recorded in Joshua x. 12, is contrary to philosophy. Let it, however, be recollected that the sacred historian expressly relates it as a miracle: it is therefore impossible to account for it on philosophical principles; it must be resolved wholly into the power of God, who hearkened to the voice of a man, to stop the luminaries in their diurnal courses, or perhaps the earth's rotation, and by prolonging the day of battle, to make them fight for Israel. From the circumstances of the narrative, we may collect the time of the day and of the month when it happened, namely, soon after sunrise, and when the moon was rather past the full.

Joshua, when summoned by the Gibeonites to come to their succour against the confederate kings, went up from Gilgal all night, and came suddenly (we may conclude about daybreak) upon the enemy, whom he discomfited with great slaughter, and chased along the way from Gibeon to Beth-horon, in a westerly direction, the Lord co-operating in their destruction by a tremendous shower of great hailstones, which slew more than the sword of the Israelites, but did not touch the latter. In this situation, the sun appeared to rise over Gibeon eastward, and the moon to set over Ajalon westward, near the Mediterranean sea, in the tribe of Dan; when Joshua, moved by a divine impulse, uttered this invocation in the sight of Israel:—'Sun, stand thou still over Gibeon, and thou Moon, in the valley of Ajalon.' So the sun stood still in the hemisphere, and hasted not to go down about a whole day,—which in that climate, and shortly after the vernal equinox, might have been about thirteen hours long, thus giving him daylight for the destruction of his enemies for twenty-six hours, during which he took the city of Makkedah, and slew the five kings who hid themselves in a cave near it.¹

Many inquiries have been made concerning the way in which this miracle was wrought, and many difficulties and objections have been urged against understanding it literally. But the fact, as far as we are concerned about it, is authenticated by the divine testimony; and the manner in which it was accomplished, lies entirely out of our province, because beyond our discovery and comprehension. Is any thing too hard for the Lord? This question forms a sufficient answer to ten thousand difficulties which pny objectors, under the assumed title of philosophers, have, in every age, been starting against the truth of God in his written word. If the earth's diurnal motion was gradually stopped, it does not appear that it would, in respect of the dry land, make a more sensible difference to the inhabitants, than casting anchor, when a ship is under full sail, does to the mariners; and the power which caused the deluge, was sufficient to prevent the effects of this change, on the seas and oceans, and keep them from overflowing any part of the globe.² As there are no records of profane history so ancient as this event, it cannot be any cause for wonder, that pagan authors have not mentioned it. Though some intimation of it seems given, in the fable of Phaeton driving the chariot of the sun, and throwing all things into disorder, so that there was one day wholly unlike all before or after it. This extraordinary miracle not only gave Israel an opportunity of completing their victory, but rendered Joshua honourable in the eyes of all the people; and both him and them terrible to the surrounding nations. It was also a public attestation, that the God of Israel was the Lord of the whole earth, and of the heavens; and a protest against idolatry, whilst the sun and moon, the worship of which formed the most ancient and plausible kind of idolatry, were obedient to the commands of the servants of Jehovah, the God of Israel.³

With respect to the shower of stones, I am inclined to believe with bishop Gleig, that the stones were meteoric stones, and not ordinary hailstones. Hailstones are not only natural, but common phenomena, and, therefore, were not calculated to make such an impression on the minds either of the Israelites or of the Gibeonites as a shower of fire-balls, or ignited stones. There seems, indeed, to be little room for doubt, but that the one kind of stone is formed in the atmosphere by some natural process, as well as the other; but in what manner, or by what law of nature the ignited metallic stones are formed, is, I believe, equally unknown to the philosopher and to the peasant. One of the most scientific chemists of the present day, after describing a great variety of such metallic stones, which are to be found in every quarter of the globe, says, that we may consider them all as fragments of fire-balls, which have burst in the atmosphere; but that the origin and physical cause of those fire-balls, will, perhaps, for ages, baffle all the attempts of philosophers to investigate them. The pouring down of such a shower of stones, by whatever process formed, on the army of the Canaanites confederated against Israel, was a miracle admirably calculated to convince the Israelites and Gibeonites of the superiority of Jehovah, over the gods of Canaan.

THE HISTORY.

AFTER the death of Joshua,^a no particular person, that we read of, succeeded him in the government: and

^a The Samaritan Chronicle tells us, indeed, that in the last assembly which Joshua held he nominated twelve chiefs, of every tribe one, and put it to the lot, who should succeed him in the government: that the lot fell upon his nephew Abel, whom he accordingly crowned, and invested with other ensigns of honour, &c., but this is thought to be no more than a fabulous account, invented to fill up this void space of time—Saurin's Dissert. on Heglon, king of the Moabites, who was killed, &c.

therefore, the most probable opinion is, that every tribe was governed by their respective heads, or elders, (which form of government subsisted about thirty ^a years,) and ^a Dr Hales, following the chronology of Josephus, with some corrections, makes the whole period from the time of Joshua and the elders who survived him, to the election of Saul, 498 years, which he accounts for thus:—In the general introduction of his Analysis of Scripture Chronology, he endeavours to show that the interval from the exodus to the foundation of Solomon's temple, was 621 years; from which, subtracting 123 years, namely, forty years from the exodus to this return, eighty years from the two reigns of Saul and David, and the first three years of Solomon, the remainder is 498 years. "But," says the learned and indefatigable doctor, "although we are indebted to Josephus for this, and for supplying some material chasms in the sacred annals, such as, 1st, the administration of Joshua and the elders, 25 years; 2d, the ensuing anarchy, 18 years; 3d, the administration of Shamgar, 1 year; and, 4th, of Samuel, 12 years; still his detail of the outline there given requires correction.

For, 1. The year ascribed to Shamgar's administration is too short, as is evident from Deborah's account, (Judges v. 6.); I have therefore included it, with David Ganz, in Ehud's enormous administration of 80 years, and transferred the one year to Joshua's, making that 26 years. 2. I have restored Abdon's administration of 8 years omitted by Josephus, and deducted it from the 18 years he assigns to the anarchy, thereby reducing the latter to its correct length of 10 years. 3. I have dated the first division of the conquered lands in the sixth year, which Josephus reckoned in the fifth year; because Caleb was 40 years old when Moses sent him as one of the spies from Kadesh-barnea, in the second year after the exode; consequently he was 39 years old at the exode, and therefore 79 years old, 40 years after, at the arrival in Canaan; but he was 85 years old when he claimed and got the hill of Hebron for an inheritance, which therefore must have been six years after the arrival in Canaan. Compare Num. x. 11; xiii. 6., with Josh. xiv. 6—15. 4. Josephus has omitted the date of Samuel's call to be a prophet, (1 Sam. iii. 1—19.) which St Paul reckons 450 years after the division of lands, (Acts xiii. 19, 20.); and which, therefore, commenced with the 10 last years of Eli's administration of 40 years. This last most important chronological character, from the New Testament verifies the whole of this rectification; while it demonstrates the spuriousness of the period of 480 years in the present Masorite text of 1 Kings vi. 1., from the exode to the foundation of Solomon's temple.⁷

that, in their wars with the Canaanites, they made them their commanders. For several of the Canaanitish kings remaining still unconquered, the Israelites unanimously resolved to set about their reduction; and accordingly repaired to the oracle at Shiloh, to ask directions of God, which tribe should begin the war. God's orders were, that the tribe of Judah should begin; and therefore, they, taking to their assistance the tribe of Simeon, first set upon the cruel ^b king of Bezek: sacked the town, killed ten thousand of its inhabitants, and, as he was endeavouring to make his escape, seized him, and cut ^c off his thumbs and great toes, in the like manner as he had done to no less than seventy little kings ^d or princes, whom he compelled to gather their meat, like dogs, under his table: so that the similitude of his punishment made the tyrant reflect upon his own cruelty, and acknowledge the justice of God in what he had brought upon him.

After the conquest of Bezek, the two united tribes ^e invested Jerusalem, and having taken it, put the inhabitants to the sword, and set the place on fire. They thence marched to Hebron, and having made themselves masters of it, went to attack Debir, which was part of

"The only alteration here made in the present text of Josephus is the insertion of Tola, and his administration of 23 years, (Judges x. 1, 2.), which are inadvertently omitted between Abimelech and Jair, (Ant. 5, 7, 15;) but evidently were included in the original scheme of Josephus, as being quite requisite to complete the period of 621 years. To Abdon no years are assigned by Josephus, (Ant. 5, 7, 15.), perhaps designedly, for Clemens Alexandrinus relates, that some chronologers collected together the years of Abathar and Ehron, (Abdon and Elon,) or made them contemporaries. But we may easily reconcile Josephus with Scripture, by only deducting eight years from the 18 years' interregnum after Joshua, which will give Abdon his quota of years, and leave that interregnum its juster length of 10 years.

"It is truly remarkable, and a proof of the great skill and accuracy of Josephus in forming the outline of this period, that he assigns, with St Paul, a reign of 40 years to Saul, (Acts xiii. 21.), which is omitted in the Old Testament. His outline also corresponds with St Paul's period of 450 years, from the division of the conquered lands of Canaan, until Samuel the prophet."—See Dr Hales' Chronology, vol. 1. p. 298; vol. 2. p. 257. et seq. second edition.—Ed.

^b There is another place in Scripture, namely, 1 Sam. xi. 8. where Bezek, is mentioned; and since Eusebius and Jerome tell us, that there were in their days two towns, about seventeen miles from Shechem, of the same name, and not far distant from each other, we see nothing of moment to hinder them from being both but one city in former times.—Hales' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

^c The reason of their mutilating him in this manner, was to make him incapable of war any more, being unable to handle arms, by reason of the loss of his thumbs, or to run swiftly, which was a notable quality in a warrior in those days, by the loss of his great toes.—Patrick's Commentary in locum.

^d From this it seems very probable, that the different Canaanitish tribes were conveyed by a sort of chieftains, similar to those among the clans of the ancient Scottish Highlanders.—Ed.

^e We do not read that Jerusalem was ever taken by Joshua, though it seems highly probable, that when he took the king of Jerusalem, he did to it as he did to the rest of the cities belonging to those kings, (Josh. x. 3—23.) But when he was gone to conquer other parts of the country, it is likely that the old inhabitants returned again, and took possession of it, for the land was not then divided among the Israelites. But as Joshua, a little before his death, divided the land, and this city fell, in part, to the share of the tribe of Judah, they dispossessed the Jebusites that dwelt there, of all but the strong fortress on the top of mount Zion, which held out till the days of David.—Patrick's Commentary.

Caleb's allotment, though the Canaanites at that time had possession of it. Caleb, ^a who in all probability was general in these wars, being resolved to storm the place, made proclamation in the camp, that whoever should attack and carry it, should have his daughter Achsah as a reward of his valour; which his gallant nephew Othniel, son to his younger brother Kenaz, achieved, and so, not only obtained the beautiful damsel for his wife, but with her a large estate likewise, in a well-watered country, which, at her request, her father very generously bestowed on him.

Thus the tribe of Simeon assisted that of Judah to subdue the mountainous parts about Jerusalem, and the southern parts adjoining to the wilderness of Paran; and when this was done, the tribe of Judah in like manner, assisted the Simeonites to take Gaza, Askelon, and Zephah, which was then called Hormah; so that these places, in after ages, came into their possession. ^b Encouraged by these successes, the family of Joseph undertook the conquest of Bethel; and to this purpose sent out spies, to take a survey of the town, and to gain what intelligence they could. They perceiving a man coming out of it, immediately seized him, but promised to spare his life, upon condition that he would give them the best information he could, in what way the town was approachable. The man did so; and by his information they succeeded so well, that sending for their forces, they entered the place, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, except the man who had given them intelligence, and his family.

The other tribes had equally good success in gaining the possession of the lands that were allotted them; only the tribe of Dan was compelled to quit the plains for fear of the Amorites, and to retire into the mountainous parts of the country, where they were pent up for some time, until the family of Joseph came to their assistance; and having restrained the insolence of their enemies, reduced them to a narrower tract of land than what they had at first.

One great fault, however, in those that were successful against the Canaanites, was, that they did not make a right use of their victories, but either through a misplaced lenity, or covetousness, instead of destroying them, (as they were commanded,) suffered them to live promiscuously among them, and contented themselves with making them tributary; which so far incensed God,

^a Who was their general upon this occasion, is not expressly mentioned either in Scripture, Josephus, or any other ancient historian; and yet it is hardly to be questioned, but that Caleb was the person. He was of the tribe of Judah, older than any other by twenty years; and yet, like Moses, he continued in his full strength and vigour. He and Joshua, were the only two spies, who, having searched out the land, gave a true report of it; and therefore, as Joshua was the first general, he had the greatest right to succeed him; and this might be the reason why Joshua, at his death, named no other. He and Joshua, were the only two persons to whom the Israelites gave inheritances for their signal services; and as his inheritance lay unconquered in this tribe, he had the greatest reason to be active in reducing it. His name alone is mentioned in all these wars, and as his son-in-law, Othniel, was the first deliverer of the Israelites from their oppressions, he seems to have succeeded Caleb in this dignity, as his nearest and most valiant relation.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 5. c. 3.

^b The Septuagint in this place, (Judges i. 18,) reads, 'But Judah did not possess Gaza nor the coasts thereof; neither Askalon nor the coasts thereof; neither Ekron, nor the coasts thereof; that he sent an angel from Gilgal, to expostulate the matter with them; to remind them of the favour which he had vouchsafed them, in delivering them out of Egypt, and bringing them into that happy land, of his punctual performance of all the promises he had made them, and of their vile ingratitude in rejecting his precepts, for which he had very justly withdrawn his protection from them.

The reproof made the people, for the present, a little sensible of their transgression, so that they fell into a general lamentation; and deploring the wretchedness of their condition, offered sacrifices to God, in order to appease his wrath. But no sooner was this fit of humiliation over, but continuing still their correspondence with the Canaanites, indulging themselves in their loose conversation, and making intermarriages with them, they fell into idolatry, and worshipped Baal and Ashtaroth, and other idols of the heathen, which so provoked the Lord, that he left them to themselves; and they, without his protection, made so weak a defence, that they were often taken, and enslaved by their enemies.

The first oppressor that the Israelites had, was named Chushan Rishathaim. He was King of Mesopotamia, and when he invaded the territories of Israel, he made an easy conquest, and imposed a tribute on them, which lasted for eight years; but at the expiration of that time, God raised up Othniel, Caleb's son-in-law, (who was the first of those whom the Scripture calls Judges,) and inspired him with courage and resolution to take up arms against the king of Mesopotamia, whom he soon defeated, and settled the Israelites in a state of peace and tranquillity, which lasted for forty years. But during this space of time, the people fell into a general apostasy, and corruption of manners, whereof the ^d two following stories are sad and remarkable instances.

neither Azotus nor its adjacent places: and the Lord was with Judah.' This is the reading of the Vatican and other copies of the Septuagint; but the Alexandrian MS., and the text of the Complutensian and Antwerp polyglots agree more nearly with the Hebrew text. St Augustine and Procopius read the same as the Vatican MS.; and Josephus expressly says, the Israelites took only Askelon and Azotus, but did not take Gaza nor Ekron. And the whole history shows that these cities were not in the possession of the Israelites, but of the Philistines; and if the Israelites did take them at this time, as the Hebrew text states, they certainly lost them in a very short time after.—Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

^c The Jews are generally of opinion, that by this angel, we are to understand a prophet who was sent by God as a messenger which the very word often imports; and this messenger they commonly take to have been Phineas, who was employed upon this errand. We can see no reason, however, for their departing from the usual signification of the word, especially when there is no absurdity in it, and the sense of the context seems to require our retaining it. Nay, there is reason to say, that the person who here reproves the Israelites, was something more than a created angel; for who but God can speak in this style, 'I made you to go out of Egypt?' No prophet, nor any created angel durst have been so bold; and therefore the opinion of most Christian interpreters is, that it was the Son of God, who is frequently in Scripture called 'the angel of the covenant.' And fit it was for him to appear now, as coming from Gilgal, to put them in mind of his illustrious appearance near that place once before, of the assurance he then gave them of his presence with them in the conquest of the land, and of the solemn covenant he made with them, by renewing of circumcision. The angel's coming up from Gilgal is therefore mentioned as a very pertinent circumstance, to upbraid the Israelites with their base ingratitude to God, and with their sloth in not endeavouring to expel the Canaanites.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d These two stories are related in the 17th, 18th, and 19th

The tribe of Dan, as we said before, being pent up in the mountainous parts, found their territories much too narrow for them; and therefore they sent out of their body five spies, to survey the country, and bring them in intelligence, in what part of the regions round about, they might most likely extend their bounds. The spies, in their journey, came to the house of Micah of Mount Ephraim, whose mother, thinking it too much trouble to go to Shiloh to worship, and offer sacrifices there, had made an idol, and placed it in a private chapel of her son's building: for her son had an ephod and teraphim, and for some time, had consecrated one of his own sons to be his priest; until a Levite, who had dwelt some time at Bethlehem-Judah, travelling from thence to seek a better settlement, happened to call at Micah's house, and by him was hired to execute that office; whereupon the man was fond enough to believe, that God would prosper him not a little, now that he had got a Levite to be his priest.

It so happened, that some of these spies being acquainted with this Levite, and, after some discourse, understanding in what capacity he served Micah, desired of him to ask counsel of God, what success they might possibly promise themselves in the enterprise they were going upon, and with the encouragement which he gave them, they proceeded on their search, until they came to Laish;^b chapters of Judges, and being so placed, they may seem to belong to the latter part of this period; whereas, in the judgment of most learned men, they were transacted much about this time. It is plain from the text, (chap. xvii. 6.) that these things happened 'when there was no king,' that is, no ruler, for properly speaking there had hitherto been no king, 'in Israel, but every man did what was right in his own eyes;' and the reason why Samuel, or whoever was the author of this book, places them here, is because he was not willing to break the thread of his history, by intermixing these matters with it, but reserved them to be related apart by themselves.—Patrick's Commentary.

a The divine service might be performed with a greater resemblance of what was done at the tabernacle in Shiloh, he made priestly ornaments; for so some learned men take the ephod to comprehend, not only the breastplate adjoining to it, but all the rest of the vestments used by the high priest. His intention was to set up an oracle in his own house, in imitation of the sanctuary of Moses; and therefore, to make the conformity the greater, it is supposed that he erected a kind of ark, whereon he placed two teraphim, to answer the two cherubim in the tabernacle, as he caused the priest who officiated for him to wear an ephod, in the manner that the high priest did when he consulted God. Mr Selden (in his Synagoga I. de diis Syriis, c. 2.) well observes, that the worship of the true God, and of idols, was here blended together. The ephod and the Levite, which Micah afterwards provided, were intended, no doubt, for the service of the true God; but the graven image and teraphim, by which the children of Dan desired the Levite to inquire of God, belonged unto demons. They neither trusted to the ephod alone, which related to God, nor to their teraphim alone, which was their own invention, but thought it necessary to join both together in divine worship: and thus began idolatry in Israel, by the superstition of an old woman, who put this in her son's head. This woman, many of the Jews suppose to be the same with Delilah, who, having got so much money of every one of the lords of the Philistines, thought it expedient to employ some of it in expressing her devotion. But this is an idle conceit, that has no other foundation, than Delilah's being mentioned in the foregoing chapter; whereas Micah was some hundred years prior to her.—Patrick's Commentary, and Jurieu's History of Doctrines and Worship, part 3.

b The text reads, 'Then the five men departed, and came to Laish, and saw the people that were therein, how they dwelt careless, after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure; and there was no magistrate in the land, that might put them to where observing a pleasant and fruitful country, and the people living in a secure and negligent manner, without any rule or discipline among them, they returned to their brethren, and gave them an account, how fruitful the country was, and how easily, in their opinion, the place might be taken by surprise.

Upon this, the Danites drew out a party of six hundred men, and sent them to take possession of the city Laish; but in their way through Mount Ephraim, they called at Micah's house, and, in his absence, seized the Levite, the ephod, and teraphim, and other images that Micah had made; and as the Levite was remonstrating against what they had done, they soon pacified him, by representing the advantage of being a priest to a whole tribe rather than any one family; and with the hopes of that he went very willingly along with them.

Micah returning home, and understanding that his priest and his gods were gone, musters up his friends, and pursues the Danites; but when he came up with some of the hindmost of them, and was making his complaint against the injury they had done, they wished him to be gone; for that if he persisted to irritate the rest of the party, it would certainly cost him and his friends their lives: and so continuing their march, on the third day they came to Laish, where finding it unguarded, they burnt the city, destroyed the inhabitants, and took possession of the country; but in a short time after, they rebuilt the city, which, after the name of their father, was called Dan, and here setting up the images which they had stolen from Micah, they made this same Levite, whose name was Jonathan, their priest; and in this state of idolatrous worship they continued for about three hundred years, even unto the time ^c that the ark of shame in any thing; and they were far from the Zidonians, and had no business with any man.' The following remarks of Dr A. Clarke, throw much light on this passage; he thinks that probably the people of Laish or Leshem were originally a colony of Sidonians, who were an opulent people; and being in possession of a strong city lived in a state of security, not being afraid of their neighbours. And that in this the Leshemites imitated them, though the sequel proves that they had not the same reason for confidence—that being a Sidonian colony they might naturally expect succour from their countrymen; but being far from Sidon the Danites saw they could strike the decisive blow before the news of the invasion could reach Sidon, and consequently before the Leshemites could receive any succours from that city. The last clause, 'and had no business with any man,' in the most correct copies of the Septuagint reads, 'and they had no transactions with Syria.' Now it is evident that instead of אדם Adam, MAN, they read ארם Aram, SYRIA; words so nearly similar that the difference which exists is only between the resh, and daleth; and this both in MS. and printed books is often undiscernible. This reading is found in the Codex Alexandrinus, in the Complutensian polyglot, in the Spanish polyglot, and in the edition of the Septuagint, published by Aldus. It may be proper to observe that Laish was on the frontiers of Syria; but as they had no intercourse with the Syrians, from whom they might have received the promptest assistance, this was an additional reason why the Danites might expect success.—Ed.

c The words of the text are;—'And the children of Dan set up the graven image, and Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh, he and his sons, were priests to the tribe of Dan, until the day of the captivity of the land;' (Judges xviii. 30.) But then the question is, what we are to understand by the captivity of the land? Now there are two times mentioned in Scripture, when the children of Israel were carried away captive, by Tiglath-Pileser, when he 'took Hazor, and Gilcad, and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and carried them into Assyria,' (2 Kings xv. 29.) and 2dly, by Salmasser, who 'carried Israel away, and placed them in Halah, and in Habor, by the river Gozan, God was taken captive by the Philistines, which was in the days of Samuel.

Not long after this, the war of the Benjamites broke out, which is another tragical piece of history, and as pregnant a proof of the people's immorality, as the other is of their apostasy. The substance of the story is this.—A Levite of Mount Ephraim, having taken a wife out of Bethlehem-Judah, who proved a lewd woman, she made an elopement from her husband to her father's house, where she continued for some months. The Levite, however, being willing to be reconciled to her, went to bring her home; but, in his return happening to be benighted, he was obliged to turn ^b into Gibeah, where an old man of Mount Ephraim, who was only an inmate there, after some conversation, received him into his lodgings. But while they were at supper, the men of the city beset the house, and demanded to have the stranger brought out to them, that according to the sin and in the cities of the Medes,' (2 Kings xviii. 11.) And to one of these, the words of the text are supposed by some learned men to refer; but then it must necessarily follow, that this book was written in later times, even after the former of these captivities at least. It can hardly be supposed, however, that these images should be suffered to continue in the days of David, who was a man after God's own heart, and studied to advance true religion to the utmost of his power all the country over, from Dan to Beer-sheba; and therefore others, with good reason conclude, that by 'the captivity of the land,' is meant the taking of the ark by the Philistines, and carrying it captive into the temple of Dagon; for so the Psalmist expressly calls that unlucky event; 'he forsook the tabernacle in Shiloh, even the tent that he had pitched among them; he delivered their power into captivity, and their beauty into the enemies' hands,' (Ps. lxxviii. 60, 61.) (Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.) Instead of Manasseh, as observed in a former note, we should read Moses, as it is found in some MSS., the Vulgate and the concession of the most intelligent Jews. R. D. Kimchi acknowledges that the Jews have changed Moses into Manasseh, because they think it would be a great reproach to their legislator to have had a grandson who was an idolater; that Gershom the son of Moses is here intended, is very probable. See the arguments urged by Dr Kennicott, (Dissertation 1. p. 55, &c.) and the Var. Lect. of de Rossi on this place. We may add the following in support of the opinion, that by 'the captivity of the land,' the taking of the ark is meant. Hubigant contends that, instead of אֶרֶץ haaretz, the LAND, we should read אֶרֶץ haaron, the ark; for nothing is easier than for the vau, and final nun, to be mistaken for the v final tsade, which is the only difference between 'the captivity of the land,' and the 'captivity of the ark;' and this conjecture is the more likely, because the next verse tells us that Micah's graven image continued at Dan all the time the house of God was at Shiloh, which was till the ark was taken by the Philistines.—See Cabnet, Pool's Synopsis, and Dr A. Clarke.—Ed.

a Josephus relates this story with a good deal of variation from the sacred history:—That the Levite's wife was not a lewd woman, but one who did not well agree with her husband, for which reason she left him, and went to her father; that the young men of Gibeah, seeing her to be a very beautiful woman, took notice of the house where she went in, and came and demanded her, and not the Levite himself, as the Scripture has it; that the Levite did not turn her out, but that the young men took her by force, and carried her to their own quarters, where they spent the whole night in all manner of bestial liberties, and then sent her back again next morning; that upon her return, she fell into such a confusion of thought, for what had befallen her that night, that, what between shame and indignation, she sank down upon the ground, and expired; that the Israelites met in convention, sent to the Benjamites to deliver up the malefactors, who had committed this brutal violence upon the Levite's wife, which they refused to do, as thinking it dishonourable, for fear of a war, to submit to rules of other people's prescribing, &c.—Josephus, b. 5. c. 2.

b Gibeah lay north of Jerusalem, about twenty or thirty furlongs from it, and was built upon a hill, as its name imports.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

of Sodom, they might know him. It was vain to use entreaties to so rude a rabble. The good old man offered them his own daughter who was a virgin; and, at length, by consent the Levite's wife was turned out among them. They abused her all that night; and the next morning, she was found dead at the threshold, which enraged her husband to such a degree, that taking her home with him, he cut her dead body into twelve parts, and sent one to every tribe, with an account of the inhospitable treatment he met with at Gibeah; that so, in a general assembly of Israel, it might be resolved, what method of revenge it was proper to take upon this dismal occasion.^c

The assembly agreed, that never so inhuman an act had been known in Israel since the time they left Egypt; and thereupon came to a resolution to bring the offenders to condign punishment, and in order to that, sent messengers to them demanding the men that had committed this outrage; but they refused to deliver them, and in order to defend the criminals, mustered up all their forces. The army of the Benjamites consisted but of six and twenty thousand, whereas that of all Israel amounted to four hundred thousand men; and yet, in two several engagements, the Benjamites had the better of them; for in the former, they killed them twenty-two thousand, and in the latter eighteen thousand men. But the misconduct of the Israelites upon this occasion was, that being too confident of the goodness of their cause, c Judg. xix. 29. 'And when he was come into his house, he took a knife, and laid hold on his concubine, and divided her, together with her bones, into twelve pieces, and sent her into all the coasts of Israel.' Interpreters say but little concerning the real views of the Levite in this transaction; they merely intimate, that it was done to excite a general indignation against the authors of the injury he had sustained. His motives certainly were good and regular. He intended to unite the whole nation in vengeance against a crime, in which it was interested: but as they might be checked in the extent of the punishment by the number, the credit, and the power of the offenders; by the natural commiseration which is felt for those who are of the same blood; or by an aversion to involve the city in destruction; he sought and seized a method which put them to the indispensable necessity of espousing his cause. The only part which he had to take was, to cut in pieces the body of his wife, which he did, or else that of an ox, or other like animal, which had either been devoted, or offered in sacrifice, and to send a part of it to each tribe. In consequence of this, every tribe entered into an indissoluble engagement to see justice done him for the injury he had received. This is what the interpreters of Scripture seem not to have known, and which it is necessary to explain.

The ancients had several ways of uniting themselves together by strict ties, which lasted for a stipulated time; amongst these may be noticed the sacrifice of Abraham, the circumstances of which are mentioned, Gen. xv. 9, &c. Another method was, to take a bullock offered or devoted in sacrifice, cut it in pieces and distribute it. All who had a piece of this devoted bullock were thenceforward connected, and were to concur in carrying on the affair which had given occasion for the sacrifice; but as this devoting and dividing was variously practised, it also produced different engagements. If he who was at the expense of the sacrifice, were a public person, or in high office, he sent of his own accord a piece of the victim to all who were subject to him; and by this act obliged them to enter into his views. If the sacrifice were offered by a private person, those only who voluntarily took a piece of the sacrifice, entered into a strict engagement to espouse his interest.

These circumstances, compared with the account given of the Levite's conduct, and the subsequent behaviour of the tribes, clearly point out, that the method used by the Levite to obtain redress, was consistent with the established usages of the times, and effect of the retribution he desired to see accomplished.—Burder's Orient. Customs. vol. 1. p. 182.—Ed.

and the superiority of their numbers, when they went to consult God, they only inquired of him which of the tribes should lead the van, without placing their confidence in him, or depending upon his assistance for success, which these repeated defeats brought to their remembrance; and therefore, before the third engagement, they humbled themselves in a proper manner before God, and from his encouragement, attacked the Benjamites once more. But to make their victory the more secure, they laid an ambuscade behind the city, which, while they pretended to fly, entered it, and set it on fire; whereupon the main body of the Israelitish army faced about, and charged so furiously upon the Benjamites, that they slew five and twenty thousand of them, set fire to their city, and destroyed all that belonged to them. It so happened, however, that six hundred of them, which were all that remained of the tribe, made their escape into the wilderness, and sheltered themselves in the fortress of Rimmon.

When the heat of the action was over, and the Israelites began to reflect coolly on what they had done, they were grieved not a little; and that the rather, because at the beginning of this war, they had all taken a rash oath not to marry their daughters to any of the Benjamites: so that how to recruit the tribe they could not tell, until they bethought themselves of these two expedients. When the war first broke out, they had bound themselves by oath, to put all to the sword who would not join them in the common cause against the Benjamites; and finding by their muster-roll, that the people of Jabesh-Gilead had neglected to come, they despatched twelve thousand men, with orders to put man, woman, and child to the sword, except such virgins as were marriageable, whom they intended to give to the Benjamites for wives. For by this time the Benjamites were reconciled to the rest of the people, had left their stronghold, and were come into the camp; so that when the men returned from the slaughter of the Gileadites, they brought four hundred virgins along with them, which were immediately given to the Benjamites; but as the Benjamites were six hundred in number, there was not for every man one, and therefore they betook themselves to another expedient.

Once every year, ^a there was a festival kept at Shiloh, whither the young women of the country used constantly to come and dance. The Israelites therefore suggested to the Benjamites, that as many as wanted wives might at this time repair to the place, and concealing themselves in the vineyards, seize upon the young women as they came out adorning, and carry them off to their own habitations. The Benjamites accordingly pursued their instructions; and, watching their opportunity, took every one his damsel away with him: so that, having by this means got themselves wives, they settled again in their own country, and began by degrees to recruit their tribe.

After the death of Othniel, the Israelites again revolted from the service of God, and God, to chastise them for it, suffered Eglon, king of Moab, to subdue them; so that, for eighteen years together, they were forced to be tributary to him. But upon their humiliation and repentance, he raised them up a man, even out of the diminished tribe of Benjamin, who wrought their deliverance, but in a method no ways to be justified, under a less supposition than that he had a divine commission for so doing.

Every year it was customary for the Israelites to send a present or tribute to the king of Moab, and for that year Ehud, the son of Gera, was appointed to go with it. He was a left-handed man; and having a design either to free his country from this oppression, or perish in the attempt, he had for this purpose provided himself with a poniard, which he concealed on his right side. After he had delivered the present, pretending he had something of great importance to communicate to the king, he obtained a private audience of him, when, taking his opportunity, he stabbed him with the poniard to the heart, and so shutting the door after him, had time to make his escape. For as the king was a very corpulent man, his attendants supposed that he was either reposing or easing himself, and therefore forbore to enter into his apartment until Ehud was quite gone. As soon as he came to Mount Ephraim, he gathered together the Israelites that lay nearest him; acquainted them with what he had done; and then securing the fords of Jordan, that none of them might escape, he fell upon the Moabites, and destroyed them all; so that, after this conquest, the eastern part of the land of Canaan enjoyed a settled peace ^b for the space of fourscore years.

^a All the three great festivals were to be observed in the place where God settled his habitation, which was now at Shiloh; and therefore some are of opinion, that the feast here mentioned was one of these; particularly they think it was the feast of tabernacles, because this was a season of great joy, for having newly gathered their vintage, and the only season wherein the Jewish virgins were allowed to dance. At this time they dwelt in booths too, behind which the Benjamites, as they fancy, might very conveniently conceal themselves, and so watch an opportunity of carrying away the virgins: but what seems to make against this opinion is, that at any of these public festivals, the concourse of people would have been too great for a design of this nature to be put in execution, since the violence which must of course have been offered to the young women would hardly have met with a general connivance. It is much more probable, therefore, that this was some festival peculiar to the people of Shiloh, which the Benjamites perhaps might know nothing of, and were therefore put in mind of it by 'the elders of the congregation.' Josephus tells us that it was celebrated thrice every year: and on this festival it might be a custom for the young women to go out into the fields, and there dance by themselves, which might give their ravishers the very opportunity they wanted.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^b There are two ways wherein 'the land,' as it is in the text, may be said to have 'had rest fourscore years.' If by the 'land,' we understand the whole kingdom of Israel, the meaning must be, that it rested about fourscore years, or the greatest part of fourscore years. Because it is a very common thing in Scripture to use numbers in this latitude, and instead of a minute computation, to make mention of the round sum. Thus the Israelites are said 'to bear their iniquities forty years in the wilderness, (Num. xiv. 33.) when there wanted almost two years of that number; and to 'dwell in Egypt four hundred and thirty;' when, strictly speaking, there wanted several of it: and in like manner, the land is here said 'to have had rest fourscore years;' when it is declared at the same time, that the people served the king of Moab eighteen of them; nor is it any uncommon thing in other authors, as well as the sacred, to use this form of expression. But, 2dly, if by the land, we understand only such or such a part of it, the solution is easy. For it is but supposing that there were scarce any of the judges who ruled over the whole country of Israel, but some in one part, and some in another; so that, at the same time, there were several judges in the land, and peace in one part, when there was war in another; and then we may, with the learned Sir John Marsham, understand here, by 'the land which had rest fourscore years,' not the whole land of Israel, but

A. M. 2561. A. C. 1443; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 3849. A. C. 1564. JUD. i. TO THE END OF RUTH.

But though the eastern coast was at rest, yet the west part of the kingdom was sadly molested by the incursions of the Philistines, who dwelt upon the same shore of the Mediterranean sea. Upon this occasion, ^a Shamgar, the son of Anath, asserted the cause of Israel; and having received extraordinary vigour from above, with no better weapon than an ox-goad, ^b slew, at divers times, six hundred of these invaders, and preserved the peace of the country for eight years.

In the north part of the country, however, the idolatry, which Micah began, propagated apace; so that God being highly incensed at the people's impieties, permitted Jabin, who, at that time, assumed the title of king of Canaan, and ^c had fixed his imperial seat at Hazor, to oppress them with great severity for forty years. This prince had made Sisera, ^d an experienced soldier no doubt, general of his forces, wherein, besides great store of other military munition, there were 900 armed chariots, which terrified the Israelites to such a degree, that ^e several tribes, ¹ despairing of relief, sat still under their oppression, and some of them were going ² to transport themselves into other countries. For their enemies were so very cruel to them, that they durst not travel the common roads, nor dwell in villages, for fear of being murdered or plundered; and having no arms left to defend themselves, they were forced to retire to fortified places, and there live together, in the utmost consternation.

In the midst of this distress, ^f Deborah, the prophetess, the eastern part of it only, which had shaken off the yoke of Moab, while, in the mean time, the Philistines invaded the western parts, even as Jabin afflicted the northern, as we may see in the following chapter.—Pool's Annotations, and Patrick's Commentary.

^a Of what tribe this valiant person was, we are nowhere informed; but it is not unlikely, that he was one of those tribes which bordered upon the Philistines, Judah, Dan, or Ephraim, because what he did was against them. It is disputed by some, whether he is to be reckoned among the number of the judges; but for this, I think, there is no foundation. The short account which the Scripture gives of him, is this:—'And after him,' that is, after Ehud, 'was Shamgar, the son of Anath, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox-goad, and also delivered Israel.' (Judges iii. 31.) After Ehud was Shamgar, that is, he succeeded him in the office of a judge, for this is the natural sense of the words; and 'he also delivered Israel,' which is the very phrase whereby the judges are described. It is not said, indeed, from what oppressions he delivered them; but he is a deliverer who preserves a nation from being oppressed, as well as he who rescues them from an oppression when they groan under it. This, in all probability, was Shamgar's case, who, when the Philistines invaded his country, gave them a repulse, with the loss of 600 of their men, which was enough to discourage them from all future attempts. And indeed, the great slaughter which he made among them, with a weapon, in all appearance, so incompetent for the work, argues him to have been a judge, and possessed of a divine power, as much as Samson, who slew 1000 of his enemies 'with the jaw-bone of an ass.' (Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries).—Dr Hales supposes Shamgar's administration in the west to be included in Ehud's administration of 80 years in the east; and as Shamgar's administration might have been of some continuance, so this servitude of the Philistines, which is not noticed elsewhere, might have been of the same duration, as may be incidentally collected from Deborah's thanksgivings.—En.

^b Judges iii. 31. 'And after him was Shamgar, the son of Anath, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox-goad.' Mr Maundrell, (Journey, at April 15.) has an observation which at once explains this transaction, and removes every difficulty from the passage. He says, "The country people were now every where at plough in the fields, in order to sow cotton. It was observable, that in ploughing they used goads of an extraordinary size; upon measuring of several, I found them about eight feet long, and at the bigger end, six inches in circumference. They were armed at the lesser end with a sharp prickle for driving the oxen, and at the other end with a small spade, or paddle of iron, strong and massy, for cleansing the plough from the clay that encumbers it in working. May we not from hence conjecture, that it was with such a goad as one of these that Shamgar made that prodigious slaughter related of him, Judges iii. 21. I am confident that whoever should see one of these instruments, would judge it to be a weapon not less fit, perhaps fitter, than a sword for such an execution. Goads of this sort I saw always used hereabouts, and also in Syria; and the reason is, because the same single person both drives the oxen, and also holds and manages the plough; which makes it necessary to use such a goad as is above described, to avoid the incumbrance of two instruments."

From Homer, (Iliad vi. line 130, &c.) it should seem that the ox-goads used in his time and country were of a similar kind; since he there describes the votaries of Bacchus as pursued and slain by Lycurgus with an ox-goad.—En

^c It is very certain that Joshua burnt the city Hazor, and slew the king thereof, whose name in like manner was Jabin, which might possibly be the common name to all the kings of the country, as those of Egypt were called Pharaoh. But it seems not improbable, that this Hazor might be retaken, and rebuilt by its ancient inhabitants, and this king might be a descendant of the other. Some, indeed, interpret the words thus: That this Jabin was king of that part of Canaan which lay in the country where Hazor formerly stood, and whose seat then was at Harosheth of the Gentiles; for they understand this place to be mentioned in the text, as the dwelling-place, not of Sisera, but of Jabin himself, whose general Sisera was. But there is no reason for this inversion of the order of the words, since the Canaanites might, between the time of Joshua and Deborah, find frequent opportunities, considering the corruption and idleness of the Israelites, to re-establish their ancient kingdom in these parts, to rebuild their former capital, and to set up one of the old royal line to be their king; who, according to the common usages of those ages, retained one and the same name with his predecessors.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2. c. 6.

^d This Sisera, as Josephus informs us, was a very great favourite of the king, for the services he had done in reducing the Israelites, whom he worsted upon several encounters, time after time, and would never give over the pursuit, till he brought them at last to be absolute slaves, and tributaries to his master.—Antiquities, b. 5. c. 6.

^e This is the sense of those obscure passages in the song of Deborah: 'For the divisions of Reuben there were great thoughts of heart. Why abodest thou among the sheepfolds, to hear the beatings of the flocks? Gilead abode beyond Jordan, and why did Dan remain in ships? Asher continued on the sea shore, and abode in his creeks,' &c. (Judges v. 15, &c.)

^f The words prophet and prophetess, are of very ambiguous signification in both Testaments: sometimes they denote persons extraordinarily inspired by God, and endued with the power of working miracles, and foretelling things to come; and sometimes they are used for persons endued with special, though not miraculous gifts or graces, for the better understanding and explaining the word of God; and of this sort were the sons of the prophets, or such as were brought up in the schools of the prophets. As, therefore, we read nothing of any miraculous action that Deborah did, she perhaps was only a woman of eminent holiness, and prudence, and knowledge of the holy Scripture, by which she was singularly qualified to judge the people, that is, to determine causes and controversies among them, according to the word of God. For though Jabin oppressed them sorely, yet it was rather by rigorous taxations, than infringing their laws, which he still suffered to be administered by their own officers; and of this he might take the less notice, because the supreme judicature was exercised by a woman, from whose power and authority he thought there was no reason to apprehend any danger; though this certainly gave her an opportunity of endearing herself to the people, and made her, by this means, the fitter an instrument to rescue them from oppression.—Pool's Annotations.

a woman of great eminence, and who, for some time had administered justice to the neighbouring tribes, sent to Barak, the son of Abinoam, a message from God, that he should get together 10,000 men of the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali, and march them to ^a Mount Tabor, whither Sisera, with all his numerous army, coming to give him battle, should infallibly be routed. Barak readily agreed to the motion, upon condition that the prophetess would go with him: and so having mustered up all his complement of forces, they both went together, and posted themselves upon Mount Tabor. Sisera had soon intelligence of this, and, getting a powerful army together, he made hasty marches from ^b Harosheth; passed the ^c river Kishon; and encamped at the foot of the mountain, in hopes of cutting off Barak's retreat. Upon this Deborah advised Barak not to stay till Sisera came up to him, but early next morning, to march directly down, and fall upon him, with all the assurance imaginable of success. The Hebrew general followed her directions; and coming down upon the enemy before they were aware, he charged them with such fury, ^d whilst God, at the same time, by a driving storm of rain and hail in their faces, struck with such terror, that they were not able to stand before the Israelites, but were soon broken, and put to flight. The pursuit, however, continued all day; and as the night approached, the stars shone with an uncommon brightness, to give light to the pursuers; and the river Kishon, ^e being swelled with the hasty rain, drowned the pursued, and carried the dead bodies away towards the Mediterranean sea.

Sisera, in the mean time, seeing his whole army broken and dispersed, quitted his chariots, and was making his escape on foot, when Jael, the wife of Heber

^a Tabor is a very remarkable mountain in Galilee, not far from Kadesli, in the tribe of Zebulun, and in the confines of Issachar and Naphtali. It has its name from its eminence, because it rises up in the midst of a wide champaign country, called 'the valley of Jezreel,' or 'the great plain' (Esdraclon), two leagues south-east of Nazareth. Josephus tells us, that the height of this mountain is thirty stadia, and that on the top of it, there is a beautiful plain of twenty stadia in circumference.—[According to the statements of Burekhardt and Buckingham, it appears to be 1400 or 1500 feet high, and is represented as entirely calcareous. Dr Richardson describes it as a dark-looking, insulated, conical mountain, rising like a tower to a considerable height above those around it.—Ed.]

By all which it appears how commodious a place this mountain was, to be the rendezvous of Barak's forces, since it stood upon the confines of so many different tribes, was not accessible by the enemies' horses and chariots, and had, on the top of it, a spacious plain, where he might conveniently marshal and discipline his army. What modern travellers tell us of this mountain is much to the same purpose:—"After a very laborious ascent," says Mr Maundrell, "we reached the highest part of the mountain, which has a plain area at top, fertile and delicious, and of an oval figure, about one furlong in breadth, and two in length. This area is enclosed with trees on all parts, except towards the south, and from hence you have a prospect, which (if nothing else) well rewards the labour of ascending it; for it is impossible for the eyes of man to behold any greater gratification of this nature. The top of this mountain was anciently environed with walls and trenches, and other fortifications, of which some remains are still visible; and, for many ages, it has been believed that here it was that our blessed Saviour was transfigured, in the presence of his three apostles, Peter, James, and John, though some late writers have made a doubt of it.—Calm's Commentary, Poole's Annotations, and Maundrell's Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem.

^b A place situate upon the lake Semechon, in the Upper Galilee, and is in Scripture called 'Harosheth of the Gentiles,' because the people of several nations fled thither to be under Jabin's protection, when they heard that he had possessed himself of that country, and kept the Israelites out of it.—Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

^c This river rises up out of Mount Tabor, and passing along the valley of Jezreel, now the plain of Esdraclon, empties itself into the Mediterranean Sea. Some geographers will needs have it, that this river runs two ways, partly westward into the Mediterranean, and partly eastward, into the Sea of Galilee: but this is a thing incredible, and what is known of no other river in the world; and therefore, if there be any thing in it, the matter must be this,—that, from Mount Tabor, as it happens from many other hills, there flow waters out of its two sides, some shaping their course westward, to the Mediterranean, and others eastward, into the Sea of Galilee: so that there are two spring heads, and two distinct rivers, though both arising from the same mountain, and perhaps both called by the same name. But whatever becomes of the river that runs eastward, it is plain, from another passage, that the Kishon which is mentioned in Scripture, ran westward into the Mediterranean sea; for when Elijah had convinced the people assembled together at Mount Carmel, that Baal was not the true God, he enjoined them to seize all his priests, and to bring them down to the brook Kishon, there to be slain (1 Kings xviii.) So that the brook Kishon, which rises out of Mount Tabor, must run by Mount Carmel, which stands on the seashore: and as Carmel stands west of Mount Tabor, the course of this river, which extends from the one to the other, must be so likewise.—Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2. c. 6.

[After a course of thirty miles it falls into the Mediterranean at a place called Caïpha, in a gulf formed by Mount Carmel and the Point of Acre. Near the mouth of this river, in the same gulf, another smaller stream discharges itself, which was called by the ancients Belus, and was celebrated for its sands, which were used in making glass. It is at present called Nahr Haloro.]—Ed.

^d Josephus relates the matter of God's interposition in this action in the following words:—"The armies were no sooner engaged, but there arose a violent wind, with a most impetuous tempest of hail and rain along with it. The storm, driving just in the face of the Canaanites, made not only their bows and slings useless, but their weapons likewise designed for close fight; for they could not so much as open their eyes against the weather; and their fingers were so benumbed with cold, too, that they could not handle their arms. In the conclusion, it came to pass, that the Canaanites' army was broken, dispersed, and cut to pieces: so that betwixt those that fell by the sword, and those that were trampled to death under the horses' feet, those that were torn to pieces by the chariots, and those that fled away, and fell into the hands of the Israelites in their flight, this prodigious army, which, according to our author, consisted of thirty thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and three thousand armed chariots, was, in effect, totally destroyed."—Antiquities, b. 5. c. 6.

^e Mr Maundrell tells us, that in the condition wherein he saw this river, its waters were low and inconsiderable; but in passing along the side of the plain, he discerned the tracts of many lesser torrents falling down into it from the mountains, which must needs make it swell exceedingly upon sudden rains.—Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem.

^f He was of the posterity of Hobab, the son of Jethro, father-in-law of Moses, and is here called a Kenite, because originally he descended from those people who dwelt westward of the Dead Sea, and extended themselves pretty far into Arabia Petraea. The word Ken, from whence they took their name, signifies a nest, a hole, or a cave; and to this the prophet might allude, when he addresses himself to them in these words: 'Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou puttest thy nest on a rock: nevertheless the Kenite shall be wasted, until Ashur shall carry thee away captive, Num. xxiv. 21. These Kenites, indeed, were some of the people whose lauds God had promised to the descendants of Abraham; nevertheless, in consideration of Jethro, all that submitted to the Israelites were permitted to live in their own country. In Num. x. 29, we find that Hobab was invited by Moses to accompany him into the land of Canaan, and, in all probability, he accepted the invitation. At their first coming, they settled themselves in the territories of Jericho; but having contracted a particular friendship with the tribe of Judah, they removed with them into the Kenite, seeing him coming, went to meet him, and invited him into her tent; ^a which he readily accepted, as apprehending no danger from her whose husband was his master's ally. The fatigue of the day had made him very thirsty, and therefore he entreated Jael to give him a little water; but when, instead of water, she had given him as much milk as he desired; ^b and he had strictly charged her to deny him, in case that any body should inquire for him, he laid himself down to rest. No sooner was he well asleep, but Jael, taking an hammer and a long tent-nail, set it to his temple, and, struck with such a force, that it quite pierced through his head, and pinned him to the ground; and when Barak, in pursuit of him, came that way, she called him in, and showed him the place and posture in which his enemy lay.

This victory, which was followed ^c with new successes every day, put an end to the oppression of the north for forty years. It proved the utter ruin of this kingdom of the Canaanites in Hazor: and, upon many accounts, was attended with so many signal events, that the prophetess Deborah composed a triumphant song in commemoration of it, ^d wherein she magnifies the deliv-

the country that fell to their lot, (Judges i. 16.) Every family of them did not so: for this Heber we find, for some reasons that are not mentioned, had settled his habitation in the tribe of Naphtali, (Judges i. 11.) The Kenites indeed, although they were proselytes, and worshipped the true God according to the Mosaic law, yet being strangers by birth, and so not pretending to any right or title to the land of Canaan, held it best policy, in these troublesome times, to observe a neutrality, and maintain peace, as well as they could, both with the Israelites and Canaanites; and upon this foot it was, that there was a peace between king Jabin and the house of Heber, and that Sisera, in his distress, fled to Heber's tent for protection, and put confidence in the feigned civilities of his wife.—Howell's History of the Bible.

^a Judges iv. 17—20. Pococke, giving an account of the manner in which he was treated in an Arab tent, in his journey to Jerusalem, says, his conductor led him two or three miles to his tent, and that there he sat with his wife and others, round a fire. "The Arabs are not so scrupulous as the Turks about their women, and though they have their harem, or women's part of the tent, yet such as they are acquainted with come into it. I was kept in the harem for greater security; the wife being always with me, no stranger ever daring to come into the women's apartment, unless introduced." (Vol. 2. p. 5.) Nothing can be a better comment on this passage than this story.

^b Judges iv. 19. "And she opened a bottle of milk, and gave him drink." Jael certainly showed her regard to Israel by destroying Sisera, but it is as certain that she did not do it in the most honourable manner: there was treachery in it; perhaps in the estimation of those people, the greatest treachery. Among the later Arabs, giving a person a drink has been thought to be the strongest assurance of their receiving him under their protection. When Guy de Lusignan, king of Jerusalem, was taken prisoner, and was conducted before Saladin, he demanded drink, and they gave him fresh water, which he drank in Saladin's presence: but when one of his lords would have done the same, Saladin would not suffer it, because he did not intend to spare his life; on the contrary, advancing to him, after some expostulation, he cut off his head.—D'Herbelot, p. 371; Harmer, vol. 2. p. 469, p. 175.

^c Josephus farther acquaints us, that immediately after this victory, Barak marched with his army towards Hazor, where he encountered Jabin by the way, and slew him; and having killed the king, laid the city level with the ground, and afterwards governed Israel for a matter of forty years.—Antiquities, b. 5. c. 6.

^d Dr Hales, in his Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii, second edition, has given a new and beautiful translation of this song, more literal and elegant than the common English version. The translations of Boothroyd and Kennicott are also excellent, although the arrangement of the latter is too artificial; there is nothing more elegant and sublime than this song in the whole erance it wrought, by recounting the many calamities which the Israelites before laboured under; acknowledges its proceeding from the same divine Being, who descended in great majesty to give the law on Mount Sinai; calls upon all those who partook in the benefits of it, to join in the praises of its great Author; commends those tribes that came readily to the war, and upbraids all those who declined their country's service.

During this forty years' peace, the people again rebelled against God, and God took the punishment of them into his own hands, by sending upon them a grievous famine, wherein several were forced to remove into strange countries; and, among the rest, ^f one Elimelech, a man of Bethlehem, with his wife Naomi, and his two sons, Mahlon and Chilion, went into the land of Moab to live. Elimelech died there, and his relic married her sons to two women of the country, whose names were Orpah and Ruth. About two years after this, Naomi's two sons died, and she, resolving to return to her own country, desired her daughters-in-law to remain in Moab. Orpah, with tears, took leave of her mother; but Ruth could, by no means, be persuaded to part with her; and therefore she accompanied her to Bethlehem, where, by ^g her mother's art and contrivance, she so managed the matter, that she married Boaz, by whom she had Obed, who was the father of Jesse, and the grandfather of David, and from whom, according to the flesh, the Saviour of the world was lineally descended.

range of sacred poetry, and neither Homer nor Virgil have come near it.—Ed.

^e Judges v. 30. 'Have they not divided the prey: to Sisera a prey of divers colours, a prey of divers colours of needlework, of divers colours of needlework on both sides.' This allusion in the triumphant song of Deborah is to the richest part of the spoil, which was highly esteemed by the people. Pliny mentions a great variety of them, both in his own and in ancient times; for he takes notice, that Homer speaks of painted garments, which shone in flowers and trees in beautiful colours. The Phrygians afterwards wrought these with needles, and Attalus invented the interweaving of gold into them. But, for these garments, Babylon was above all places famous; from whence they had the name of Babylonish garments; and were much valued, (Josh. vii.) It appears from Homer, (Il. vi. line 289, &c.) that the women of Sidon were famous for such kind of variegated works before the Trojan war. We find that Helen and Andromache were employed on such at their looms.—Ed.

^f The book of Ruth, which takes its title from the person whose story is there principally recorded, is properly an appendix to the book of Judges, and an introduction to that of Samuel; and is therefore not only placed between them, but supposed to be wrote by one and the same hand. Its subject is very different from the rest, and is therefore made a distinct treatise. It is indeed of so private a nature, that at the time of its being wrote, the generality of the people might have thought it not worth recording; but we Christians may plainly see the wisdom of God in having it done. It had been foretold to the Jews, that the Messiah should be of the tribe of Judah, and it was afterwards revealed farther, that he should be of the family of David; and therefore it was necessary, for the full understanding of these prophecies, that the history of the family of David, in that tribe, should be written before these prophecies were revealed, that so there might not be the least suspicion of any fraud or design. And thus this book, these prophecies, and the accomplishment of them, serve to illustrate and explain each other.—Bedford's Scrip. Chron., b. 5. c. 5.

^g The whole management of this affair is recorded in the book of Ruth, to which we refer our reader, having less reason to be prolix in a matter that concerns a private family only, and what had not been related in such a particular manner, but for the reasons that we have already assigned.

After the death of Deborah and Barak, the Israelites fell again into their old impiety, and were again given up into the hand of their enemies. The Midianites were a people situated on the east side of the river Jordan, whom the children of Israel, in their passage to the land of Canaan, ¹ had almost totally destroyed; but it is not improbable, that some of that nation, saving themselves by flight into other countries, and after the Israelites were settled in Canaan returning thither again, might, in the space of 200 years, repossess the land where they dwelt before, and still retain the name of Midianites. These people, together with their neighbours, the Amalekites, ^a and some other eastern nations, for seven years, kept the Israelites in such subjection, that they were forced to betake themselves to the mountains, and to dwell in dens and caves, and fortified places, from whence, as the spring came on, they stole out to cultivate and sow their land; but all to no purpose: for towards the time of harvest, these enemies made inroads into the country, and having destroyed the increase of the earth, and killed all the cattle which fell into their hands, they then returned home, and left the poor Israelites nothing to support themselves withal. Upon this sore calamity, the people began to be sensible of their apostasy, and to humble themselves under the afflicting hand of God; whereupon God ^b sent them a prophet who reproached them sharply with their base ingratitude; but at the same time, ^c sent his angel to

^a Though the Midianites were the principal people concerned in these invasions and inroads, yet, besides the Amalekites, they had other confederate nations, who are called 'the children of the east,' (Judges vi. 3, 33,) by whom we may understand the Ammonites and Moabites, as lying east of the land of Israel, if not the Ishmaelites, and others that inhabited the parts of Arabia. The children or people of the east, in Gen. xxix. 1. denote the inhabitants of Mesopotamia; but these seem to be too far distant to have any part in these incursions; and therefore since we read, (Gen. xxv. 6.) that Abraham sent away the sons of his concubines, particularly the sons of Keturah, one whereof was Midian, the father of the Midianites, eastward, into the east country, it may not improbably be inferred, that by 'the children of the east,' in this history of Gideon, are denoted the descendants of the other sons of Keturah, and of the other brothers of Midian, who had settled themselves in the eastern parts adjoining to Midian.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament.

^b Who this prophet was, we have no manner of intimation given us. The Jews generally fancy that he was Phinehas; but Phinehas must by this time have been above five hundred years old, which far exceeded the stated period of human life then. St Austin is of opinion, that he was the same with the angel which soon after appeared to Gideon; but it is far more likely, that God still continued other prophets among the Israelites, besides the high priest, to put them in mind of their duty, and to call them to repentance, when they forsook him: for, from the case of Deborah, who is said to have had the spirit of prophecy, it appears, that at least in extraordinary cases, God failed not to raise up such persons among them. It is remarked, however, of this prophet, be he who he will, that he gave the Israelites no hopes of the divine assistance, but only upbraided them with their sins. However, when he tells them, that their calamities were occasioned by their idolatry, he plainly intimates, that if they would return to the true worship of God, he would again look graciously upon them and deliver them; and accordingly we find, that the history of their deliverance immediately follows.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^c That he was not a mere created angel, is plain from the incommunicable name, Jehovah, which he assumes, and whereby he suffers himself so frequently to be called, (Judges, vi. 14, 16, 23, 24, 25, 27.) And therefore the Jews, according to their Targum, which styles him 'the Word of the Lord,' look Gideon, the son of Joash, who dwelt at ^d Ophrah, and was then thrashing out his corn, in a private and unsuspected place, the better to conceal it from the deprecation of the enemy.

To him the angel signified the purport of his message, which was to acquaint him, that the Lord had made choice of him for the deliverance of his people. Gideon at first excused himself upon account of the obscurity of his family and fortune; and when the angel urged the thing, he desired of him some token of the divine mission, and at the same time, requested him to accept of a small entertainment from his hands. ^e The angel seemed not to refuse the invitation, whereupon Gideon hastened, and having boiled a kid, and made some unleavened cakes, he spread a table, and set them before him; but the angel ordered him to take them hence, and place them upon a rock hard by, and so pour the broth upon them, which, though it might seem a little strange, Gideon did; and, as soon as the angel had touched them with the staff that was in his hand, immediately there issued fire out of the rock, which consumed them, whilst himself, at the same time, vanished out of sight.

Convinced by this miracle, that it was a messenger from heaven who appeared to him, Gideon began to fear, as the notion then was, that he should not long survive it; but being assured by the angel, though then invisible, that no harm should befall him, he built a monument, which he called Jehovah-shalom, that is, the Lord of peace, in commemoration of this gracious interview; and being that night admonished in a dream to destroy the altar of Baal, and cut down the grove that surrounded it; to build an altar to God upon the top of this wonderful rock, and to offer a burnt-sacrifice to him with one of his father's bullocks, he readily obeyed: and taking ten of his father's servants with him, he demolished the one, and erected the other by next morning; choosing the night to do it in, that he might meet with no obstruct-upon this angel, not merely as a heavenly messenger sent from God, but as the Son of God himself, appearing in the form of an angel.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d Gideon was of the family of Abiezer, of the tribe of Manasseh; and so the Ophrah where he dwelt must be understood to be situated in the half tribe of Manasseh, on the west side of Jordan; and for this reason it is styled 'Ophrah of the Abiezrites,' (Judges viii. 32.) to distinguish it from another Ophrah that lay in the tribe of Benjamin.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3. c. 6.

^e Judges vi. 19. And Gideon went in, and made ready a kid, and unleavened cakes of an ephah of flour: the flesh he put in a basket, and he put the broth in a pot, and brought it out to him under the oak, and presented it.' There is one passage in Dr Shaw, that affords a perfect commentary on this text. It is in his preface, (p. 12.) "Besides a bowl of milk, and a basket of figs, raisins, or dates, which, upon our arrival, were presented to us to stay our appetites, the master of the tent where we lodged, fetched us from his flock, according to the number of our company, a kid, or a goat, a lamb, or a sheep; half of which was immediately seethed by his wife, and served up with uscasoo: the rest was cut into pieces and roasted; which we reserved for our breakfast or dinner next day.

May we not imagine that Gideon, presenting some slight refreshment to the supposed prophet, according to the present Arab mode, desired him to stay till he could provide something more substantial for him; that he immediately killed a kid, seethed part of it, cut into pieces and roasted another part of it, and when it was ready, brought out the stewed meat in a pot, with unleavened cakes of bread which he had baked; the roasted pieces in a basket for his carrying away with him for some after repast in his journey.—Harmer, vol. 1. p. 330.—ED.

tion. On the morrow, when the people understood that Gideon was the person who had put this affront upon Baal, they came and demanded him of his father, that they might put him to death; but, instead of complying with their demand, his father's answer was, 'that a if Baal was a god, it was his business, and not theirs, to avenge his own quarrel;' and from this answer, where-with he appeased the tumult, Gideon ever after obtained the name of Jerub-baal, that is, the opposer of Baal.^b

About this time the Midianites and their company, c passing over the river Jordan, came and encamped in d the valley of Jezreel; upon which Gideon, being moved by a divine impulse, summoned all those of his own family to take up arms first, and then sent messengers to several adjacent tribes, exhorting them to shake off the yoke of the Midianites, and to join with him; which accordingly they did, and came in such numbers, that, in a short time, his army amounted to two and thirty thousand men, though small in comparison of the enemy's forces, which consisted of no less than a hundred and thirty-five thousand.

As soon as each tribe's complement of men was arrived, Gideon, being willing to satisfy them that he did not act this on his own head, but was the person appointed by heaven to be their leader and deliverer, desired of God to give them some token of his commission; and the token which he made choice of was,—that upon his lay-a It is generally supposed that Gideon's father had been a worshipper if not a priest of Baal; and therefore it is not unlikely, that he had by this time been convinced by his son, that God had given him a commission to recover his people, and to begin with this reformation; and this made him appear so boldly in his son's cause, because he knew it was the cause of God.—Poole's Annotations, and Patrick's Commentary.

b Boothroyd renders this passage, (Judges vi. 31,) as follows: 'And Joash said to all that stood against him, will ye contend for Baal? Should ye preserve him who hath contended with him, he will die ere morning. If he be a god he will contend for himself, with him who hath broken down his altar.' And adds in a note: "I have adhered to the order of the text, and the sense given, I am satisfied, is that intended. The common version is contradictory; it makes Joash propose, that he who pleadeth for Baal, should be immediately put to death, and then assert that Baal would plead for himself." "I have followed Menochius, (see Poole) and consider the meaning to be, 'If Baal be really a god, ye need not avenge his quarrel, or desire the death of my son; Baal will speedily avenge himself; and you will see the demolisher of his altar die a sudden death.'"—Ed.

c That is, 'the Amalekites and the children of the east.' (Jud. vi. 3.) This included the posterity of Abraham's sons by Keturah, of whom the Midianites were the principal nation, and appear to have taken the lead in the enterprise here recorded. (Jud. xxv. 6.) It also included the Ishmaelites, (Jud. viii. 24.) who had settled in the vicinity of the Midianites in the wilderness of Paran, (Gen. xxxvii. 28. xxi. 21.)—Ed.

d The city of Jezreel, which gave name to the valley, belonged to the half tribe of Manasseh, on the west of Jordan, and lay in the confines of that half tribe and the tribe of Issachar, as appears from Josh. xix. 18. In the history of the kings of Israel, this city is frequently made mention of, where, by reason of the pleasantness of its situation, some of them had a royal palace, though their capital was Samaria. The vale of Jezreel, which, as we said before, is now called the plain of Esdraelon, is, according to Mr Mamdrell, of a vast extent, [It is estimated at thirty miles in length and twenty in breadth.] very fertile, but uncultivated, and only serving the Arabs for pasturage; but some have supposed, that the valley of Jezreel here mentioned, denotes some other lesser valley, lying between Mount Hermon and Mount Gilboa.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2. c. 6.

ing a fleece of wool on the ground, e the dew might be upon the fleece only, and the earth round about it be dry, which accordingly happened; and then, inverting the former manner, he desired that the fleece might be dry, while the ground all around it was wet; which accordingly came to pass likewise. f Confirmed by these signs, that it was the will of God that he should enter upon action, Gideon marched directly to the camp of the Midianites, who then lay in the plain of Jezreel; but before he came thither, God rightly foreseeing, that if this army conquered the Midianites, they would vainly impute it to their own courage or numbers, and not to his assistance, ordered Gideon to make proclamation in the camp, that whoever was diffident of the success of the undertaking, should have liberty to return home. g Whereupon 22,000 quitted the field, so that 10,000 only remained with him. It might be thought possible, however, for these 10,000 to defeat the army of the Midianites; and, therefore, God, resolving that the glory of the whole victory should be accounted his own, ordered

e He supposed that the dew which was distilled from heaven, was a divine gift, as the Scripture after testifies, and therefore he desired that it might be directed by God, that though it commonly falls everywhere, by his extraordinary providence, it might now water only his fleece. Some are apt to think, that he chose a fleece for this purpose, not only because it was ready at hand, but the better to express how the land was shorn by the Midianites, even as the sheep had been by him; that when he begged the dew, as a sign of the divine favour, might fall upon the fleece, it was to represent the kindness of God to him; and when he begged it might fall upon the whole ground, to represent his favour to all the people. But there is farther reason why he might desire to have the miracle inverted: for, as it is in the very nature of the wool to draw moisture to it, some might be apt to think, that there was no great matter in this; and, therefore, he requested of God a second miracle, which was contrary to the former.—Patrick's Commentary.

f Judges vi. 38. 'And it was so: for he rose up early on the morrow, and thrust the fleece together, and wrung the dew out of the fleece, a bowl full of water.' It may seem a little improbable to us, who inhabit these northern climates, where the dews are inconsiderable, how Gideon's fleece, in one night, should contract such a quantity, that when he came to wring it, a bowl full of water was produced. Irwin, in his voyage up the Red Sea, when on the Arabian shores, says, "difficult as we find it to keep ourselves cool in the daytime, it is no easy matter to defend our bodies from the damps of the night, when the wind is loaded with the heaviest dews that ever fell; we lie exposed to the whole weight of the dews, and the cloaks in which we wrap ourselves, are as wet in the morning as if they had been immersed in the sea."—p. 87.

g The text reads, 'Whosoever is afraid let him return, and depart early from Mount Gilead.' Gideon, however, was certainly not at Mount Gilead at this time, but rather near Mount Gilboa. Gilead was on the other side of Jordan. Calmet thinks there must either have been two Gileads, which does not from Scripture appear to be the case, or that the Hebrew text is here corrupted, and that for Gilead, we should read Gilboa. This reading, though adopted by Houbigant and Le Clerc, whom Boothroyd follows, is not countenanced by any MS., nor by any of the versions. Dr Hales endeavours to reconcile the passage as it stands with the circumstances of the case, by the supposition that there were in Gideon's army many of the eastern Manassites, who came from Mount Gilead; and that these probably were more afraid of their neighbours, the Midianites, than the western tribes were; and therefore proposes to read the text thus: 'Whosoever from Mount Gilead is fearful and afraid, let him return (home) and depart early. So there returned (home) 22,000 of the people.' Dr Adam Clarke thinks this perhaps, on the whole, the best method of solving the difficulty—the intelligent reader will form his own opinion.—See Clarke and Boothroyd on the passage, and Hales' Analysis, vol. 1. p. 424—425, and vol. 2. p. 251.—Ed.

Gideon ^a to lead the soldiers down to the water to drink, where he would give him a signal what men were fit for his purpose, and what not; and the signal was this,—That they who ^b took up water in their hands, and lapped it, should go with him; but they who laid themselves down to drink, should be dismissed; which experiment reduced them to no more than 300.

These 300 men he ordered to hold themselves in readiness, and to have every one a trumpet, a lamp, and an empty pitcher to conceal the light which the lamp would otherwise give; and while they were providing themselves with these, he took his servant with him, and went down to the enemies' camp, where he heard a Midianite relating his dream to his companion, which the other interpreted in Gideon's favour; so that returning to the camp, he drew his men out, and dividing them into three companies of 100 men each, he came upon the enemy ^c in the dead time of the night. The watchword was, 'the sword of the Lord and of Gideon;' and as every

^a Mr Le Clerc is of opinion, that the sacred historian has omitted one circumstance, which, nevertheless, in the very nature of the thing is implied, namely, that Gideon, when he led his men down to the water, did forbid them to make use of any cup or pot, or such like thing: for he thinks it incongruous (as well he may) that among such a number as 10,000 men, no one should be furnished with some drinking vessel or other. But then, had any of these been permitted to be used upon this occasion, the experiment could not have been made.—Comment. on Judges vii. 6.

^b Interpreters are at a sad puzzle to conceive, for what possible reason God made a distinction between the soldiers who lapped water in their hands, and those that laid themselves down to drink. Some of the Jewish doctors are of opinion, that all except 300 who lapped, had been accustomed to the worship of Baal, which they unwarily discovered by their kneeling to drink: but this is a groundless and far-fetched conceit. The notion of those who impute these 300 men's lapping, some to their sloth and laziness, and others to their timorousness, and the great fear they were in of being surprised by the enemy, is of no more validity: for though God, if he thought fit, might have employed the most dastardly among them upon this expedition, that the glory of the victory might entirely redound to himself; yet, since we are told all the fearful persons were dismissed before, and since it but badly befits the character of the courageous to be lazy, this action of lapping is rather to be accounted a token of their temperance, and of the nobleness of their spirit, which made them so desirous to engage the enemy, that they would not stay to drink, but, though they were very thirsty, contented themselves to moisten their mouths, as we say, with a little water: whereas the rest indulged themselves so far, as to drink their bellyful. But, after all, the true reason and design of this method seems to be only this,—That God was minded to reduce Gideon's army to a very small number, which might very likely be done by this means. For, as the season of the year was hot, and the generality of the soldiers weary, thirsty, and faint, it was most probable, that they would lie down, as indeed they did, and refresh themselves plentifully, and scarce to be expected that any great number would deny themselves in this matter.—Patrick's Commentary, and Saurin's Gideon's defeat of the Midianites.

^c The expression in the text is, 'in the beginning of the middle watch;' for though the Romans, in after ages, divided the night into four watches, (Mat. xiv. 25.), yet, in the eastern parts, and in more ancient times, it consisted but of three, whereof the first began at six, and continued four hours. The second, therefore, is called the 'middle watch,' and began at ten; so that we may suppose, that it was some time after this, that Gideon alarmed the Midianitish camp; and the reasons why he chose this part of the night to do it in, are obvious, because the trumpets would then seem to sound louder, and the lights to shine brighter, and so both increase the consternation of the enemy, and conceal the smallness of his own army.—Poole's Annotations.

soldier had directions to do as his general did, they all broke their pitchers, brandished their lamps, and sounded their trumpets together.

The Midianites, hearing so many trumpets, and seeing so many lights at once, supposed themselves to be attacked by a formidable army; and so rising in a fright, and mistaking their friends for their enemies, ^d they fell upon one another, until they had put every thing into the utmost confusion. By this means, Gideon having obtained an easy victory, sent to the rest of the army, who, upon his proclamation, had withdrawn themselves, some to pursue the routed enemy, and others to secure the passes of the river Jordan, in order to prevent their retreat.

The passes, however, could not all be secured; so that some of the enemy's troops having made a shift to cross the river, Gideon, with his 300 men, pressed hard after them, while the other part of the army destroyed those who stayed behind; and having taken the two Midianitish princes, ^e Oreb and Zeeb, they cut off their heads, and sent them to Gideon.

Gideon, in the mean time, and his small party, were in full chase of two other princes of Midian, Zeba, and Zalmumma; and when he came to Succoth and Penuel, two towns on the other side of Jordan, in the tribe of Gad, he desired of them some provision for his men, because they were faint and weary; but instead of giving him any refreshment, they ridiculed the smallness of his army; for which insolence he vowed to be revenged of them, upon his return. Continuing his pursuit, therefore, with his small fatigued party, he came up with the enemy at Karcor, where the two Midianitish kings, thinking that they had now sufficiently escaped, were regardless of all danger; but Gideon falling upon them unexpectedly, surprised and defeated them, and having taken them prisoners, carried them in triumph with him into Succoth, where he executed the vengeance which he had threatened, by crushing the princes of that place to death, under thorns and briars, killing the people of Penuel, and demolishing its fortifications. Zeba and Zalmumma, in their march, had laid all the country waste, and put many to the sword, otherwise Gideon was inclinable to have shown them some mercy; but understanding by their own confession, that they had slain his brethren at Tabor, he

^d There might be several reasons for their doing this:—Either because the night was so dark that they could not distinguish friends from foes; or because the thing was so sudden, that it struck them with horror and amazement; or because they suspected treachery, as they might easily do, since the army consisted of several nations, (Jud. vi. 3.), or because God had infatuated them, as he had many others on the like occasions.—Poole's Annotations.

^e As the language of the Ishmaelites, the Midianites, and the Amalekites, who dwell in Arabia, was originally the same, because they all descended from Abraham, their common father; so we may infer, that there was little or no difference in them at this time. Oreb, in the Hebrew, signifies a crow, and Zeeb, a wolf; and these are no improper words to represent the sagaciousness and fierceness which should be in two such great commanders. Nor was it an uncommon thing for great families, in ancient times, to derive their names from such like creatures, either as omens, or monuments of their undaunted courage and dexterity in military achievements. But after all, it seems every whit as probable, that these were only nicknames, which the Israelites gave these two princes of Midian, to denote their fierceness and rapaciousness of prey.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 5. c. 3; Le Clerc's Commentary.

ordered his son Jotham to fall upon them, but as he was but a youth, and seemed a little timorous, ^a he himself despatched them with his own hand, having first ordered them to be stripped of their royal ornaments, ^b and their camels of their rich trappings and furniture.

These great and glorious actions, in defence of his country's liberty, raised Gideon's name to such a height that the people came, and voluntarily offered to settle the government upon him and his family; which he modestly and generously rejecting, and desiring only, as an acknowledgment of his services, to have the pendants or ear-rings taken in the plunder of the Midianites given him, the people readily consented, and, over and above these, threw in the costly ornaments, and the robes of the kings, together with the golden ^c chains, which were about the camels' necks, the whole amounted to a prodigious value; and of these rich materials he made an ephod, and placed it in the city of Ophrah, as a monument only of his victory, though in after times, it came to be perverted to a bad use, gave occasion to a fresh apostasy, and proved the ruin of Gideon's family.

Gideon, while he lived had several wives, by whom, in all, he had seventy sons, besides one by a concubine, ^d whom she named Abimelech. As soon as his father was dead, this Abimelech, who was a bold aspiring youth,

^a In ancient times, it was as much a custom for great men to do execution upon offenders, as it is now a usual thing for them to pronounce sentence upon them. They had not then, as we have now, such persons as the Romans called carnifices, or public executioners; and therefore Saul bade such as waited on him kill the priests; and Doeg, one of his chief officers, did it, (1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18.) But the reason why Gideon would have had his son do this execution, was that he might be early animated against the enemies of Israel, even as Hannibal is reported, when he was a boy, to have been incensed against the Romans. (Patrick's Commentary.) In these ages it would be thought barbarous for a king to command his son to perform an execution like that mentioned in this passage: but anciently it was thought no dishonour. Homer (Odys. b. xxii.) represents Ulysses as enjoining such a task upon his son, which was instantly performed. See also Virgil, Æn. xi. 15.—Ed.

^b Judges viii. 26. 'And purple raiment that was on the kings of Midian.' Purple seems anciently to have been appropriated to kings, and to them only on whom they bestowed it. It is here mentioned by the sacred historian as being found on the Midianitish kings. A garment of fine linen and purple is given to a favourite by king Ahasuerus, (Esther viii. 15.) The Jews made a decree that Simon should wear purple and gold, and that none of the people should wear purple, or a buckle of gold, without his permission, in token that he was the chief magistrate of the Jews, (1 Maccab. xlii.) Thus also Homer describes a king:—

In ample mode

A robe of military purple flow'd

O'er all his frame: illustrious on his breast,

The double clasping gold the king confess'd.

Odys. xix. 261. Pope.

^c The word which we render chains, is in the original, little moons, which the Midianites might wear strung together about their camels' necks, either by way of ornament or superstition, because they, as well as all other people of Arabia, were very zealous worshippers of the moon.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^d What the name of his other sons were, we have no mention made in sacred writ; but the name of this one is particularly set down, because the following story depends upon it: and not only so, but his mother perhaps might give him this name, which signifies, my father a king, out of pride and arrogance, that she might be looked upon as the wife of one who was thought to deserve a kingdom, though he did not accept it; and it is not improbable, that the very sense of this might be one means to inflame the mind of her son afterwards, to affect the royal dignity.—Patrick's Commentary.

tampered with the people of Shechem, the place of his nativity, and where his mother's family had no small interest, to make him their king. They, by his persuasions, were inclinable to do it; and, that he might not want money to carry on his design, furnished him with some out of the treasury of ^e their god Baal-berith, wherewith he hired a company of profligate fellows to attend him. With these he repaired to his father's at Ophrah, and having seized all his brethren, except Jotham the youngest, who made his escape, he slew them all ^f upon one stone, and when he returned to Shechem, instead of meeting with detestation for this unnatural murder, was in a general assembly of the people elected their king.

When young Jotham heard of this, he went upon Mount Gerizim, which overlooks the city of Shechem, and from thence, in a parabolic speech, represented to ^g the people his father's modesty and self-denial, in refus-

^e The learned Bochart is of opinion, that the Baal here mentioned was the same with Berce, the daughter of Venus and Adonis, desired in marriage by Neptune, but given to Bacchus: and that she gave her name to Berith in Phœnicia, where she was much worshipped, and thence translated a goddess into other parts. But though the word Baal, as he maintains, be frequently used in a feminine sense, yet it can hardly be imagined, but that the sacred historian, if he had been minded to express a goddess, might have found out some way of distinguishing her; might have called her, for instance, Bahalah-berith, the lady, or goddess of Berith, without making both the words of a masculine termination. And therefore the most simple and natural manner of explaining the name, is to take it in general for the god who presides over covenants and contracts, to whom it belongs to maintain them, and to punish all those that violate them. For it is to be observed, that the most barbarous as well as the most knowing, the most religious as well as the most superstitious nations, have always looked upon God as the witness, as well as the vindicator of oaths and covenants; that the Greeks had their Zeus Horkios, as well as the Latins their Jupiter Pistius, or Deus Fidius, or Fœcialis, whom they looked upon as a god of honesty and uprightness, always superintending in treaties and alliances. And for this reason not improbably, the house of their god Berith was the citadel, the arsenal, and the treasury of the Shechemites, even as Plutarch informs us, that in the temple of Saturn the Romans reposed both their archives and public wealth.—Bochart, Canaan, b. 2. c. 17.; Pool's Annotations in locum; Calmel's Dictionary under the word Baal-berith; and Jurieu's History of Dogmas and Religions, part 4. c. 1.

^f This stone some will have to be an altar, which Abimelech dedicated to the idol Berith, and erected in the same place where his father Gideon had destroyed his altar before; and so they account that this slaughter of his sons was designed for an expiatory sacrifice of their father's crime in demolishing the altar and grove dedicated to that idol. But this is a little too far-fetched, though there is hardly any other reason to be given, why they should all be murdered upon one and the same stone.—Patrick's Commentary, and Pool's Annotations.

^g This is the first fable that we find any where upon record; and from hence it appears, that such fictions as these, wherein the most serious truths are represented, were in use among the Jews, as they are still in the eastern countries, long before the time of Æsop, or any other author that we know of. Various are the reasons that may be assigned for the first invention of them; but these two seem to be the principal: 1. Because men would suffer themselves to be reprehended in this guise, when they would not endure plain words; and, 2. Because they heard them with delight and pleasure, and remembered them better than any grave or rational discourses.

'The trees went forth on a time, to anoint a king over them,' (so that anointing was in use 200 years before the first kings of Israel:) 'and they said unto the olive-tree, Reign over us. But the olive-tree said unto them, Should I leave my fatness, wherewith by me they honour God and man?' (because oil was offered in sacrifice to God, and fed the lamps of his house, besides all the other uses whereto it was serviceable to man,) 'and go to be pro-

ing to have the government settled on him and his family, which they had now conferred on one, as much inferior in virtue and honour to Gideon, and his lawful sons, as the bramble is to the olive-tree, the fig-tree, or the vine. And then expostulating the injury done his family, and upbraiding them with their ingratitude, he appeals to their consciences, whether they had done right or not, and denounces a curse against them for their siding with Abimelech in all his wicked deed.

Having thus delivered himself to the Shechemites, Jotham made his a escape to Beer, where he lived secure from Abimelech's rage; and it was not long before his curse began to operate. For the people of Shechem, moted over the trees? And the trees said to the fig-tree, Come thou and reign over us. But the fig-tree said to them, Should I forsake my sweetness, and my good fruit, (an apt representation of that content and lushness of pleasure which may be enjoyed in a private life, and cannot without folly be exchanged for the troubles and cares that men meet with in the management of public affairs,) 'and go to be promoted over the trees? Then said the trees unto the vine, Come thou and reign over us. And the vine said unto them, Should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man,' (a form of speech imitated by heathen authors, especially by Virgil, (Georg. b. 2.) where, speaking of some generous vine, he terms it "even beloved by the gods in their carousals," since wine, as well as oil, was used both in Jewish and heathen sacrifices,*) 'and go to be promoted over the trees? Then said all the trees unto the bramble,' (the meanest of all trees, good for nothing but to be burned, and therefore fitly resembling Abimelech, from whom the Shechemites could expect no manner of benefit, but a great deal of trouble and vexation,) 'Come thou, and reign over us. And the bramble said unto the trees, If, in truth, ye anoint me king, then come and put your trust in my shadow,' (an apt emblem of Abimelech's ridiculous vanity, to imagine that he should be able to maintain the authority of a king, any more than the bramble could afford a shadow or shelter,) 'and if not, let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the cedars of Lebanon (words that carry a lively image of Abimelech's ostentatious spirit, and menaces to take severe vengeance on the nobles of Shechem, such as the house of Millo, who had been chiefly instrumental in his promotion, in case they should desert him.) This is the parable, and, in some measure, the interpretation. The only difficulty is, to know whom these trees are set to signify. And here, some have thought, that by the olive-tree we are to understand Othniel; by the fig-tree, Deborah; and by the vine Gideon; for to the two former, they suppose the offer of the kingdom was made for the services done their country, and by them rejected, as well as by the last. But for this there is no authority; neither is there any necessity in the explication of such fables, to assign a particular reason for every image that is drawn in them. It is sufficient if we can but hit off their main intendment, which, in this of Jotham, was to convince the Shechemites of their folly in choosing a man for their king, who was no more able to protect them, than a bramble was to cover other trees that should resort to it, under the shadow of its branches.—Saurin's Dissertations, and Patrick's Commentary.

b This was a city that stood on the northern frontiers of the tribe of Judah, about twelve miles from Jerusalem, in the way to Shechem and Napolze, which did not acknowledge Abimelech for king; and therefore Jotham knew, that he might have sure refuge and protection there. Dr Richardson says, Beer seems to have been once a place of considerable consequence. It has a well of good water, and close to it are the mouldering walls of a ruined Khan, and on the top of the hill two large arches of a ruined convent.—Ed.

c In the text the expression is, 'Then God sent an evil spirit, or spirit of discord, between Abimelech and the men of Shechem,' (Judg. ix. 23.) which, in Scripture, is an usual form of speech, and denotes not any positive action, but a permission only, or, at most, a direction from God. It is observed, however, that this manner of expression may possibly have given rise to some notions in the theology of the heathens, when they suppose, that growing jealous and distrustful of their new king, were for apprehending and killing him, which made him leave the place, and escape for his life. As soon as he was gone, they set up another vile wretch, Gael, the son of Ebed, to be their governor. Under his protection, the people ventured out to reap the fruits of the earth, and having upon this occasion, made themselves merry, they expressed their detestation of Abimelech, and none was more forward than Gael to speak contemptibly of him, and make his boasts what he would do with him, if he could but once catch him. Zebul, whom Abimelech intrusted with his concerns in his absence, gave him intelligence of all that passed, and advised him to come with some forces, before it was too late. Accordingly, he marches all night, divides his army into four parts, and early in the morning had beset the city. Gael, though a very coward, seeing matters reduced to this extremity, marched out with what forces he had, but was soon defeated and slain. Abimelech, next day, stormed the place, and killed all the inhabitants that came in his way; but some having betaken themselves to a fort belonging to the temple of their god Berith, he set fire to it, and destroyed them all together.

During these times of confusion, the town of Thebez, not far distant from Shechem, revolted; and Abimelech, being now flushed with victory, besieged and took it; but the inhabitants flying to a strong tower, c he endeavoured to burn that, as he had done the other, but not with the same success. For while he was encouraging his men, and helping them to set the gate on fire, d a woman threw down a piece of millstone upon him, which the furies are appointed by the gods to sow the seeds of discord among men.

Thus having said, she sinks beneath the ground,
With furious haste, and shoots the Stygian sound,
To rouse Alecto from the infernal seat
Of her dire sisters, and their dark retreat.
This Fury, fit for her intent, she chose;
One who delights in wars and human woes.

And a little lower,

'Tis thine to ruin realms, o'erturn a state,
Betwixt the dearest friends to raise debate,
And kindle kindred blood to mutual hate.
Now shake, from out thy fruitful breast, the seeds
Of envy, discord, and of cruel deeds:
Confound the peace establish'd, and prepare
Their souls to hatred, and their hands to war.

Virgil, Æn. 7.

c Jud. ix. 51. 'But there was a strong tower within the city, and thither fled all the men and women, and all they of the city, and shut it to them.' Besides fortified towns and cities, we find that in the time of the croisades they had towers for the people of open towns to fly to in time of danger. Thus in the reign of Baldwin the Second, when the strength of the kingdom was collected together to the siege of Tyre, the people of Askalon suddenly invaded the country about Jerusalem, and put to the sword the greatest part of the inhabitants of a town called Mahomesia, five or six miles from Jerusalem. But the old men, the women, and the children, betaking themselves to a tower, escaped. (Gesta Dei, per Francos, p. 840.) Towers of this sort appear to have been in use in very early times.—Harmer, vol. 2. p. 239.

d Thus Plutarch relates, that Pyrrhus, at the siege of Argos, was killed by a woman throwing a tile upon his head; but there is something more remarkable in Abimelech's death by a stone, because, as he slew all his brethren upon one stone, for him to die by no other instrument carried some stamp of his sin upon it. The manner of his death, however, puts me in mind of what the same author records of the Spartan general Lysander, who fell ingloriously under the walls of Haliartus. "Thus he died," says fractured his skull; so that finding himself mortally wounded, he called to his armour-bearer to put an end to his life, that it might not be said he died by the hand of a woman. Thus God, in his abundant righteousness, punished both Abimelech and the men of Shechem according to their deserts; and within the space of three years after their crimes were committed, made them the instruments of each others' destruction.

After the death of Abimelech, Tolah the son of Puah, an eminent man of the tribe of Issachar, undertook the government, and continued in it for three and twenty years. He dwelt on Mount Ephraim, near the centre of the country, that the people might with more conveniency, resort to him for judgment; and though there is not much recorded of him, yet he seems to have been a prudent and peaceable man; raised up to reform abuses, to put down idolatry, to appease tumults, and heal the wounds which were given to church and state, during Abimelech's usurpation.

He was succeeded by Jair, a Gileadite, of the tribe of Manasseh, the first governor that was raised up out of any of the tribes beyond Jordan, and who, in the main, seems to have been more solicitous to aggrandize his own family, than to mind the concerns of religion. For during his administration the people not only worshipped Baalim, and Ashtaroth, as they had frequently done before, but adopted the gods likewise of every neighbouring nation, of the Syrians, the Zidonians, the Ammonites, the Moabites, and the Philistines; so that God being enraged against them, incited the Philistines and the Ammonites to invade them on all quarters in one and the same year. Nor did these people make their incursions only upon the tribes that were on the east side of Jordan, but passing the river, gave the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, no small molestation, and by their sundry defeats, made them feel the weight of their power.

The Israelites, finding themselves not able to cope with such powerful enemies, grew sensible of their folly; and, to recover the protection of God, renounced all their idols, and betook themselves to his service in good earnest; whereupon ^b his mercy returning with their repentance, he soon found out means to effect their deliverance.

There was, at that time, in the half tribe of Manasseh, which settled on the east side of Jordan, a man of note among his people, whose name was Gilead, of the family of that Gilead, the son of Machar, to whom Moses gave the ¹ city of Gilead, from whence the family took their name. This man had by his wife several sons, and one ^c by a concubine, whom he named Jephthah; but when his sons grew up, and their father was dead, they expelled Jephthah, as having no right of inheritance with them, so that he was sent to seek his fortune, and, at length, settled in the ^d land of Tob; where, being a man of great courage and bravery, he was soon made the captain of a small army, with whom he used to make excursions into the enemies' country, and sometimes bring off rich spoils.

The Ammonites had now raised a large army with a design to invade the country of Gilead itself. The Gileadites on the other hand, were resolved to defend their country, and, to that purpose, had got together

^b This is the most remarkable repentance and reformation that we meet with in the history of the judges; and it seems to be serious, that in the times of those three governors who succeeded Jephthah, we read nothing of their relapsing into idolatry. And as their repentance was sincere, so the expression of the divine compassion towards them, namely, 'that his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel,' (Judg. x. 16.) is the strongest that we meet with; though every one knows, that the divine nature is not capable of grief properly so called; but the meaning is, that he quite altered his former intention, and in much mercy, resolved, upon their repentance, to deliver them.

^c Several Jewish doctors are of opinion, that the word Zonah may signify either one of another tribe, or, one of another nation; and so Josephus calls Jephthah ξένος ἀπὸ τῶν πατριῶν, a stranger by the mother's side. It is to be observed, however, that among the Jews, if such persons as were deemed strangers embraced the law, their children were capable to inherit among the rest of their brethren. Jephthah indeed complains of the hard usage he met with, but it was upon this occasion, when his country he found stood in need of him; for had he been unjustly dispossessed of his right of inheritance before, we can hardly suppose, that a man of his courage and martial spirit would have sat down contented with his exclusion. It is not to be doubted, therefore, but that he 'was the son of an harlot,' properly so called. But then the question is, why God should make choice of a person of his character for so great an instrument of his glory? To which it may be replied, 1st, That God has prescribed laws to men, but none to himself; and can therefore alter his dispensations as he pleases, according to the circumstances and exigencies of things. 2dly, That as he chooses to act by second causes, he always makes use of such instruments, as, all things considered, are properest for this purpose, without regard to any blemishes, for which they themselves are not accountable; and 3dly, That he might purposely dispense with the law in this case, to show, that those who are basely born, ought not to despond, but by a virtuous and good life, expect a share of God's blessings.—Houel's History, b. 4. in the notes. [Although it is asserted above, that Jephthah's mother was an harlot, this is by no means clear; as, if she was a Canaanite, (which seems very probable, and in addition to this, was only a secondary wife, or concubine,) then Jephthah could not have a title to a share of the inheritance.]—Ed.

^d We read no where else of this country, which very probably was not far from Gilead, upon the borders of the Ammonites, in the entrance of the Arabia Deserta; or perhaps it is the same with what is called Ish-toh, (2 Sam. viii. 6, 8.) which was in Syria, and so near the Ammonites, that they hired forces from thence, as well as from other nations, to fight against David.—Patrick's Commentary.

he, "but not like Cleombrotus, who was slain while he was gloriously making head against an impetuous enemy at Leuctra, not like Cyrus, or Epaminondas, who received a mortal wound, while he was rallying his men, and securing to them the victory. These great men died in their callings. They died the death of kings and commanders: whereas he, like some common soldier, or one of the forlorn hope, cast away his life ingloriously; giving this testimony to the ancient Spartans, that they did not well to avoid storming of walls; in which the stoutest man may chance to fall by the hand, not only of an abject fellow, but by that of a boy, or a woman, as they say Achilles was slain, in the gates of Troy, by the hands of the effeminate Paris."—Patrick's Commentary, and Plutarch's Comp. of Lysonder and Sylla.

^a The reasons which the Scripture gives us to think, that he really did aggrandize his own family, are, 1st, because he is said to have thirty sons, that rode on thirty asses' colts: for as in those days the Israelites had but few chariots, and were not allowed to keep many horses, the most honourable of them were used to be mounted on these creatures, which, in the eastern countries, were much higher, and more beautiful than they are with us. 2dly, 'They had thirty cities or villages, called after their own name, in the land of Gilead.' For as we read that Jair, the son of Manasseh, went and took the small towns of Gilead, and called them Havoth-jair, (Num. xxxii. 41. and Deut. iii. 14.) so we may presume that this Jair who was afterwards judge of Israel, recovered the places which his ancestor conquered, and perhaps added some more to them, that each son of his might have one.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

what forces they could; but then they were at a loss for a general. Jephthah, they knew, was a man of courage and conduct, who had signalized himself on frequent occasions against the enemy; and therefore, in a full assembly of their chiefs, it was resolved to send him an offer of the command of their army. Surprised at this sudden change, and remonstrating a little their former unkindness to him, he consented at last to accept of the command; but it was on this condition, that if he happened to be successful in the war, they should establish him their governor for life, which they readily consented to, and solemnly ratified. Being invested with this power and authority, Jephthah sent ambassadors to the king of Ammon, to demand the reason of his invading the Gileadites; to whom that prince replied, that their land was his, and that the Israelites, in their passage from Egypt, had taken it from his ancestors, which he now intended to recover. Jephthah returned him, by other ambassadors, in answer, that if either conquest or prescription conferred a title, they had a just right to the country they possessed, since they took it, not from them, but from the Amorites, and had, for 300 years, been in quiet possession of it; but all would not do. The Ammonites were resolved upon a war, and Jephthah made all things ready to receive them. But before he took the field, he made a vow, that if he returned with victory, the first thing that came out of his house to meet him, he would certainly offer unto the Lord, which many think was the occasion of the sacrificing his own daughter.^a

However this be, it is certain, that when he returned out of the country of Ammon, where his battles were fought with success, he met with some disturbance at home; for the tribe of Ephraim, not long after, passed the river Jordan, on purpose to pick a quarrel with him, because, as they pretended, he had not sent for them to join the army, and share in the victory. ^b At other times they had been noisy and clamorous enough, but now they proceeded so far as to threaten to burn his house over his head. Jephthah endeavoured what he could to pacify them with good words; but when he found that reasoning would not do, he fell upon them with his army, and put them to flight: and being resolved to hinder them from giving him the like molestation any more, he sent and secured all the passes over Jordan in their way home; so that, as fast as they came thither, if upon examination they owned themselves Ephraimites, they were immediately put to the sword:

^a Judges xi. 30. 'And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord.' Though he did not doubt, yet he supposed that he should be more certain of the victory, if he made a religious vow beforehand, of being grateful to God for it. In this he acted conformably to the general practice of great warriors in all ages. Livy frequently mentions it as the custom of the Roman generals, who used to vow to Jupiter or Apollo part of the spoil they should take in war, or to build temples to their honour. Thus the Israelites, when Arad came against them as they were going to Canaan, made a vow respecting his country, if God would deliver it into their hands.—Num. xxi. 2.

^b Though Gideon had called the Ephraimites to assist in the pursuit of the Midianites, and had given them the advantage of plunder, and the honour of taking Oreb and Zeeb, two princes of Midian, prisoners; yet, because they were not called at first to the battle, they took upon them to reproach him very sharply, which he, like a prudent man, took patiently, and pacified them with good words.—Howell's History, b. 4., in the notes.

if they denied it, they had ^c the test-word Shibboleth given them, which, if they pronounced it Sibboleth, discovered their country, and cost them their lives; inso-much, that what in the field, and what on the banks of the river, no less than ^d 42,000 Ephraimites were slain.

Thus Jephthah, having delivered his country from the attempts both of foreign and domestic foes, lived the remainder of his days in peace, and after the administration of public affairs for six years' continuance in all, he died, and was honourably buried in his own country.

He was succeeded by Ibzan of Bethlehem, who, after he had governed seven years, was succeeded by Elon, of the tribe of Zebulun; and he, after he had ruled ten years, by Abdon, of the tribe of Ephraim, who ruled eight. Of these judges the sacred history says nothing remarkable, only that some of them had a numerous issue, which is mentioned to show that the government, at that time, was not hereditary.

During the administration of these judges, the Israelites, enjoyed a peace of three and twenty years' continuance; but when they relapsed into their old impieties, God suffered the Philistines to invade and oppress them, whereupon Samson's valiant acts began to display themselves. He was the son of Manoah, ^e of the tribe of ^c Nothing is more notorious than that the people of the same nation, who speak the same language, differ very much, in their pronunciation of it, in several parts of the country. In Palestine, the people in Galilee, and those that lived in Jerusalem, spake the same tongue, and yet, in the time of Christ, the latter could tell St Peter, that his 'speech betrayed him,' (Mat. xxvii. 73.) In Greece all spake Greek, and yet the Ionians, Attics, Dorians, and Æolians pronounced very differently. And here, though the Gileadites and Ephraimites were all of one nation, yet the latter, we find, could not pronounce the letter schin. There were doubtless, therefore, many other words which they could not frame their mouths to speak, as the Gileadites did, but this one was chosen, because it was fit for their purpose. For as Shibboleth signifies floods of water, the Gileadites, when they saw any Ephraimites appear, might put this test to him, and bid him say, Let me pass over the water.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries.—In Arabia, the difference of pronunciation by persons of various districts is much greater than in most other places, and such an easily accounts for the circumstance mentioned in this passage. Niebuhr, (Travels, p. 72.), relates something similar to it. "The king of the Hamjares, at Dhafar, said to an Arab, a stranger, Theb, meaning to say, Sit down; but as the same word in the dialect of the stranger signified leap, he leaped from a high place, and hurt himself; when this mistake was explained to the king, he said, Let the Arab who cometh to Dhafar first learn the Hamjare dialect." He further says, "Not only do they speak quite differently in the mountains of the small district which is governed by the imam of Yemen, from what they do in the flat country; but persons of superior rank have a different pronunciation, and different names for things from those of the peasants. The pronunciation of certain letters also differs. Those which the Arabs of the north and west pronounce as K or Q, at Muskat are pronounced Tsch; so that bukkra kiab is by some called butscher tschlab."—Ed.

^d This was a terrible slaughter for one tribe to make of another; but the Ephraimites seemed to have deserved it, as a just punishment of their pride and insolence, in despising so great a man as Jephthah, who had saved all the people of Israel, and threatening to destroy his house, after so glorious a victory; in reviling their brethren likewise; invading them without a cause, and attempting to drive them out of their country.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e As the tribe of Dan lay bordering upon the Philistines, it was most exposed to their incursions and invasions; and, therefore, God, out of that tribe, chose Samson to be a scourge to them, and a revenger of his people, which is very agreeable to the prophecy of Jacob, when he blessed his sons, a little before his death: 'Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the

Dan, and of a mother, whose name we nowhere find in Scripture. This woman was a long time barren, and had no children; and, therefore, when an angel appeared to her, while she was alone, and gave her assurances that she would be mother of a son, who was to be a ^a Nazarite from his birth; to drink no wine or strong liquor; and ^b never have his hair shaved: upon her telling her husband these glad tidings, he requested of God to vouchsafe him a sight of the same heavenly messenger, which accordingly God granted him, and, when Manoah entreated the angel to accept of a small entertainment, which he chose rather to have converted into a sacrifice, Manoah made ready a kid, and wine for libations; and having placed them upon an altar made of stone, as the smoke of the sacrifice began to ascend, the ^c angel mounted up in the flame, and so disappeared.

At the time appointed the divine promise was accomplished, and the woman was delivered of a son, whom she named Samson. While he was yet a youth, the Spirit of God began to appear in him, and to exert itself in some notable exploits and feats of activity, in what was called ^d the old camp of Dan, lying between ^e Zorah path, biting the heels of the horse, so that his rider shall fall backwards.—Gen. xlix. 17.

^a A Nazarite was one who, under the Levitical law, either to attain the favour, or avert the judgments, or acknowledge the mercies of Almighty God, vowed a vow of particular purity, and separated himself, for so the word signifies, in an extraordinary manner, to the service of God. The time of this vow lasted usually for eight days, sometimes for a month, and, in some cases, for the person's whole life. During this time, the persons (for women as well as men might enter into this engagement) bound themselves to abstain from wine, and all strong liquors; not to cut the hair of their heads; not to come near a dead corpse, nor assist at a funeral: nay, the matter was so high, that if any happened to die suddenly in their presence, the whole ceremony of this separation was to begin anew. After the time that their separation was ended, they were to offer such sacrifices as the law appointed, and then, being absolved from their vow by the priest, they might drink wine, and use the same freedom that other people did. Samson's Nazaritism, to which he was consecrated by his parents, was to last the whole term of his life; but his frequent intercourse with the Philistines, and the great havoc and slaughter that he so often made among them, would induce one to think, that he had a particular dispensation exempting him from the observation of some of the foregoing rules.—See Num. vi.: Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries upon it; and Cabinet's Dictionary, under the word.

^b Long hair was esteemed very much among the Jews; and such persons as were made Nazarites by their parents, and consecrated to God from the womb, were required to wear their hair long and uncut, because it was a token not only of beauty, but of majesty and veneration.—Howell's History, in the notes.

^c Angels' bodies, which the Platonists called εχηματα, or vehicles, are not subject to the laws of gravity, as ours are. After our Saviour's resurrection, the history of the gospel informs us, how immediately, and in an instant, his body could move from place to place; and therefore it is no wonder, that Manoah and his wife should discover the person that appeared to them to be an angel, by the manner of his ascension.—Le Clerc's Comment.

^d This camp of Dan was probably the place where the Danites made their encampment, in their expedition and enterprise against Laish, (Judg. xviii. 11.); for it is not at all likely that the Philistines, who had the Israelites, at that time, entirely under their subjection, should suffer them to have any standing camp. And this, by the bye, is a good argument, that the story of Micah, and the Danites' expedition, was transacted before Samson's time, though the compilers of the Bible have placed it after.—Howell's History, in the notes.

^e Both these were towns in the tribe of Dan, whereof Zorah lay on the frontiers of Judah; and for this reason Rehoboam, upon the revolt of the ten tribes, seems to have kept this place, though and Eshtaol, the place where he was born. When he came to man's estate, he fell in love with the daughter of a Philistine, who lived at Timmath; and though his parents did not so well approve of the match, because she was sprung from an idolatrous family, yet, such was their tenderness for their son, that they indulged his passion, and went both of them with him to ^f Timmath to treat about the marriage. As they were on their journey, and Samson was straggling a little from the company, all on a sudden a young lion came running at him with open mouth, but he took it, and slew it with as much ease as if it had been a kid; and some time after, as he passed that way, which was when his father and mother went with him to solemnize his nuptials, he turned aside to see what was become of the lion's carcass, and, to his great surprise, found a ^g swarm of bees, and some honey in it, which he took, and gave part of it to his parents, but did not tell them whence he had it.

It was customary in those days to continue the nuptial entertainment for seven days, ^h and, to do the bridegroom greater honour, his wife's relations had brought ⁱ thirty of their prime youth to bear him company, to whom, as the manner then was, he propounded a riddle, ^j which if they could explain in the time that the feast lying in one of these tribes, and to have fortified it for a barrier town, on that side of the kingdom of Judah; as he did also Aijalon, another town belonging to the same tribe.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2. c. 6.

^f It is not improbably thought, that the place which is called Timmath, (Josh. xv. 10.) and Timmatha, (Josh. xix. 43.) was the same with this. It was assigned at first to the tribe of Judah, but afterwards to the tribe of Dan, and was, in all likelihood, the place whither Judah, the patriarch of the tribe that was called after him, went up to his sheep-shearers.—Gen. xxxviii. 12.—Wells' Geography, ibid.

^g Bees are observed by Aristotle and others to abhor stinking smells, and to abstain from flesh; which has made some think it strange, that a swarm of bees should be found in the carcass of a lion: but it is no hard matter to suppose that either time had consumed, or birds and beasts devoured all the flesh, so that nothing was left of the lion but the skeleton, in which the bees did not breed. (for the notion of insects breeding in that manner is now quite exploded,) but only settle themselves, when they swarmed as they have sometimes done in dead men's skulls, and in their tombs.—Bochart's Hieros. part 2. b. 4. 10; and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^h This was according to the custom of all countries; it was called by the Jews the nuptial joy. No other feast was to be intermixed with it, and all labour ceased as long as it lasted.—Selden, Uxor. Heb. b. 2. c. 2. p. 172.

ⁱ During the time of the marriage-feast, which, for a virgin, lasted seven, but for a widow, only three days, it was customary among the Jews, to have a chosen set of young men, whom the Greeks call Paragymphs, and the Hebrews Scheliachim, to keep the bridegroom company; as also a certain number of young women were about the bride all this time. These young men were generally of the bridegroom's relations and acquaintance; but at Samson's marriage, they belonged to his wife's family, and were sent, as some of the Jews think, not so much to do him honour at the time of his nuptials, as to be a guard over him, lest he should make any disturbance, of which the Philistines were afraid, when they understood that he was a man of so much strength and might.—Lamy's Introduction, b. 1. c. 11.; and Cabinet's Dissertation on the Marriages of the Jews.

^j This riddle which Samson proposed at his nuptials, is somewhat singular. As the men and women were not permitted to be together in these eastern countries, they could not amuse themselves with their conversation; and as they could not spend their time merely in dull eating and drinking, it is hence presumed that their custom was, in their computations and feasts, (as we find it afterwards among the Greeks,) to propose questions and hard problems to be resolved, in order to exercise the wit and sagacity lasted, he obliged himself to give them thirty suits of clothes, and an equal number of shirts; but if they could not, they were to forfeit the like to him. The words of the riddle were, 'Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness;' which so puzzled the young men, that they could not for their hearts devise what it meant; and therefore applying themselves to Samson's wife, what with threats, what with entreaties, they prevailed with her to get the secret out of her husband: which, when, with much importunity, she had done, she told it them, and they at the conclusion of the feast, gave him to understand that they knew it. He told them, however, by whose information they had it, and, being desperately enraged, went down to ^a Askalon a city of the Philistines, where having slain ^b thirty men, he gave their clothes to those that expounded the riddle; but taking the thing very ill of his wife, he left her, and went down to his father's house, while she, in his absence, was married to one of the young men that had been his companion all the wedding week.

As soon as his resentment was abated, and his anger appeased, Samson took a kid for a present to his wife, and went to her father's house, with a full purpose of being reconciled to her; but to his great amazement, was denied admittance to her room, and told by her father that, upon presumption he had quite forsaken her, he had married her to one of his companions, but had another daughter younger, and more beautiful, that was at his service. This answer was far from satisfying him; and therefore, imagining that the affront was not so much the act of his father-in-law, as the general contrivance of the Philistines, he turned about short, and vowed revenge, which he afterwards executed in the following manner.

of the company.—Selden de Uxor. Hebr. b. 2. c. 16. But as to this riddle of Samson's, some people are apt to find exceptions. The opposition, they say, is manifest in the former part of it, but not in the latter; for weakness is opposed to strength, not sweetness, whose opposite is bitterness or sharpness. But Bochart has ingeniously observed, that these two words, strong and sharp, are oftentimes used promiscuously. For, in the Arabic language, the word mirra, which signifies, strength, comes from marra, which signifies to be sharp or bitter; and so it is in the Latin, where acer, a sharp man, is as much as a valiant man, one who eagerly (as we speak) engages his enemy, and, what is more, we find, in some of the best authors, this particular epithet applied to lions, "The impetuous race of lions," (Ovid. Fast.) And therefore the antithesis of the word is this,—"Food came from the devourer, and sweetness from what is eager, or sharp," that is violent and fierce.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^a It is a city in the land of the Philistines, situated between Azoth and Gaza, upon the coast of the Mediterranean sea, about 520 furlongs distant from Jerusalem. It is said to have been of great note among the Gentiles, for a temple dedicated to Derecto, the mother of Semiramis, here worshipped in the form of a mermaid; and for another temple of Apollo, where Herod, the father of Antipater, and grandfather of Herod the Great, served as priest. The place subsists to this day, but is now very inconsiderable. Some mention there is made of the wine of Askalon, and the cypress-tree, (a shrub that was anciently in great esteem, and very common in this place,) but modern travellers say no such thing of it now.—Cabnet's Dictionary under the word; and Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

^b It may well be questioned, upon what occasion Samson could meet with thirty Philistines, all clothed in their new and best attire, even though we allow that he went with a disposition to pick a quarrel with them, and slay them; but then it is but supposing, that at this time, there was a merry-making, either in the fields, or in the city, at some public solemnity, with great companies used to be gathered together, and appear in their best apparel, and the thing is done.—Patrick's Commentary.

By some means or other, he got together a multitude of foxes to the number of 300; and, tying them two and two together by the tails, with a lighted torch between each pair, he turned them into the standing corn at different places, and so not only set the field on fire, but the vine and olive yards likewise, inasmuch that the whole country was in a blaze. When the Philistines understood that it was Samson who had done this, in revenge to the affront which his father-in-law had put upon him, they came in a body and fired the house over his head, and so burnt him and Samson's wife together. This was a fresh provocation, for which Samson threatened to be revenged; and, thereupon, without any ceremony, fell immediately upon them, and ^c slew a great number of them.

Samson, being conscious to himself, that he must have highly provoked the Philistines by this last slaughter of them, took up his residence thenceforwards on the ^d top of the rock Etam, ^e which was in the tribe of Judah. Hereupon the Philistines came down with an armed force, and demanded Samson to be delivered up to them. The people of Judah, fearing the consequence of this invasion, detached a body of 3000 men to Samson; who, after they had expostulated the injury he had done them in provoking their enemies so highly, told him in plain

^c The words in the text, according to our translation are, 'And he smote them hip and thigh with a great slaughter,' (Jud. xv. 8.) But the words in the original will admit of this signification, "He smote them with his leg on their thigh, and gave them great hurts or wounds;" and to justify this sense, a learned commentator supposes, that there was, at this time, somewhere among the Philistines, wrestling matches and other rural exercises, to which every one was invited, and that Samson, among the rest, might go thither; that there he threw great numbers of the Philistines, who might value themselves upon their activity that way; and, in the midst of the grapple with them, broke their thighs with a kick or twist of his leg. If this supposition be right, the phrase, "to squeeze the leg on the thigh," seems to be much the same with what the Greeks call συσίζειν; or ἀσπασίζειν; for, though this kind of exercise grew into high esteem among the Grecians, who were so famous for their gymnastic sports; yet that wrestling was an exercise not unknown among the people of the east is manifest from Gen. xxx. 26, xxx. 8. and xxxii. 24. This our commentator offers but as a conjecture indeed; but it seems much more feasible than the interpretation either of the Vulgate or Chaldee paraphrase.—Le Clerc in locum.

^d This was a strong place in the tribe of Judah, as Josephus relates to the top of which no more than one man could come abreast, and therefore easily defensible; by all this, however, and what follows in this history of Samson, it is plain that he had no commission from God, nor was moved by any extraordinary impulse to make open war (as did Gideon, Jephthah, and others) for the deliverance of Israel from the yoke of the Philistines, but only to weaken them and keep them in awe, that, out of dread of him, they might be less cruel in their oppression; and that this was all that God intended to do by him, is pretty plain from the words of the angel, (Judg. xiii. 5.) 'He shall begin to deliver Israel.'—Patrick's Commentary.

^e Judg. xv. 8. 'And he went down and dwelt on the top of the rock Etam.' It appears that rocks are still resorted to as places of security, and even capable of sustaining a siege. So we read in De La Roque, (p. 205.) "The Grand Signior, wishing to seize the person of the Emir, gave orders to the Pacha to take him prisoner; he accordingly came in search of him, with a new army in the district of Chouf, which is a part of Mount Lebanon, wherein is the village of Gesin, and close to it the rock which served for retreat to the Emir. The Pacha pressed the Emir so closely, that this unfortunate prince was obliged to shut himself up in the cliff of a great rock, with a small number of his officers. The Pacha besieged him here several months, and was going to blow up the rock by a mine, when the Emir capitulated."—Travels in Palestine.—Er.

terms, that they were come to seize, and deliver him up to the Philistines.

Samson submitted to have himself bound, which was done with new strong cords, upon condition that they themselves would not side with the enemy against him; and so being brought to the place where the Philistines were encamped, they now thought they had him secure, and therefore ran out with joy to receive him. But as they came near him, he snapped the cords asunder, and happening to espy a fresh jaw-bone of an ass, he made use of that for want of a better weapon, and therewith slew no less than a thousand men; from which achievement, the place was afterwards called, either simply Lehi, that is, the jaw-bone, or Ramah-Lehi, the lifting of the jaw-bone. Fatigued with this fight, and being now excessively thirsty, in a place where no water was to be had, he made his supplication to God, and God immediately caused a fountain of delicious water to issue from a hollow rock adjacent to Lehi, wherewith Samson allayed his thirst, and was revived; and from this event, the place was called En-hakkor, the well of him that prayed, ever after.

After this action Samson made nothing of the Philistines, but went openly into ^a one of their cities called Gaza, and took up his lodging in a public house of entertainment. The governor of the place had soon intelligence of him, and sent guards to beset the house, and to watch the gates of the city for his going out next morning; but Samson, being informed of this, rose in the midnight, and taking the two gates of the city, gate-posts, bars, bolts, chain and all, he laid them on his shoulders, and carried them to the top of an hill, ^b that looks towards Hebron, and there left them.

^a This city was, by Joshua, made part of the tribe of Judah, but, after him, it fell into the hands of the Philistines, and was one of their five principalities, situated between Raphia and Askalon, towards the southern extremity of the promised land. The advantageous situation of this place was the cause of the many revolutions to which it became subject. At first of all it belonged to the Philistines, but in Joshua's time, was conquered by the Hebrews. In the reigns of Jotham and Ahaz, it recovered its liberty, but was conquered by Hezekiah. It was made subject to the Chaldeans, when they reduced Syria and Phœnicia; and afterwards fell into the hands of the Persians. They were masters of it when Alexander besieged, took, and demolished it. It afterwards rose again, but not nearly of the same magnitude, under the name of Majuma, which underwent as many vicissitudes as the former. The kings of Egypt had it for some time in possession: Antiochus the Great took and sacked it; the Asmoneans, or Maccabees, took it several times from the Syrians; Alexander Jannæus, king of the Hebrews, destroyed it; Gabinius repaired it. Augustus gave it to Herod the Great; Constantine gave it the name of Constantia, with many independent privileges, in honour of his son; but the emperor Julian destroyed and deprived it of all.—Cabnet's Dictionary.—Gaza lies 14 miles south-west of Jerusalem, and about one mile from the Mediterranean sea, in long. 34° 40' E., and lat. 31° 25' N., and has a population of about 5000. The environs are exceedingly fertile, and produce pomegranates, oranges, dates, and flowers, in great request even at Constantinople. The manufacture of cotton employs 500 looms in the town and neighbourhood. There are likewise great quantities of ashes made by the Arabs, and used in the manufacture of soap; this manufacture has lately declined. Gaza is at present divided into two parts, called the upper and lower. Both of these parts taken together are now called Gazara; and the upper part where the castle is situated has the same name, but the lower part is, by the Arabs, distinguished under the name of Harel el Segiagé.—En.

At length a more fatal adventure than any of these befell him: for falling in love with a beautiful woman, named ^c Delilah, who lived in the vale of Sorek, which lay in the tribe of Judah, he was so infatuated to her, that he lost all regard to his own safety. The princes of the Philistines, observing his passion for this woman, came and promised her ^d a round sum of money, if she would learn of him, and discover to them what might be the cause of this his wonderful strength, and ^e how he might be deprived of it. This she undertook to do; and failed not to employ all her art and solicitation to get the important secret from him. For some time he amused her with fictions, and made her believe, that his strength consisted sometimes in one thing, and sometimes in another; first, that binding him with bands made of green withes, then, that tying him with ropes that had never been used, and again, ^f weaving his hair into top of a hill, that is before Hebron, (Judges xvi. 3.); but the word which we render 'before,' does equally signify 'in the sight of Hebron;' and therefore, since the distance between Gaza and Hebron is no less than twenty miles, it is more probable, that the hill where Samson left these gates, lay between the two cities, and in view of both, that the inhabitants of one city might behold them to their confusion, and they of the other, to their encouragement to hope for a future deliverance.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c It is certain that Sorek was a place in the land of Judea, famous for choice wines, as may be gathered from Gen. xlvii. 11.; Isaiah v. 12.; and Jer. ii. 21., and lay not above a mile and a half from Eschol, from whence the spies brought a bunch of grapes for a sample of the fruitfulness of the country; but whether Delilah, who is said to live here, was a woman of Israel, or one of the daughters of the Philistines, (who at this time were rulers in the country of Judah,) or whether she was his wife, or an harlot only, is not expressed in her story. St Chrysostom, and others, are of opinion that he was married to her; but if so, some mention, one would think, there should have been of the marriage ceremonies in this, as well as in his former wife's case. Nor can we think that the Philistines would have been so bold as to attempt to draw her into their party, and to bribe her to betray him into their hands, had she been his lawful wife. It appears, indeed, by her whole behaviour, that she was a mercenary woman, who would do any thing to get money; and accordingly, Josephus, (Antiquities, b. 5. c. 1.) calls her a common prostitute of the Philistines.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^d The princes of the Philistines, from their five chief cities, Accaron, Askalon, Gaza, Azoth, and Gath, (1 Sam. vi. 17.) are supposed to be five in number, so that, if they made her a common purse, as we say, of five times 1100 pieces, or 5,500 shekels of silver, it would amount to about 343 pounds fifteen shillings.—Howell's History, in the notes.

^e There is a good deal of probability in Josephus's manner of telling this story, namely, That while they were eating and drinking together, and he was caressing her, she fell into an admiration of his wonderful deeds; and having highly extolled them, desired him to tell her how he came so much to excel all other men in strength. For we cannot suppose, that she came bluntly upon him all at once, and desired to know, as it is in the text, 'wherewith he might be bound and afflicted.' This had been discovering her wicked design against him at once, and defeating herself of an opportunity of betraying him; and therefore, we must conclude that the sacred history in this place, as it frequently does elsewhere, gives only the sum and substance of what Delilah said to her paramour, without taking notice of all the enning and artful speeches wherewith she dressed it up.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^f We have followed in this passage, which indeed is a very obscure one, the notion of the learned Spencer, (On the Law of Moses' Rites, b. 3. c. 6. Dissert. 1.) concerning the hair of the Nazarite; but a learned commentator is of another opinion, namely, that Samson's hair, being very long, was interwoven with the threads and warp of a web of cloth. And to this purpose he supposes, that in the room where he sometimes slept tresses, and so filleting them up, would bereave him of his strength. But these were no more than mock stories; for, upon trial, she found that all these signified nothing; and therefore, betaking herself to all her arts and wiles, she complained of his falseness, and upbraided him with his want of love, since he withheld a thing from her which she was so impatient to know: and thus, by daily teasing and importuning him, she prevailed with him at length to tell her the secret, namely, that 'in the preservation of his hair (for he was a Nazarite from his birth) his strength and security lay.'

There was something in his manner of telling her this, that made Delilah believe she had now got the true secret from him; and therefore, she sent word thereof to some of the chiefs of the Philistines, who came and paid her the money they had covenanted to give her: and when she had cut off his hair, as he lay sleeping in her lap, they fell upon him, bound him, and put out his eyes; and having carried him to Gaza, they shut him up in prison, and made him ^a grind in the mill like a slave.

In process of time, however, his hair grew again, and with it his former strength returned: so that, when several of the princes and nobility of the Philistines were met in a general assembly, to return thanks to their god ^b Dagon, for having delivered their worst and sorest enemy into their hands; and after they had feasted a while, and were now grown merry, they ordered that this same Samson should be sent for, that they might have pleasure in ridiculing his misery, and making sport with his blindness, and accordingly Samson was brought. A large number of people was upon this occasion met together, and the building where the feast was celebrated had only two large pillars to support the roof. After the Philistines therefore had insulted Samson as long as they thought fit, he desired the boy, that led him, to guide him to one of those pillars that he might rest himself a little against it. The boy did so: and Samson, by this means, having laid hold of the two main supporters, the one with his right hand, and the other with his left, after a short ejaculation to God for the restoration of his former strength, he gave them such a terrible shake, that down came the house, and crushed no less than three thousand persons to death under its ruins, and Samson among the rest.

upon a couch, there might stand very near a loom, wherewith Delilah, as the custom then was, at her leisure hours, might work and divert herself: and that now, by his permission and connivance, she might take the locks of his hair, work it into the web, and, to hinder it from being pulled out, secure it with an iron pin thrust into the beam, but that Samson, when he awoke, took the loom along with him at his hair. And, indeed, without some such supposition as this, we cannot very well tell what to make of his going away with 'the pin of the beam, and with the web.' (Jud. xvi. 14.)—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^a Before the invention of wind and water mills, men made use of hand mills, wherewith to grind their corn; and as this was a very laborious work, we find masters, especially in most comic authors, threatened their servants with it, in case of any delinquency. It was the work, indeed, of malefactors, as well as slaves; and therefore, it seems very probable, that in this prison, where Samson was put, there was a public mill, as Soerates (Hist. Eccles. b. 5. c. 18.) tells us there were several afterwards in Rome, in the time of Theodosius. So that from this and some other circumstances, we may learn, that the Philistines' purpose was not to put Samson to death, even as they had promised Delilah they would not, but to punish him in a manner, namely, with blindness, hard labour, and insults, much worse, and more intolerable than death itself.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^b The word Dagon is taken from the Phœnician root Dag, which signifies a fish; and accordingly the idol is usually represented, as the heathens do Tritons and Syrens, in the shape of a woman, with the lower parts of a fish,—desinit in piscem, mulier formosa superne.—For this reason learned men have imagined, that Dagon was the same with Derecto, which the people of Askelon worshipped, and near which place there was a great pond full of fish, consecrated to this goddess, from which the inhabitants superstitiously abstained, out of a fond belief that Venus, having heretofore cast herself into this pond, was metamorphosed into a fish. The learned Jurien is of another opinion, namely, That Dagon whose termination is masculine, both in sacred and profane writings, is always represented as a male deity, and may therefore very properly be thought to be the Neptune of the ancients. The Phœnicians in particular, from whom both the Greeks and Romans borrowed their gods, living upon the sea coast, and by their navigation and commerce, gaining great advantages from that element can hardly be supposed to want a deity to preside over it. Saturn, and his three sons, Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, were their principal idols: and as Saturn was their Moloch, Jupiter their Baal, and Pluto their Baal-zehub; so have we reason to presume, that Neptune was their Dagon. This however will not hinder us from supposing that there might be two deities, a male and a female, worshipped in the same country, and under the same figure or form: and that as the pagan theology gives Jupiter a Juno, to be his consort in heaven; and Pluto a Proserpine, to keep him company in hell; so Neptune had his Amphitrite, to be the partner of his liquid empire in the sea. According to this supposition, the Dagon of Gaza or Ashdod must be Neptune and the Derecto of Askelon, a few leagues distant, Amphitrite, the daughter of Doris and Oceanus. Nor can it be thought incongruous to suppose farther, that the universal god of the sea might, in one place be represented as a male, as at Ashdod, and in another, as at Askelon, as a female, to signify the fecundity of that element, which produces and nourishes so many living creatures.—Le Clerc's Commentary; Calmet's Dictionary; and Jurieu, History of Opinions and Religion, part 4. c. 6.

^c It is made a question among the casuists and divines, whether Samson ought to have died in this manner, with a spirit of revenge and self-murder? St Austin excuses him indeed, but it is upon the supposition that he was urged thereunto by the inward motions of him who is the great Arbitrer of our life and death; and St Bernard affirms that if he had not a peculiar inspiration of the Holy Ghost to move him to this, he could not without sin have been the author of his own death; but others maintain, that without having recourse to this supernatural motive, this action of his might be vindicated from his office, as being the judge and defender of Israel, and that he might therefore devote his life to the public good, as some heathens have merited the commendation of posterity by so doing, without having any thing in view but the death of his enemies, and the deliverance of his own people.—Calmet's Dictionary; and Saurin's Dissertation on the various feats of Samson.

^d How the people of Gaza came to permit Samson's relations to come and take away his body, is not so obvious to conceive. In all nations, there was formerly so much humanity, as not to prohibit enemies from interring their dead, nor did any of the Israelites join with Samson in his enterprises; he stood alone in what he did: but this last slaughter which he had made among them, might have provoked them, one would think, to some acts of outrage even upon his dead body. It is to be observed, however, that instead of any acts of violence, they might perhaps be much humbled and mollified by this late disaster; and might fear, that if they denied him burial, the God of Israel, who had given him such extraordinary strength in his lifetime, would not fail to take vengeance of them. And therefore, dreading his very corpse, they were desirous to get quit of it, even as they were of the ark afterwards, and glad that any came to take such a formidable object out of their sight.—Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentary.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties Obviated, and Objections Answered.

JUDGES, which in Hebrew, are Shophetim, were a kind of magistrates, not much unlike the archontes, among the Athenians, and the dictators, among the Romans.

The Carthaginians, a colony among the Tyrians, had a sort of rulers, whom they called suffetes or shophetim, much of the same extent of power; and Grotius, in the beginning of his Commentary on this book of Judges, compares them to those chiefs that were in Gaul, in Germany, and in Britain, before the Romans introduced another form of government. Their power consisted in a medium (as it were) between that of a king and an ordinary magistrate, superior to the latter, but not so absolute as the former. They were indeed no more than God's vicegerents, and every attempt to raise themselves to regal dignity was looked upon as an usurpation upon his right, who alone was to be considered as the sovereign of the Hebrews; and therefore we find Gideon refusing this supreme authority when it was offered him: 'I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you; the Lord shall rule over you.'

The honour of these judges lasted for life, but their succession was not always continued; for there were frequent interruptions in it, and the people lived often under the dominion of strangers, without any government of their own. According to common custom, they were generally appointed by God. The gifts which he invested them with, and the exploits he enabled them to do, were a call sufficient to that office: but in cases of extreme exigence, the people sometimes made choice of such as they thought best qualified to rescue them out of their oppression, without waiting for any divine designation.

Their right extended so far, as to arbitrate in all affairs of war and peace, and to determine all causes; but then they had none at all to make any new laws, or lay any new taxes upon the people. Their dominion did seldom reach over all the land; but, as it often happened, that the oppressions which occasioned a recourse to their assistance, were felt in particular tribes or provinces only; so the judges which were either raised, or chosen to procure a deliverance from those grievances, did not extend their command over all the land in general, but over that district only which they were appointed to deliver.

In short, these judges were by their office the protectors of the laws, the defenders of religion, and the avengers of all crimes, especially of that of idolatry; and yet it must be owned, that these were men of the like passions and infirmities with others, and that the great advantages which, under God, they procured for the Israelites, did not exempt them from that frailty which is incident to all human things.

The sacred story indeed tells us, that 'the Lord raised up judges, which delivered the Israelites out of the hands of those that spoiled them,' and that 'when he raised them up, he was with them,' that is, he communicated to them gifts, both natural and supernatural, according to the exigencies of his people, and, in all their encounters with their enemies, attended them with a peculiar providence: but as well may we infer, that every general who fights the king of England's battles with success, should be a man of singular sanctity, as that those who were employed under God in that capacity, should lead lives answerable to their high character. The power of working miracles is not always accompanied with a holy life. Many, that shall say unto Christ, 'have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works,' by reason of the iniquity of their lives, shall find no acceptance with him. What wonder is it then, to behold some, both kings and conquerors, even while they ride in triumph over the vanquished foes, tamely led captive by their own passions; so that while we cannot but admire them for their military exploits, we are forced to blame and censure them for their private conduct?

To mention one for all, Samson, a person born for the castigation of the Philistines, and to be a pattern of valour to all succeeding heroes, forgot himself in the arms of a Delilah, and to the passion he had for a base perfidious woman, sacrificed those gifts which God had bestowed on him for the deliverance of his church, and so, to all ages, he became a sad example of the corruption and infirmities of human nature. The like perhaps, in other respects, may be said of the rest of the judges: but then we are to remember, that they were persons under a particular economy of providence; that their conduct therefore is no direction to us, though their passions the Almighty might make use of, and therefore tolerate, for the accomplishment of his wise ends: 'Howbeit, they meant not so, neither did their hearts think so,' as the prophet expresses himself upon the like occasion.

Whether it be lawful, according to the right of nature and nations, for subjects to rescue themselves from tyranny by taking away the life of the tyrant, and to recover their country, which has been unjustly taken from them, by destroying the usurper, is a question that has been much debated, and what, at present, we need not enter into, for the vindication of Ehud's fact. It is the observation of the learned Grotius, that the authority of the king of Moab was never legitimized by any convention of the Israelites, and consequently that they were at liberty to shake off his yoke whenever they found a convenient opportunity. The only difficulty is whether a private man might make himself an instrument in effecting this, in the manner that Ehud did? But to this it is replied, that Ehud was no private man, but acted by warrant and authority from God; and to this purpose, the history acquaints us, that 'when Ehud had made an end of offering the present' which the Israelites sent to Eglon, he was upon his return home, and 'had gone as far as the quarries which were by Gilgal.' The word pesil, which is here rendered quarries, most commonly signifies, as indeed it is in the marginal note, as well as the Septuagint and Vulgate, graven images, which it is not improbable the Moabites had set up in this place rather than any other, in pure contempt of the God of Israel, who had for so long a time made Gilgal famous by his presence in the tabernacle while it stood there.

These images when Ehud beheld, his ¹ spirit was stirred with a just indignation within him; and therefore, proceeding no farther on his journey home, he dismissed his attendants, and went himself back with a resolution to revenge this affront to God, as well as the oppression of his people.

That this his return was directed by a divine impulse and instigation, is evident, I think, from the hazard of the enterprise he was going upon, and the many unfavourable occasions that accompanied the execution of it. For, how could any man, in his senses, think that a single person as he was, should ever be able to compass the death of a king, amidst the circle of his guards and attendants? How could he expect that an enemy, as he was, should be admitted to a private audience? or that, if he should prove so lucky, the king should be so far infatuated as to order all the company to quit the room? The killing the king must have been a great difficulty under these circumstances; but then his making his escape had all the signs of an impossibility in it: and yet, without his escaping, the design of delivering his country must have been abortive. Upon the whole therefore it appears, that nothing but a divine instinct could have given him courage to set about the thing; and therefore it was not all fallacy, when he told Eglon, that 'he had a message from God unto him,' because God had sent and commissioned him to kill him: so that what he did in this case, he did not of himself, or from his own mere motion, but by virtue of an order which he had received from God, who had destinated this oppressor of his people to this untimely kind of death.

This seems to be the only way whereby we can apologize for Ehud, in a fact which by no means is to be made a precedent, and, without a divine warrant, is in no case to be justified. But as for the Holy Scriptures, wherein this action is related simply, and without either dislike or approbation, why should they suffer in our esteem upon that account, any more than Livy, Thucydides, or any other heathen author, for recording the various transactions, and some of them full as base and barbarous as this, that happened in the ages whereof they treat?

It is a mistake to think, that every person whom the Scripture mentions, nay, whom the Scripture commends in some respects, should, in all others, be faultless and unblamable; and it would be a much greater imputation upon the truth and authority of these sacred records, if the people of God were all made saints, and no black actions recorded of them; since it is the received character of a good historian, 'That as he should not dare to relate any thing that is false, so neither should he conceal any thing that is true.'

There is something peculiar in relation to the fact of Jael, and that is the words of the prophetess, in her triumphant song: ² 'Blessed above women shall Jael, the wife of Heber, the Kenite, be; blessed shall she be above women in the tent;' which some look upon as a commendation of Jael, and consequently an approbation of the murder of Sisera: ³ But Deborah herein might only prophesy how and in what manner the Israelites would be affected towards that woman, by whose means, though not in the most commendable way, they had been delivered from a very dangerous enemy.

It is natural for us, when at any time we are rescued from an adversary, by whom we have suffered much, and have reason to dread more; it is natural, I say, for us to wish well to the person by whose means he was taken off; nor are we apt to consider the action according to the measure of strict virtue, by reason of the benefit which accrues to us thereby. Deborah might, therefore, mean no more than what were the common notions of mankind in a case of this nature. But, even 'admitting her words to be a commendation of the fact, we might, very likely, perceive several reasons for it, if we had but a knowledge of some circumstances, which we may reasonably suppose, though the Scripture has not related them to us.

It is certain, that the Kenites, descended from Hobab, the son of Jethro, father-in-law to Moses, were ⁴ at first invited to go with the Israelites into the land of Canaan, and were all along kindly treated by them. They, indeed, had no share in the division of the land, nor were they permitted to dwell in their cities; yet they had the free use of their country, and were allowed to pitch their tents (as their manner of life was) wherever they thought fit for the convenience of their cattle, though generally they chose to continue in the tribe of Judah. By this means a strict friendship interfered, and a firm alliance was always subsisting between the Israelites and these people; whereas, between the Kenites and Jabin, there was no more than a bare cessation of hostilities; and though Heber and they continued neutral in this war, yet it was not without wishing well to their ancient friends the Israelites, among whom they lived.

Now, it is a received maxim among all civilians, That where two compacts stand in competition, and cannot be both observed, the stronger should always have the

a One of our annotators has another way of accounting for the commendation which is given to Jael in Deborah's song, and that is, by giving up the divine inspiration of it. "It is not to be denied," says he, "but that there are some words, passages, and discourses recorded in Scripture, which are not divinely inspired, because some of them were uttered by the devil, and others by the holy men of God, but mistaken: such is the discourse of Nathan to David, (2 Sam. vii. 3.) which God presently contradicted, (ver. 4, 5.) and several discourses in Job, which God himself declares to be unsound: 'Ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath,' (Job xlii. 7.) This being so," continues he, "the worst that any malicious man can infer from this place is, That this song, though indicted by a good man or woman, was not divinely inspired, but only composed by a person piously minded, and transported with joy for the deliverance of God's people, but subject to mistake; who, therefore, out of zeal to commend the happy instrument of so great a deliverance, might easily overlook the indirectness of the means by which it was accomplished, and commend that which should be disliked. If it be urged, that the song was composed by Deborah, a prophetess, and must, consequently, be divinely inspired, the answer is, 1st. That it is not certain what kind of prophetess Deborah was, whether extraordinary and infallible, or ordinary, and so liable to mistake. But, 2dly, That every expression, even of a true and extraordinary prophet, was not divinely inspired, as is evident from Nathan's mistake above mentioned, and from Samuel's error concerning Eliab, whom, from his outward stature and comeliness, he took to be the Lord's anointed." preference. An agreement, for instance, says Puffendorf,¹ that is made with an oath, should always supersede that which is made without one. It is but supposing then, that the two depending treaties were of these different kinds, and this will be a circumstance in favour of Jael ; but then, if we may suppose farther, that Jabin was a grievous tyrant, and Sisera the chief instrument of his tyranny ; this,² according to the opinion of some, will supply us with a full apology for what she did. "For there are certain monsters in nature," say they, "in whose destruction all civil society is concerned. To do any thing to preserve them, nay to slip a proper opportunity of ridding the world of them, whatever terms we happen to be under with them, is to be false to what we owe to the whole community, under the pretence of fidelity to a base ally. When matters are come to such an extremity, that we must fight with men, as we do with wild beasts, fallacy of any kind, which at other times is justly detested, may, in some measure, be then excused ; nor have they, who, in their dealings with others, are regardless of all laws, both human and divine, any reason to complain, if, upon some occasions, they meet with a retaliation."

Jael, when she took the hammer and nail in her hand, might have this, perhaps, and much more, to say in her own vindication : but what absolves her most effectually with us is, the declaration which God had made in favour of the Israelites, by the wonderful defeat of Jabin's army, and the direction and impulse wherewith he excited her to despatch his vanquished general. ³ Had she been left to herself, she would have been contented, one would think, to have let him lain still, until Barak, who was in pursuit of him, had come up, and surprised him. To fall upon him herself was an enterprise exceeding bold and hazardous, and above the courage of her sex ; and therefore, we may conclude, that if it was God who inspired her with this extraordinary resolution, she was not to be blamed, notwithstanding the peace between Jabin and her family, for being obedient to the heavenly impulse ; because all obligations to man must necessarily cease, when brought in competition with our higher obligations towards God. ^a

^a This is very inconclusive reasoning. When our duty to God, and to any individual man become inconsistent with each other, no one ever supposed that the latter is not to be superseded by the former ; but I am not aware that any duty, either to God or to the Israelites, made it necessary for Jael to violate the laws of hospitality to Sisera the captain of the host of Hazor. The house of Heber her husband was equally at peace with Israel and with Jabin king of Canaan. The Kenites had indeed been much more indebted to the Israelites than to the Canaanites. Jael might therefore have refused to receive Sisera under her roof, because she could not protect him from his enemies should they come in pursuit of him, without violating an obligation much stronger than any under which she was either to him or to his master ; but when he came under her roof she was surely to protect him as far as that superior obligation would permit. He was not her personal enemy ; and granting himself and his master, to have been such tyrants as our author supposes, neither Jael nor any other private individual had a right to rid the world either of the sovereign or of his servant, by treachery ! She might, without the breach of any duty, have received Sisera into her tent ; but when she had received him, she could not, without incurring guilt of the deepest dye, murder him with her own

Whoever looks into the catalogue of the worthies whom the author of the Hebrews enumerates, will soon perceive, that, as he is far from being exact in the order wherein he places them ; so, by the faith for which he commends them, he means no more than a belief of what God told them, and ready obedience to his commands, whenever they were signified to them by a proper authority. Deborah was, at this time, a very remarkable woman, famous for the administration of justice, and determination of controversies among the people ; but notwithstanding this, it would have been rashness in Barak to have gone upon so hazardous an undertaking without any farther assurance than this. He did not absolutely refuse to go, nay, he offered to go upon the first notice, and for this his faith is commended in Scripture ; but then he was minded to have some farther conviction that this notice was from God, and of this he could not have a better proof, than if the prophetess herself would go and share with him the fate of the battle.

The enemy was as formidable a one as ever the Israelites had to encounter. Nine hundred chariots of iron, when, ⁴ in times of greater military preparation, Mithridates had but 100, and Darius no more than 200 in their armies, was enough to inject terror into any commander, whose forces consisted all of foot, and had no proper defence against these destructive engines. Good reason had he, therefore, to apprehend, that the people would not so readily have enlisted themselves into the public service, had there not been a person of her character to appear at the head of it. She was a prophetess, and had received frequent revelations from God ; and therefore, when the people saw her personally engaged in it, they would be the apter to be persuaded, that the expedition was by God's appointment, and therefore, without all peradventure, would be attended with success. And as Deborah's joining with Barak in the expedition might be thought a good expedient to raise a sufficient number of forces ; so might it equally be thought a means effectual, both to prevent their desertion, and to animate them to the fight : and accordingly ⁵ Josephus tell us, "that when the two armies lay encamped, one within the sight of the other, the Israelites were struck with such a terror at the infinite odds of the enemy in numbers, that both general and soldiers were once upon the very point of shifting for themselves, without so much as striking a blow ; but upon Deborah's assurance, that it was the cause of God, and that he himself would assist and bring them off, they were prevailed upon to stand the shock of the battle."

hands ! She could not indeed, with innocence, have gone to the tent door, and voluntarily betrayed him to Barak ; but had she remained quietly within, and Barak had come to demand if he was there, she could not, without a breach of the higher duty which she owed to Israel, have preserved Sisera at the expense of a lie. It is perfectly in vain to attempt a vindication of her conduct ; for God can never have authorized falsehood and treachery in such a case as hers with Sisera ; nor do the words of Deborah at all imply an approbation of Jael's moral conduct. They are merely a wish or prayer that she might be rendered happy in this world, for the services that she had rendered to Israel ; and perhaps it is not possible for the most upright mind, in such circumstances, to avoid the forming of such a wish.—Bishop Gleig.

But there is one advantage more which Barak might more especially promise to himself in having Deborah's company in this expedition, and that is, that he might not want an oracle to resort to upon any emergency that might happen; because he was persuaded, that God, who, by her means, had put his people upon this enterprise, would not fail, by her mouth, to direct him in the management of it. And, accordingly, in the grand point of all, namely, when it was the properest time to engage the enemy, we find the benefit which he received from her company and conversation. 'Up,' says she, 'for this is the day in which the Lord hath delivered Sisera into thy hand. Is not the Lord gone out before thee? So Barak went down from mount Tabor, and ten thousand men after him, and the Lord discomfited Sisera, and all his chariots, and all his host, with the edge of the sword.'

The faith of those persons whose actions are recorded in the Old Testament, and fame commemorated in the New, consisted, as we said, in a firm belief of God's declarations, and a ready obedience to his commands; and how can we account Gideon culpable in either of these respects? When the angel of the Lord, or a person much superior, as some suppose, appeared to him, and brought him the news of God's having appointed him to deliver his people from the oppression of the Midianites, he seems indeed at first to be willing to decline the office, as conscious of his own incapacity; but desires withal to have some conviction given him, as who, upon the like occasion, would not have desired some; that the messenger came from heaven, and was in reality no impostor; but when once he was satisfied in this, he never pretended to dispute the divine command.

He knew very well, that, when he pulled down the altar and grove of Baal, he must necessarily incense the whole country against him, and run the hazard of his own life; and yet, to do it more effectually, he took to his aid ten of his father's servants, and, that he might meet with no molestation, did it in the night. He knew very well, that when he sounded a trumpet, in order to form an insurrection in the country, and to raise some forces to assert his nation's liberty, the Midianites would interpret this as an open declaration of war, and come against him with an army as numerous as the sand on the sea shore for multitude; but this he mattered not. He knew that two and thirty thousand men, when he had raised them, were but a handful, in comparison of the enemy; and yet, to see two and twenty thousand of these desert him all at once, and of the ten thousand that remained, no more left at last than bare three hundred; this was enough to stagger any one's mind, that had not a firm reliance on the word and promises of God. He knew, that three hundred men, had they been all giants, and armed cap-a-pee with coats of mail, would not be able to do any great execution against so numerous a foe; but when he found, that, instead of being armed, he was to attack the enemy naked, and instead of swords and spears, as usual, his soldiers were to march in such a plight as never was seen before, with every one a light, a pitcher, and a trumpet in his hand; and, when they came up with their enemy, were to break their pitchers, flourish their lights, sound their trumpets, and, instead of regular fighting, were only to shout and roar, like so many men either mad or drunk; who but a Gideon, that had his faith confirmed by so many visions and miracles before, would have obeyed, and put in execution such orders as must have been thought wild, frantic, and absurd, had they proceeded from any other mouth but God's?

Well therefore might he be allowed to request a repetition, nay, a multiplication of miracles, who was to have the trial of his faith and obedience carried to such an extremity: but the truth of the matter is, that it was not for his own sake that he made this request. He had been sufficiently convinced by the fire's breaking out of the rock, at the touch of the rod in the angel's hand, that nothing was impossible to God, and that the means which he directed, how incongruous soever they might appear to men, would certainly not fail of their effect: but it was for the sake of his allies that had just now joined him in this expedition, that he sent up this petition to God, to have them likewise satisfied; and therefore we may observe, that when all the quotas were come up, and encamped together, then very likely in the audience of the whole army, he requested of God, 'and said, if thou wilt save Israel by my hand, as thou hast said, behold I will put a fleece of wool on the floor,' &c. It was for their sakes, I say, that the miracles were wrought, that they who were to share in so hazardous a war, and to destroy the army of the aliens with so small a force, nay, with no force at all, should have some assurance given them, that the God of Israel, who had so often promised their forefathers, that if they would continue in his favour, 'one of them should chase a thousand, and two of them put ten thousand to flight,' was determined to assist them in this enterprise.

If ever this promise was literally fulfilled, it was in this defeat which Gideon gave the Midianites: but the inhabitants of Succoth and Penuel, it seems, made but a jest and ridicule of it, for which they received a condign punishment; but of what kind their punishment was, commentators are not so well agreed. The word in the Hebrew signifies thrashing, and thence it is generally inferred, that Gideon caused the principal men of Succoth, who had denied his soldiers provision in their distress, to be stripped naked, laid flat on the ground, and a good quantity of thorns and briers heaped on them; that so, by cart-wheels, or other heavy carriages passing over them, their flesh might be pierced and torn, and themselves tortured, if not quite crushed to death.

This was a punishment not much unlike what David inflicted on the Ammonites, after he had taken their city Rabbah; but the Ammonites, in my opinion, did not so much deserve it as these: for thus stands the case. Gideon was now in pursuit of two kings, who, after the general rout of their army, were making their escape with a party of five thousand men. Coming to two places in the tribe of Gad, who were Israelites as well as he, and equally concerned to have been venturing their lives for the public liberty, he is denied a small refreshment for his men, fatigued all the night with fighting for them, and without some recruit, in no condition to continue their pursuit: so that, as far as in them lay, instead of assisting their gallant countrymen, who had merited every thing from their hands, these Gadites took part with the enemy, and did what they could to facilitate their escape, by denying some relief to their weary pursuers. By the right of war Gideon might have demanded this help from any nation, but much more from a people who were embarked in the same cause, and whose refusal of so small a boon had the aggravation of perfidy and ingratitude, as well as hard-heartedness, to inflame its guilt.

Nor was this all. His brethren the Gadites, not only refused him this common courtesy, but were very witty likewise, in making their jests and sarcasms upon Gideon. They upbraided him with the smallness of his army, and magnified the strength of his enemies, and thereby not only did all they could to discourage his men in their pursuit, but endeavoured likewise to have it believed, that there was no interposition of God in gaining this victory, and that Gideon would never be able to accomplish it: and so, to their other vile qualities, they added insult and irreligion, a contempt of God, and a disparagement of the man 'whom the Lord had made so strong for himself.' And therefore it is not at all to be wondered at, that Gideon, under all this exasperation, should choose to bring the two captive kings, with whom they had upbraided him, in triumph to these two places, and then resent the affront which was done to God, as well as himself, by making a severe example of some of the chief offenders.

It is suggested indeed by some, that Gideon was as great an offender as any, in his making an ephod for the purpose of idolatry; but before we admit of so rash a censure, we should inquire a little into the nature of this ephod, and for what possible purpose it was at first made.

¹ An ephod, we know, is a common vestment belonging to priests in general; but that of the high priest was of very great value. This vestment, however, was not so peculiar to the priests, but that sometimes we find the laity, as in the case of David bringing home the ark of God, allowed to wear it: and therefore some have imagined, that the ephod which Gideon made, was only a rich and costly robe of state, which, on certain occasions, he might wear, to denote the station he held in the Jewish republic. But if his intent was only to distinguish himself from others by such a particular vestment, how this could give occasion to the people's falling into idolatry, or any way become a snare to Gideon and his house, we cannot conceive.

Others therefore suppose, that the word ephod is a short expression to denote the high priest's breastplate, together with the Urim and Thummin; and hence, by an easy figure, they are led to think, that to make an ephod is to establish a priesthood; and thereupon conclude, that Gideon's crime, in making this ephod, was not to establish idolatry, but only to institute another priesthood, besides that which God had appointed in Aaron and his posterity: and, to this purpose, they suppose, that he erected a private tabernacle, an altar, a mercy-seat, with cherubim, &c., that being now made the supreme governor, he might consult God at his own house, in such difficult points as occurred in his administration.

But besides that it is not easy to imagine, that a man familiar with God, and chosen by him, as Gideon was, should, after so signal a victory as he had obtained, immediately apostatize, as he must have done, had he set up an oracle in his own house, there seems to have been no manner of necessity for it, because Shiloh, where the tabernacle stood, was in the tribe of Ephraim, which adjoined to that of Manasseh, whereunto Gideon belonged. ² Nor should it be forgotten, that this ephod was ³ 'set up in Ophrah,' which place Gideon ⁴ quitted, as soon as he had resigned his public employ, and retiring to a country-house of his own, in all probability left this ephod behind him: there is reason therefore to believe, that the design of setting it up, was merely to be a monument of his remarkable victory over the Midianites, in like manner as other conquerors had done before him; only as the common custom was, to erect a pillar, or hang up trophies upon the like occasion, he chose rather to make an ephod, or priest's habit, perhaps all of solid gold, as a token that he ascribed this victory only to God, and triumphed in nothing so much, as in the reformation of the true religion by that means. This was an action of no bad intent in Gideon, though, in after-times, when the people began to return to idolatry, and had this fancy among others, that God would answer them at Ophrah, where this ephod was, as well as his tabernacle in Shiloh, it was perverted to a bad purpose. But as this abuse arose from the mad caprice of the people, and not from any ill intent in Gideon, he is no more chargeable therewith, than Moses was with the idolatrous worship which the Israelites, in future ages, paid to the brazen serpent, which he, for very beneficial purposes, at first set up.

It is generally supposed, ⁵ that the sacred history has not furnished us with a complete catalogue of the several judges that governed Israel, from the death of Joshua to the reign of Saul; and that even of those whom it takes notice of, it relates nothing but what was most remarkable in their lives and actions: and yet, notwithstanding this conciseness, it is far more exact and instructive than the history of Josephus, to which ⁶ Scaliger seems to give a preference above all others. The fault of Josephus, as any one may perceive it, is this:—That he omits the account of several miracles which the Holy Scripture relates, for fear that other nations, to whom he writes, should think that he gives too much into the marvellous, though at the same time, he makes no scruple of sacrificing the glory of God to his own private character.

For this reason it is, that ⁷ he says nothing of the angel's touching with the end of his rod the sacrifice which Gideon had prepared, and so causing fire to flame out of the rock and consume it; nothing of the two signs which God was pleased to grant him, for the confirmation of his and his confederates' faith, exhibited in the fleece's being at one time wet, and at another dry;

nothing of his zeal in demolishing the altar and grove of Baal, for which he drew upon himself the indignation of all the abettors of idolatry; and here, in the matter of Shamgar, he suppresses the circumstance of his slaying 600 Philistines with an ox-goad, though this be the only remarkable action recorded of him, and what may, not improbably, be thus accounted for.

In not many ages after this, we read that these very Philistines, with whom he had here to do, had disarmed the Israelites to that degree, that ¹ none in their whole army, when they came to action, had either sword or spear, but only Saul and Jonathan his son; nay, that they would not so much as suffer a smith to live among them, for fear of their providing themselves with military weapons, but obliged them to repair to them, whenever they wanted to sharpen or repair their instruments of husbandry.

Now, it must be allowed, that the Scriptures say nothing of any such reduction as this, in the days of Shamgar: but if such was the policy of the Philistines, in the beginning of Saul's reign, why may we not suppose that it commenced some time sooner? This certainly the Scripture tells us expressly, that ² 'in the days of Shamgar, the highways were unoccupied, and the inhabitants of the villages ceased,' by reason of the Philistines, who came and plundered the country, and carried off what booty they pleased, without molestation; and therefore, it is not unlikely, that for want of some regular arms, whereof the Philistines had stripped the Israelites, Shamgar might make himself a goad, so well contrived, that with it he could kill any man, without any manner of suspicion that it was made for that purpose, but only for common use; that with this instrument he usually went to plough; ³ and when, at any time, the Philistines made their inroads into his lauds, he, with the assistance of his servants, who, perhaps, were armed in the like manner, fell upon them, and, at several times, killed to the number of 600 of them in the space of about twenty years. This is a fair analysis of the sense of the words; and where is the great incongruity of this? Or what, indeed, is there in the whole, that an ordinary master of a family, with his domestics about him, might not do, even though we should not call in any supernatural strength to his assistance?

There is more reason, however, why we should have recourse to the supernatural aid of God, in Samson's slaying 1000 of these Philistines, at one heat as it were, with no other weapon than the 'jaw-bone of an ass.' ⁴ For though asses in Syria, as the learned affirm, are both stronger and larger than what we have with us, and their bones consequently fitted for such hard service as this; yet it must be owned, that it was by the wonderful strength that God infused into him, and not to any aptitude of the instrument he made use of, that he was enabled to do all this execution, which is only incredible to those ⁵ that do not consider the power of God, who can raise our natural strength to what degree he pleases, and, at the same time, enfeeble the spirits of those who oppose his designs, in such a manner, that they shall have no power to help themselves.

It must be owned, however, that there are some circumstances in this transaction which might possibly intimidate the Philistines, and thereby contribute to facilitate the slaughter which Samson made among them. The people of Judah had now prevailed with him to suffer himself to be bound, and conducted to the Philistines' camp. The Philistines, as soon as they saw him coming, ran out with joy to receive him, and very likely forgot to take their arms with them, as knowing for certainty, that he was safe enough now, and bound, as we say, to his good behaviour. But when, contrary to their expectation, they saw him first break the cords so easily and suddenly, and then coming upon them with such fury and vengeance, ⁶ it is not unlikely this might put them in no small confusion, and as they straggled about in their flight, gave him the opportunity of slaying them one by one, as he came up with them.

This, we must allow, is the highest instance of personal prowess that we any where read of; and yet profane historians inform us of other men, who, by their mere natural courage, unassisted by any divine power, (as the Scripture informs us Samson was,) have made great havoc among their enemies. For Flavius Vopiscus reports, that in the Sarmatic war, Aurelian slew forty-eight men in one day, and in several days ^b 950, which diminishes the wonder of this achievement of Samson's not a little; especially considering, that the Philistines, in their surprise, might think that this was all a trick and management of his conductors to get so many unarmed men into their power, and that they too were ready to fall upon them, and assist him, in case they should make any opposition against their champion.

That Samson, after so long a fatigue, should be almost ready to ^c die with thirst, is no strange thing at all; but the question is, how, in a place where no water was, he came to have this thirst allayed? The Hebrew word mactes does properly signify the socket, in which the great teeth in the jaw are fastened; and from hence Bochart, among many others, endeavours to maintain by arguments, that God made one of these teeth drop out of the jaw, wherewith Samson had done all this execution, and immediately a stream of water gushed out from thence. But with all due deference to the learning of so great a man, ⁶ it is somewhat strange, that he should

^b Upon this occasion the boys made a song, not much unlike that which Samson made of himself, (Judg. xv. 16.), which, after a military manner, they shouted in their dances: "We, a single man, have slain a thousand men—a thousand we have slain—long life to him who slew his thousands—no one has as much wine as the blood shed by him."

^c Josephus gives us a strange account of the reason of Samson's thirst, and what there is no matter of foundation for in the Scripture. "Samson," says he, "was so transported with the thoughts of this victory, that he had the vanity to assume the honour of the action to himself, without ascribing the glory of it to God's power and providence, as he ought to have done. But while this arrogant and overweening humour was yet upon him, he found himself seized with a violent parching thirst, which gave him to understand, that, after all his successes, he was but flesh and blood still, and liable to human infirmities. The sense of this disorder brought him to the knowledge of himself, and to a penitent confession that the victory was God's, and that he was able to do nothing of himself without the divine assistance. He begged pardon for his past vanity and presumption. His prayers were not in vain; for immediately there gushed out of a rock, that was hard by, a stream of delicious water to relieve him in his raging drought."—Antiquities, b. 5. c. 1.

not observe, when he had this passage under consideration, that such a miracle as this would be inconsistent with the words which follow: 'wherefore' he called the name thereof,' that is, of the fountain of water which gushed out, 'En-hakkor,' or 'the well of him that cried to God, which is in Lehi even unto this day.' Lehi is here therefore the proper name of a place. This place had doubtless its appellation from this adventure of Samson's with the jaw-bone, and from this place God caused a spring to arise, that he might allay his hero's thirst. For it is incongruous to think, that the jaw of an ass, or any other creature, could have subsisted to the time when the author of this book of Judges lived; or (if all this while none should have had the curiosity to take away this wonderful bone) that God should, out of the socket of one of its teeth, cause a stream of water to flow, by one continual, useless miracle.

It must then be a mistake in our version, to render the words, 'God clave a hollow place, which was in the jaw,' when, according to the a sense of the ancients upon this place, they should be translated, 'which was in Lehi.' For the truth of the matter is, that though this jaw be long extinct and gone, yet those who have travelled through this part of Palestine do inform us, that in the suburbs of Eleutheropolis, where Lehi very likely stood, the fountain which arose upon this occasion is still remaining, and called the fountain of the jaw to this day.

But be that as it will, whether the water which refreshed Samson in this his distress came from the jawbone, or, others think, from a cliff in a rock, or a hollow in the earth, the miracle is the same, though it may not be improper, whenever we can by an easier interpretation, to take away occasion from those that seek occasion to disparage the oracles of God.

We are not, however, concerned to vindicate Samson in all his extravagant and outrageous actions; such as his marrying an idolatress, and then leaving her; his loving lewd women, and discovering the great secret whereon his all depended to a common prostitute; his killing some and maiming others, who perhaps had never done him any personal injury; and setting the whole country on fire, to burn their corn-fields and vineyards, with many other things that might be alleged against him. All that we have to say is, that God raised him up to be a scourge to the Philistines, and that had there not been some peculiarities in his temper, he had not been so proper an instrument in his hand; or that, had he not run himself so often into præmures, he would not have had so frequent occasion to employ the strength which God had given him, in extricating himself from thence by the death and destruction of his enemies. Though a To this purpose we may observe, that the Seventy interpreters, the Chaldee Paraphrast, and Josephus in his history, make it to be a proper name of a place, whence the waters gushed out. The words in the Septuagint are, 'God clave a hollow place in the ground, which was afterwards called Lehi, or Siagon, and out of it issued water.' Josephus is quoted before, only he had these words farther, "which rock," says our translator of Josephus, "from the exploit of Samson, bears the name of a jaw unto this very day." And the words of the Paraphrast are directly to the same purpose: so that it is much to be wondered at, how so learned and acute a man as Bochart, should overlook these sentiments of the ancients.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

therefore there was no fatality in making him of this unruly disposition, (for that he contracted himself,) yet there was a wise direction of God's providence in making his rugged temper subservient to his purposes, and even out of his faults and enormities extracting the plagues and punishment of his foes; for ² 'surely the wrath of man shall praise thee,' says the Psalmist, 'and the remainder of his wrath shalt thou restrain.' This we may lay down as a general reason for God's making use of so furious an instrument as Samson was, in the execution of his will: and now, let us examine a little into the other inconsistencies which some pretend to espy in the sequel of this story.

A certain anonymous author, ^b in a dissertation upon Samson's foxes, has solved the whole difficulty of that piece of history, if we will but admit of his suppositions. He supposes that the word schualim, which we render foxes, should, with a little variation, be written schoolim, which denotes sheaves, or rather shocks of corn; and that the word zanab, which, in our translation, is a tail, equally signifies the extreme or outermost part of any thing. Thus, in an orchard planted in the form of a quinconce, the farthest tree is called zanab; and, in like manner, the extreme or outside shocks in a field may be so called here: and then the sense of the words will be, "That Samson, at different places, set fire to 300 shocks of corn, which stood in the out parts of the fields belonging to the Philistines, and so, by the fire's spreading from shock to shock, destroyed, in a manner, all their crop."

But without entertaining any novel interpretation, and which, upon examination, perhaps will hardly bear the test, we may adventure to say, that these 300 foxes, which Samson is said to have caught, are not, even in a literal sense, so incredible a thing, nor so liable to ridicule, as some may imagine. For we are to consider, (as the learned ³ Bochart, from the account of several travellers, evinces,) that the whole country, especially that part of it which belonged to the tribe of Gad, so abounded with foxes, that from them ⁴ several places took their names: that under the name of foxes may not improperly be comprehended a creature very much like them, called thoes, which go in such herds, that 200 of them have been seen together at once; that the manner of catching them was not, as we may imagine, by hunting only, but by snares and nets, as the above-mentioned author plainly demonstrates; and that Samson did not do this alone by himself, in a day and night's time, but that, being assisted by his servants and neighbours, as he was a man of considerable eminence in his country, he might possibly be some weeks in accomplishing his design.

His design, however, will not appear so romantic, if

However, I thought convenient to make mention of it, because there seems to be something ingenious, as well as singular in it.

A. M. 2561. A. C. 1443; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4159. A. C. 1222. JUD. i. TO THE END OF RUTH.

we consider what collections have been made of creatures much wilder and rarer than foxes: that ¹ Lucius Sylla, when he was prætor, ordered to be shown, on the amphitheatre, a hundred lions; Julius Cæsar, when he was dictator, four hundred; and that ² the emperor Probus, at one spectacle, exhibited a thousand ostriches, a thousand stags, a hundred Lybian, and a hundred Syrian leopards, and an infinite number of other strange creatures: and why then should it be thought to be a thing so incredible, as to need the intervention of a miracle, as some contend, for Samson, with the assistance of his friends, who might be let into his design, to get together, in some time, three hundred foxes, in a country that everywhere abounded with them?

Foxes, we are none of us ignorant, are very apt to do a great deal of mischief wherever they abound, and ³ therefore Samson might have this farther aim in collecting so many, namely, that thereby he might clear his own country of such noxious animals, and at the same time, that he very well knew, no creature could be more convenient for his purpose of annoying and detriming his enemies. For as these creatures are very swift of foot, and have a natural dread of fire, they could not well fail, when once they were turned into it, of setting the standing corn in a blaze, and then, as they were tied in couples, tail to tail, this would make them draw one against the other, and so being retarded in their flight, and staying longer in a place, they would give the fire more time to spread itself, and make a conflagration universal.

Upon the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that the mustering up such a number of foxes, in order to burn up the Philistines' corn, was neither a foolish nor impracticable thing, supposing Samson was at liberty to prosecute his revenge in this manner. ^a But for his

^a Dr Kennicott contends for the translation noticed above, namely, that instead of foxes we should read handfuls or sheaves, but this meaning does not seem borne out by the use of the word in other places, nor is it supported by the context in this place. The following strictures on this criticism, and remarks on this subject generally, we quote from Dr Harris's Natural History of the Bible. "However plausible this turn may seem, I think that it is as far from the sense of the sacred historian as it is from our translation, which, I imagine, truly expresses his meaning. For the word לַקָּרֶן lakar, which our Translators have rendered 'caught,' never signifies simply to get, take, or fetch, but always to catch, seize, or take by assault, stratagem, or surprise, &c., unless the following place, 1 Sam. xiv. 47, 'So Saul took the kingdom over Israel,' be an exception. Again, admitting the proposed alteration in the word שָׂרָף, shulol, it will be difficult to prove that even then it means a sheaf. The word is used but three times in the whole Bible. Its meaning must be gathered from the connexion in which it stands here. The first place is 1 Kings xx. 10, where it is rendered 'handfuls,' not of grain, but of dust. 'The gods do so unto me, and more also,' says Benhadad, king of Syria, 'if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfuls for all the people that follow me.' In Isaiah xl. 12. the same word is translated, 'the hollow of the hand.' 'Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out the heavens with a span.' The last place in which the word occurs is Ezekiel xiii. 9. 'And will ye pollute me among my people for handfuls of barley, and for pieces of bread?' The connexion here with pieces of bread seems evidently to point out to us handfuls of barley in the grain, not handfuls or sheaves in the ear and straw. In fine, from the places quoted, taken in their several connexions, the word plainly appears to mean a measure of capacity, as much as the hollow of the hand can hold; as a hand-breadth is used in Scripture for righteousness in this, and many of his other proceedings, we are, as we said before, no ways accountable, unless his a measure of extension. Add to this, that in all other places of Scripture where we meet with the word handful, that is, as much grain in the stock as the reaper can grasp in his hand, or sheaf, a collection of such handfuls bound together, different terms from that in dispute, are always made use of in the original; as Ruth ii. 15, 16, and elsewhere.

"The supposed incredulity of the story, as it stands in our bibles, is, I imagine, the only reason for forcing it into another meaning. The language of the critics I oppose, is this: 'The action of Samson, as represented in our translation, is so extraordinary, that it must be miraculous. The occasion was unworthy of the divine interposition. Therefore the Translators of the Bible must in this particular have mistaken the meaning of the sacred historian.' But we have shown above, from an examination of the principal terms, that the translation is just. It remains then to be shown, either that the occasion was not unworthy of the divine interposition, or that the action was not above human capacity. The latter, I am fully persuaded, is the truth of the case, though I am far from thinking the former indefensible. The children of Israel were, in a peculiar manner, separated from the rest of mankind, for this purpose more especially, to preserve in the world, till the times of general reformation should come, the knowledge and worship of the one true God. At sundry times, and in divers manners, did the Deity for this end interpose. Many instances of this kind are recorded in the book of Judges. When this people perverted the end of their distinguished privileges, God suffered them to be enslaved by those idolatrous nations whose false deities they had worshipped. By this means they were brought to a sense of their error; and when they were sufficiently humbled, 'the Lord raised up judges, which delivered them out of the hand of those that spoiled them.' Jud. ii. 16. In such a state of servitude to the Philistines were they at this time. Samson was raised up in an extraordinary manner to be their deliverer; and his intermarriage with the Philistines was a means which Providence saw fit to make use of to effect their deliverance. Thus the affair is represented, Samson proposes his intentions to his parents. They expostulate with him. 'Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among all thy people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines?' 'But they,' adds the sacred historian, 'were ignorant that it was of the Lord, that he sought an occasion against the Philistines; for at that time the Philistines had dominion over Israel.' Though Samson, then, might propose to himself nothing more in forming a connexion with a foreign lady, than the gratification of his own inclinations, yet we are warranted to say, an overruling Providence had a further design. The same may be affirmed of other actions of Samson, which appear to have proceeded from passions of a more rugged complexion. His intention in them might be unworthy of a divine interposition; but the end which God had in view, the deliverance of a people chosen to preserve his worship in the world, would make it highly fit and necessary. Nor ought it to be reckoned strange, that such means should be used; for we are authentically assured, that the wrath of man, and, by parity of reason, other passions too, are sometimes made to praise the Lord. Thus much I thought necessary to say, for the sake of those to whom a solution on natural principles shall seem unsatisfactory. Such a solution I now proceed to give.

"In the first place, it is evident from the Holy Scriptures, that Palestine abounded with foxes, or that animal, be it what it will, which is signified by the Hebrew word שָׂרָף, shulol. This appears from many passages. Psalm lxxiii. 10; Cant. ii. 15; Lam. v. 18; 1 Sam. xiii. 17; Josh. xv. 28; xix. 3. From their numbers, then, the capture would be easy.

"Further: under the Hebrew word שָׂרָף, shulol, was probably comprehended another animal, very similar to the fox, and very numerous in Palestine; gregarious, and whose Persian name is radically the same with the Hebrew. It is no easy matter to determine, whether the Hebrew שָׂרָף, shulol, means the common fox (canis vulpes;) or the juckal, (canis aureus;) "the little eastern fox," as Hasselquist calls him. Several of the modern oriental names of the juckal, that is, the Turkish chical, the Persian scigal, scigal, or schaal (whence the French chacal, and English jackal;) from their resemblance to the Hebrew, favour the latter interpretation. Perhaps the term may include both animals, although it seems most probable that being considered as a chief among the Israelites, (whom God had raised up to annoy the Philistines, and in such methods as this, rather than open war, to weaken them by his personal valour and strength,) may be admitted in justification of what he did. But to proceed.

it was the jackal that Samson employed. Dr Shaw is of this opinion, and observes, that "as these are creatures by far the most common and familiar, as well as the most numerous of any in the eastern countries, we may well perceive the great possibility there was for Samson to take, or cause to be taken, three hundred of them. The fox properly so called, he adds is rarely to be met with, neither is it gregarious." So Hasselquist remarks: "Jackals are found in great numbers about Gaza; and, from their gregarious nature, it is much more probable that Samson should have caught three hundred of them, than of the solitary quadruped, the fox." Allowing this to be the animal, the story is easily admissible to belief, without the supposition of a miracle. For it is not said, that Samson caught so many foxes in one hour, or one day; or, that he caught them all with his own hands. Being then judge of Israel, he might employ many hands, and yet be said, according to the common use of language, to do it himself.

"Add to this, that the season, the days of wheat harvest, was extremely favourable for hunting these animals; and, as they were gregarious, many might be surrounded or entrapped at once.

"I shall conclude with an argument more in favour of the justness of our translation, in rendering the word שׁוֹאֵל, shoal, 'a fox,' not a sheaf. It has been esteemed by some persons of extensive literature to be a demonstrative argument. I shall mention it, and leave it to stand on its own bottom. At the feast of Ceres, the goddess of corn, celebrated annually at Rome about the middle of April, there was the observance of this custom,—to fix burning torches to the tails of a number of foxes, and to let them run through the circus till they were burnt to death. This was done in revenge upon that species of animals, for having once burned up the fields of corn. The reason, indeed, assigned by Ovid, is too frivolous an origin for so solemn a rite; and the time of its celebration, the 17th of April, it seems, was not harvest time, when the fields were covered with corn,—'vestitus messibus agros;' for the middle of April was seed-time in Italy, as appears from Virgil's Georgics. Hence we must infer that this rite must have taken its rise from some other event than that by which Ovid accounted for it; and Samson's foxes are a probable origin of it. The time agrees exactly, as may be collected from several passages of Scripture. For instance, from the book of Exodus we learn, that before the Passover, that is, before the fourteenth day of the month Abib, or March, barley in Egypt was in the ear; (xii. 18; xiii. 4.) And in ch. ix. 31, 32, it is said, that the wheat at that time was not grown up. Barley harvest, then, in Egypt, and so in the country of the Philistines which bordered upon it, must have fallen about the middle of March. Wheat harvest, according to Pliny, N. H. lib. viii. c. 7, was a month later. 'In Egypt barley is reaped on the sixth month after sowing, corn on the seventh.' Therefore, wheat harvest happened about the middle of April; the very time in which the burning of foxes was observed at Rome.

"It is certain that the Romans borrowed many of their rites and ceremonies, both serious and ludicrous, from foreign nations: and Egypt and Phœnicia furnished them with more, perhaps, than any other country. From one of these, the Romans might either receive this rite immediately, or through the hands of their neighbours the Carthaginians, who were a colony of Phœnicians; and so its true origin may be referred back to the story which we have been considering."

miraculous gift, not, ² perhaps always inherent in him, but only dispensed at certain times, when the Spirit of God came upon him. ³ It depended indeed on the covenant made between God and him, the sign of which covenant was his hair; and therefore when, in compliance to his harlot, he suffered his hair to be cut off, he broke the covenant with God, and forfeiting the spirit of strength and courage, was left to his own natural weakness, and so became an easy prey to his enemies. But having been now a considerable time in prison, wherein he was cruelly used, he began to repent no doubt of his folly; and therefore making fervent supplications to God for pardon of the violation of his Nazaritism, he renewed his vow, and so, being restored to the condition he was in before he lost the favour of God, his strength began to grow and increase, in proportion as his hair did.

When his hair was thus grown, and his strength returned, it is made a question, whether the house, as it is called in Scripture, which he pulled down, was the temple of Dagon, for whose honour this festival was appointed, or some other edifice?

That it was not a common house, is evident from the multitude of the people which it contained; and though the temples of the Philistines are supposed ¹ by some to have been of the same figure and make with those in Egypt, that is a kind of rotunda, flat-roofed, with a large portico without, and pillars within to sustain the building; yet this seems to be no more than a fiction, devoid of all authority, and accommodated to the purpose of solving this difficulty. It is not certain, that the Egyptian temples were built in this manner, and much more probable it is that this house of their famous god Dagon was made of stone; and though it wanted no proper supports, yet it is scarce supposable, that in a structure of this kind, the whole weight should be supported by two pillars only, and these so very contiguous, that Samson could lay hold on them both at one time.

The most general opinion, therefore, is, that this was a structure which the Philistines made use of, upon such occasions as this, built all of wood, and supported by wooden pillars, in the form of the theatres which in after-times were in great request among the Romans. Towards the middle of this building, we may suppose that there were two large beams, upon which the weight of the whole structure lay; and that these beams were supported by two pillars, which stood in a manner contiguous to each other. So that, as soon as Samson had moved and unsettled these, down must the principals, and with them the whole building, come. The only remaining difficulty is, how a building made of wood, and supported by two pillars only, should be able to contain such a multitude of men and women? But whoever reads ^a Pliny's Natural History, will therein find a

^a The words of Pliny upon this occasion are so very remarkable, that I thought it not improper to quote them. 'He erected two vast wooden theatres, suspended each on a hinge that rested on a moveable pillar: while the forenoon spectacle of the games was exhibiting, they were opposite to one another, lest the noise of exhibition should disturb their mutual attention; but no sooner was the exhibition over, than by a sudden impulse they were forced round again, so that they stood in juxtaposition; and in the evening by the taking down of the scenery, and by combining description of two theatres, built by Curio, capable of containing a much greater number of people than the Philistines are here said to be, and yet what was a wonder much greater than the two pillars here, whenever they were turned round, as they frequently were, to meet and make one amphitheatre, they both rested upon one hinge only, which, had it happened to slip, must have occasioned, as our author tells us, a much greater slaughter than what was at the battle of Cannæ; as, by the actual fall of an amphitheatre, built by Atilius, no fewer than fifty thousand persons as ^a Tacitus relates the story, were killed, wounded, and maimed: which is enough, one would think, to silence the cavils of those who are apt to fancy that a building of such capacity could not be so contrived as to rely only on two supporters.^b

the two wings, an amphitheatre was formed, and the gladiatorial spectacles were exhibited, it was capable of enclosing the whole of the Roman freemen who had become gladiators for hire. But in this erection what can we most admire? the inventor or the invention? the workman or the planner? that any one should dare to plan or execute it? should act as servant or master in it? Besides all these there was added the madness of the people, who dared to sit on a foundation so imperfect and unstable, ready every moment to be overwhelmed in ruin."—B. 36. c. 15.

^a The fall of this amphitheatre Tacitus relates in these words: "In the consulship of Marcus Licinius and Lucius Calpurnius, the horror of an unforeseen calamity equalled the havoc of mighty conflicting armies. Its beginning and termination were simultaneous. A certain freedman, named Atilius, erected an amphitheatre at Fidene for the exhibition of gladiatorial combats; but its wooden texture was utterly devoid of all solidity and safety, for he was urged to its erection by no superfluity of riches nor desire of municipal honours, but by the base love of money. At the command of the emperor Tiberius, vast crowds of both sexes and of every age and class, were seen eagerly rushing to Fidene, and as the distance from Rome to Fidene was but small, (only five miles) so on that account the misfortune was rendered the greater; no sooner was the building crammed with the multitude, than all at once it gave way, some parts of it falling in, dragging headlong, and burying the spectators, while the other parts of it falling outwards, overwhelmed the crowded masses of people around its walls. By this disaster, 50,000 beings are said to have been killed or mutilated."—Annal. iv. 62.

^b The sentiments of Sir Christopher Wren on this subject, will doubtless be considered as important. "In considering what this fabric must have been, that could at one pull be demolished, I conceive it was an oval amphitheatre, the scene in the middle, where a vast roof of cedar beams resting round upon the walls centered all upon one short architrave, that united two cedar pillars in the middle. The pillars would not be sufficient to unite the ends of at least one hundred beams, that tended to the centre; wherefore, I say, there must be a short architrave resting upon two pillars, upon which all the beams tending to the centre of the amphitheatre, might be supported. Now if Samson by his miraculous strength pressing upon one of these pillars, moved it from its basis, the whole roof must of necessity fall."—Parentalia, p. 359. "The eastern method of building may assist us in accounting for the particular structure of the temple or house of Dagon, (Judg. xvi.) and the great number of people that were buried in the ruins of it, by pulling down the two principal pillars. We read (v. 27.) that about three thousand persons were upon the roof to behold while Samson made sport. Samson must therefore have been in a court or area below them, and consequently the temple will be of the same kind with the ancient sacred enclosures, surrounded only in part or altogether with some plan or cloistered buildings. Several palaces and dun-wanas, as they call the courts of justice in these countries, are built in this fashion; where upon their festivals and rejoicings a great quantity of sand is strewed upon the area for the wrestlers to fall upon, whilst the roof of the cloisters round about is crowded with spectators of their strength and agility. I have often seen hundreds of people diverted in this manner upon the roof of the dey's palace at Algiers; which, like many more of the same quality and denomination, hath an advanced

And indeed all the other exceptions, which are usually made to Samson's character and conduct, are in effect no more than mere cavils, which arise in a great measure from an unacquaintedness with the idiom of the Hebrew tongue. For as, when in Jotham's parable, 'wine' is said ¹ 'to cheer both God and man: the words Elohim, and Anashim, may signify as well high and low, princes and peasants, that is, all conditions of men do find themselves cheered and refreshed with wine; so when it is said, that ² 'the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon Samson,' we are not to understand thereby, that he had any grace extraordinary, or sanctifying influences of the Blessed Spirit communicated to him, but only that he was endowed with wonderful courage and fortitude, an undaunted mind, and a supernatural strength of body at such and such times, which enabled him to do great acts, but made no alteration in his manners. And in like manner, when he is said to ³ 'have judged Israel twenty years,' we need not infer, that he was the supreme magistrate in the republic, for that very probably was Eli, but only that he was the chief man of war, whose valour was renowned, and who did many great and signal exploits, in order to rescue his countrymen from the oppression of their enemies, and to restore them to their former liberty: I say, in order to this, for he did not perfect their deliverance: only, by the several defeats which he gave them, and the great damages he did them, he infused into the Israelites such a spirit and resolution, that not many years after, they took up arms, and appearing in the field against them, defeated, and subdued them; so that, in all the days of Samuel, we hear of no farther molestation from that quarter.

The Scripture, however, furnishes us with a reason why idolatry was not abolished, and a thorough reformation of religion established, during this period: for it tells us, that ⁴ 'in those days,' namely, between the death of Joshua, and the first institution of the judges, 'there was no king,' that is, no chief ruler or magistrate, for the regal authority did not as yet begin, in Israel, 'but every one did that which was right in his own eyes;' so that considering the natural propensity of the people to idolatry, and the want of a supreme power lodged in some one's hand to control them, we need not wonder, that before the institution of judges, they fell into the like practices with the nations among whom they lived.

The judges indeed were invested with authority to suppress these practices; but then we are to consider, that few or none of them had a jurisdiction over the whole land of Israel, but were only rulers of some particular cantons, which they undertook to deliver from imminent danger; and therefore how zealous soever they cloister over against the gate of the palace, (Esth. v. 1.) made in the fashion of a large pent-house, supported only by one or two contiguous pillars in the front, or else in the centre. In such open structures as these, in the midst of their guards and counsellors, are the bashas, kadees, and other great officers, assembled to distribute justice, and transact the public affairs of their provinces. Here likewise they have their public entertainments, as the lords and others of the Philistines had in the house of Dagon. Upon a supposition therefore, that in the house of Dagon, there was a cloistered structure of this kind, the pulling down of the front, or centre pillars only, which supported it, would be attended with the like catastrophe that happened to the Philistines."—Shaw's Travels, p. 283.—Ed.

might be for a reformation, yet since their authority was not of sufficient extension, the wonder is not great, that idolatry should still be practised in some dark corners of the land, and that in the tribe of Dan, which was so far distant, 'there should be set up Mical's graven image which he made, at the time that the ark of the Lord was at Shiloh.'

Shiloh indeed was so far distant from several parts of the land of Canaan, that people began to account it too much trouble to go up thither to pay their vows and oblations, and therefore bethought themselves of setting up private chapels, wherein, as they supposed, they might serve God as well; and in the institution of these, being left to their own fancies, they generally intermixed some idolatrous practices, and, partly in imitation of the cherubim at Shiloh, and the teraphim among their heathen neighbours, chose to worship God through some visible representation, which, by one means or other, was carried on in time to direct idolatry.

The Moabites, we know, even when the Israelites were in a state of independency, and had reason sufficient to have a jealous eye over them, by their arts and contrivances drew them into the worship of their god Baal-peor; and much more might the nations, to whom they were now in subjection, succeed in their attempts, either of recommending, or, if need required it, of forcing their religion upon them: so that it was not to be wondered at, if things ran into such disorder, when there was, if not a total dissolution, at least a grievous relaxation of government; when some of the governors themselves were far from being the best of men; and through inclination, entreaty, or compulsion, the people were so liable, upon many occasions, to relapse into idolatry.

What Mical's intention might be in setting up a teraphim, and other kind of images in his house, commentators are not so well agreed. Those that are willing to apologize for the thing, are ready to say, ² that as he lived in a time of great trouble and confusion, wherein the public worship of God was much neglected, if not totally disused, his design was to erect a kind of domestic tabernacle, wherein he might serve God in private, since he could not, without much difficulty, do it in public; and that the sacred habiliments he made, his ephod, his teraphim, &c. were no more than what he had seen at Shiloh: but since the laws of God condemn ³ the making images of any kind, as objects of adoration; the setting up any religious worship, different from what he had established; the offering sacrifices, or ⁴ performing any public service any where but in the tabernacle; and the employing any priests in his worship but such as were of the race of Aaron; it is certain that Mical was guilty of a violation of all these prohibitions, and in the matter of these graven and molten images, cannot be excused from the crime of idolatry.

And indeed, unless he intended to patronize that, what reasons could he have to make any innovations in religion, since, according as we date this action, either Phinehas or Eli were then in the high priest's office at Shiloh, where the public worship was performed in all its formality, and from whence Mical, who lived in the mountains of Ephraim, was not so very distant, but that he might have gone thither upon all solemn occasions.

The Spirit of God therefore, in repeating the admonition, that 'in those days there was no king in Israel,' &c. before it begins to relate this story of Mical, seems to insinuate, that this was a wicked and enormous practice of his; that the worship he instituted was idolatrous, and the priest he had procured to officiate, a renegade: and if so, the answer this priest received in behalf of the Danites, and wherein he promised them the success they met with, must have proceeded from no good principle, unless we suppose, what seems indeed most reasonable, that the Levite promised them success, because he was minded to please them, merely out of his own head, though, to give it a better sanction, he might pretend to receive it from this fictitious oracle. In this case, there was no occasion of having recourse to any oracle whatever; because any man of a moderate foresight, considering the undaunted courage and valour of the Danites, and the supine negligence and cowardice of the people of Laish, if once they came to action, might, without the spirit of prophecy, foretell the event.

The directions which God gave Moses concerning Joshua's consulting the divine oracle, are conceived in these words:—⁵ 'He shall stand before Eleazar the priest, who shall ask counsel for him, after the judgment of Urim, before the Lord; at his word shall they go out, and at his word shall they come in, both he and all the children of Israel with him, even all the congregation.' In all the book of Joshua indeed we do not find, that he had this constant recourse to the oracle, ⁶ and from hence some Jewish doctors conclude, that he was bound to do this only at his first entrance upon his office, to demonstrate to the people that he was Moses' successor; but that afterwards the spirit of prophecy rested upon him, so that he knew how to conduct all public affairs, without having occasion for this oracular advice. Moses we know made no use of the Urim and Thummim, to consult God by the mediation of the high priest: he went immediately and directly to God himself; but we do not read that Joshua was admitted to such familiarity, nor had he such frequent revelations from God, as his predecessors had. And therefore, as God was pleased, in supplying that defect, to remit him to this method of consulting him; we cannot but think, that upon every momentous occasion, especially in the weighty affairs of war, he was always careful to pursue it: and therefore the words in the beginning of Judges, 'Now after the death of Joshua, the children of Israel asked of the Lord, saying, Who shall go up for us against the Canaanites?' do not import, that they never consulted God by way of Urim and Thummim, during the life of Joshua, but rather that after the death of so great a commander, they were at a stand what to do, nor would they adventure to proceed in the war of Canaan, without following the same directions which were given to Joshua, and which he had so long pursued with so good success.

Nay, the consulting of the divine oracle, especially in matters of war, was accounted so very necessary, in order to obtain success, that some commentators have esteemed this the only reason why the Israelites, in so just a cause as punishing the Benjamites for their unheard of wickedness, were, in two several battles, defeated; even because they did not previously apply to God, as they should have done. ¹ They sent up indeed to the house of the Lord, and asked counsel of him, and said, Which of us shall go up first to the battle against the children of Benjamin? that is, which of their tribes should have the honour or hazard of making the first attack: ² but it is observable, that they had come to a full resolution of making war against the Benjamites, and, to that purpose, had made draughts of the men that were to be employed in it, without ever consulting God, whether an enterprise of this nature, wherein there was likely to be such an effusion of the blood of their brethren, would be pleasing to him or no. ³ The truth is, they never questioned his approbation of what they accounted so laudable: they presumed upon his protection and assistance; and the vast superiority of their forces made them confident of success. But now, in a matter of such moment as this, to overlook the divine oracle, and be determined by their own counsels only, and to march against one of their own tribes, with a full purpose of destroying them utterly, before they knew any thing whether God had decreed their destruction or no, was not only an instance of their rashness and presumption, but an act likewise of rebellion against the majesty of God, who was the king of Israel, and upon that account alone, had right to declare whether they were to wage war against their brethren the Benjamites or no.

But supposing that the grounds of the war were justifiable, and God consenting to it, yet why might not he take the opportunity of punishing the Israelites, by means of the Benjamites, for their tame permission of crimes more enormous than what they had now taken into their heads to chastise; ⁴ for suffering spiritual adultery among them, even while they were so hot upon punishing carnal?

The laws which God gave the Israelites against the sin of idolatry, were so very severe, that whoever did but so much as entice another to the commission of it, was to lose all title to pity and compassion, though he was ever so dear a friend, ever so near a relation: ⁵ 'Thine eyes shall not pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him, but thou shalt surely kill him; thy hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hands of all the people.' But now in the case of Micah, and the whole tribe of Dan, who had notoriously fallen into idolatry, the rulers of Israel were so far from putting this law in execution, that they connived at their apostasy: and therefore God took occasion, from this quarrel between the other tribes and that of Benjamin, to make use of the latter as scourges to punish this base connivance of the former; and after he had twice employed them to this purpose, he inverted the fate of the war, and in so doing, made the confederate army of Israel the instruments of that terrible vengeance which he took upon the Benjamites, in the punishment of their execrable lewdness. For this is the wonderful wisdom of God's providence, to employ the passions of men to his purposes, and to make one wicked set of people the instruments of his punishing another, even as he expresses himself in another case, that in some measure is not incongruous to this: ⁶ 'Woe unto the Assyrian, the rod of mine anger, and the staff in their hand, is mine indignation:—against the people of my wrath will I give him charge to take the spoil, and to take the prey, and to tread them down like mire in the streets. Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither doth his heart think so; but it is in his heart to destroy, and to cut off nations not a few. Wherefore it shall come to pass, that when the Lord hath performed his whole work upon Mount Sion, and on Jerusalem, I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria, and the glory of his high looks;' and in like manner here, when by the hand of the Benjamites, he had chastised the rest of the Israelites, by the hand of the Israelites he punished the Benjamites for their gross impieties, making use of their respective passions, and furious resentments, to accomplish his will: albeit 'they meant it not so, neither did their hearts think so; but it was only in their hearts to cut off one another.'

When the heat of their fury, however, was abated, and the Israelites began to look back with a little coolness upon what they had done; how they had almost totally destroyed one tribe of their brethren, and bound themselves by an oath never to marry their daughters to any of the poor remains of it, which could not but prove the extirpation of the whole, the joy and triumph of their late victory was turned into mourning and bitter lamentation.

Whether this oath against contracting any affinity with the Benjamites, was in itself lawful and obligatory, or no, ⁷ some interpreters, without any manner of reason, as I think, have disputed. For, whatever was attended with such pernicious consequences, as to oblige their brethren either to live unmarried, which would prove the extinction of their tribe, or to marry the daughters of the heathens, which was contrary to their divine law, or to take to themselves wives wherever they could find them by force and violence, which was contrary to the universal law of nations: whatever, I say, was attended with such evil consequences as these, could not be lawful in itself, nor of any obligation to the consciences of those that made it; and therefore it is somewhat wonderful, how the Israelites, when they found themselves involved in such difficulties, as ⁸ they themselves testify, that for the preservation of this their oath, they were forced to have recourse to acts of the utmost cruelty and violence, did not perceive the illegality of it, and themselves, consequently, absolved from its observation.

It is not the intent of the sacred historian to relate matters otherwise than they happened; nor is it any part of our business to apologize for actions that in themselves are abominable, and will admit of no excuse. The massacre of the people of Jabesh-gilead, without ever sending to know the reason of their absenting themselves from the war, was a cruel expedient to extricate the Israelites from a difficulty in which their superstitious observance of an unlawful oath had involved them; and a sad instance it is of the iniquity and barbarity of these times: for how severe soever the laws of military discipline may be, or with¹ what justice soever recusants, as well as deserters in war may be deemed guilty, and the Jabeshites be called public enemies, because they did not obey the order of the whole congregation, and by refusing to join with them against the Benjamites, made themselves partakers of their crimes: yet certainly to slay the innocent with the guilty, and to put women and children to death, who were never made to bear arms, was the very height of injustice and barbarity. If it be said, that the cherem, or the sentence of utter execration was passed upon them, I do not see with what justice the virgins could be spared, as we find they were by a public decree, unless we suppose that God, from the tabernacle at Shiloh, before which the Israelites were now assembled, signified his intentions of dispensing with the full execution of the sentence, by reason of the public necessity.

And, indeed, the public necessity is the only good reason that can be given for that other act of violence, the rape of the virgins at Shiloh. For whatever may be said in vindication of the Benjamites, namely, that what they put in execution was by order and advice of their superiors, and that their intent in doing it was just and honest, and devoid of that brutal lust which is incident to common ravishers; whatever may be said in excuse of these, the elders of Israel, who gave them this counsel and authority, had certainly no right to dispose of other people's children without their parents' consent and approbation.

^a The rape of the Sabine virgins is usually produced as a piece of history parallel to this;² but Romulus, in whose reign it happened, was one of those princes who accounted every point that contributed to the establish-

^a This piece of history we find thus related: "Romulus, perceiving that his new city was surrounded by several very powerful and warlike nations, who bore them no very good will, formed a design to make them his friends, by contracting marriages with them: but considering with himself, that these neighbouring nations would hardly enter into that affinity with a people, as yet famous neither for their riches nor great exploits, without being in some measure compelled into it, he was resolved to put in practice the stratagem of his uncle Numitor, and to enter into this alliance with them by carrying off their daughters. This design he communicated to the senate, and having obtained their approbation of it, he proclaimed a public feast to be celebrated in honour of Neptune, and invited all the neighbouring cities to the many diversions and spectacles which he then intended to exhibit. Crowds of people, with their wives and children, flocked to the feast; but on the last day, when it began to draw to a conclusion, Romulus ordered all the young men, that upon a signal given, they should seize and carry off every one a virgin, keep them all night, without offering any rudeness to them, and bring them the next morning before him. The young men took care to execute his orders: for dispersing themselves into small companies, as soon as they saw the sign, they seized on the damsels, who, upon this occasion, made a hideous outcry, as expecting much worse usage than they met with. The next day, when they were brought before Romulus, he spoke very courteously to them, and told them, That it was to do them no dishonour, but merely to procure them husbands, that he ordered that rape, which was an ancient custom derived from the Greeks, and the most noble and gallant manner of contracting marriage. He therefore entreated them to be well affected towards those husbands which fortune had given them; and so, distributing the young women, which were 683, among an equal number of unmarried men, he dismissed them."—*Dionys. ment of his dominions, not only lawful, but glorious, and that every thing ceased to be a crime, when once it became necessary for reasons of state: but the rulers of Israel either had, or should have had, different notions. They were governed by God, 'whose throne is established in righteousness,' and should therefore, one would think, have contrived some other means for re-establishing a diminished tribe than those violent ways of rapes and forced marriages. But the sacred historian has assigned a reason for these unrighteous proceedings, when, in³ four different places in the book of Judges, he tells us, that 'in those days there was no king in Israel:' and⁴ for want of such a supreme authority, every tribe, and every city, nay, which is more, every private man committed many horrid things, which were not publicly allowed. This⁵ was the cause of Micah's idolatry, as we noted before; of the Benjamites' filthiness and abominable lusts; and of all the enormous things done by the main body of the Israelites; their killing all the Benjamites without distinction; their binding themselves by rash and unlawful oaths; their killing all the women of Jabesh-gilead who were not virgins; and here, their permitting, nay, their ordering this rape, for the preservation of a rash and unjustifiable oath: and this should teach us to be very thankful for the authority that is set over us, in order to preserve us from the commission of such like enormities; for which end the custom was, among the ancient Persians, as our learned Usher observes, to let the people loose to do even what they listed, for five days after their king died; that by the disorders which were then committed, they might see the necessity of having a king to govern them, and when one was settled in the throne, the great reason of being obedient to him.

Thus we have endeavoured to clear up most of the passages in the book of Judges, which seem to imply any inconsistency or incredibility, during this period: and if any heathen testimonies may be thought a farther confirmation of their truth, we may say, that the seeming incongruity of Shangar's slaying so many Philistines with an ox-goad is mightily abated, by what is told of Lycurgus, namely, that he overthrew the forces of Bacchus with the self-same weapon; that from Deborah's being a prophetess, a governess, and dwelling upon a mount, the story of the Theban sphinx, as some learned men imagine, was invented by the Greeks; that their Hercules was certainly the Samson of sacred writ, his Omphale and Delilah the same, and that his pillars at Calais were of near affinity with those of Gaza;⁶ that his fatal locks gave rise to the fable of Nisus king of Megara, upon whose hair the fortune of his kingdom depended; that his foxes were commemorated at Rome, every return of their harvest, ^b by a similar ceremony of tying them tail to tail, and so letting them go; and to name no more that Jephthah's sacrificing his daughter to God, is partly adumbrated by Agamemnon's offering his Iphigenia to Diana, and partly by Idomeneus's promising to make a victim to Neptune of the first thing he should meet on shore, if he escaped the present storm, which happened to be his own son. So happily do many fictions of the poets concur to confirm the truth and authority of holy writ.

CHAP. III.—Jephthah's rash vow.

THIS vow of Jephthah's, which has employed the thoughts and pens of so many learned men, is conceived in these words:—'And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, if thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hands, then it shall be, that whosoever cometh forth out of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering.' And the result of this vow was, that 'Jephthah passed over unto the children of Ammon to fight against them, and the Lord delivered them into his hands;' whereupon 'he came to Mizpeh unto his house, and behold his daughter came out to meet him, with timbrels, and with dances, and she was his only child: beside her he had neither son nor daughter. And it came to pass, when he saw her, that he rent his clothes, and said, alas! my daughter, thou hast brought me very low, and thou art one of them that trouble me; for I milkwhite steed decorated with variegated trappings, scarcely was the Niseian virgin mistress of her reason. Happy, she said, is the javelin which he holds, and happy is the bridle pressed by his lovely hand.'—Met. b. 8. The result of this passion was, that this perfidious daughter stole into the chamber, while her father was fast asleep, cut off the lock whereon the fate of his kingdom depended, and carried it to Minos, as an undoubted pledge of her love. But if this fable and Samson's history have a near resemblance in some of their first circumstances, they are very different in the conclusion: for Minos rejected the present with scorn, and slighted the woman because of her perfidy; whereas the princes of the Philistines took the advantage against Samson, which Delilah's treachery gave them.—Saurin, vol. 4. Dissert. 17.

^b There was anciently a feast in Rome, called Fulpinalia, or the feast of the foxes, which Ovid makes mention of, for, inquiring into the custom of tying lighted torches to their tails, that is to say "the cause why foxes when let loose bore burning torches bound to their tails," he resolves the matter, by telling us, that a certain youth, having caught a fox which had destroyed much poultry, was going to burn it. His words are these: "He first wrapped the captive all round with straw and hay, and then set fire to it, when all in a flame the animal escaped from his hand, and wherever it fled, the produce of the fields were set in a blaze, the wind giving strength to the destructive element. The story of the deed has perished, but its monument remains; for the Carseolane law declares that every fox that is caught must be put to death. To avenge for the deed, this race of animals is burned with straw, and have to perish in the same manner that their progenitor destroyed the cornfields."—Fast. b. 4.

But Bochart has confuted this notion of Ovid's concerning the origin of this custom, and endeavours to refer it to this piece of history in Samson's life.—Saurin, vol. 4. Dissert. 17.

have opened my mouth to the Lord, and I cannot go back. And she said unto him, My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to that which proceeded out of thy mouth, forasmuch as the Lord has taken vengeance for thee of thine enemies, even of the children of Ammon: only let me alone two months, that I may go up and down upon the mountains, and bewail my virginity, I, and my fellows. And he said, go; and he sent her away for two months, and she went with her companions, and bewailed her virginity upon the mountains. And it came to pass, at the end of two months, that she returned to her father, who did with her according to his vow, which he had vowed, and she knew no man. And it was a custom in Israel, that the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah, four days in a year.' I set the whole passage before the reader, that he may the better judge of the depending controversy there is among commentators, whether this daughter of Jephthah's was really sacrificed or no: and for his farther satisfaction in this point, I will fairly state the arguments on both sides; consider a little on which side they preponderate; and then inquire, in case he did sacrifice his daughter, or as others will have it, devote her only to God's service in a single life, whether the thing was lawful for him to do, and what might possibly be the motive of his doing it.

Those ¹ who maintain the negative, or more merciful side of the question, argue in this manner:—That Jephthah was certainly a very good man, because we find him ranked among the worthies of old, that are commemorated with honour by the author of the Hebrews: 'That he was an Israelite, and as such lived under the law, which prohibited human sacrifices by the severest penalties: that had the vow been intended in this sense, God would never have vouchsafed Jephthah so signal a victory as he did, which must have terminated in the violation of his own laws: and therefore they conclude, that so kind and tender a father as Jephthah is represented, would never have sacrificed an innocent, dutiful, and obedient child, as her whole carriage seems to denote her, in discharge of a rash and inconsiderate vow; especially when, according to the prescription of the law, he might have redeemed his daughter at a price so inconsiderable, ² 'as ten shekels of silver.'

It must be something else, therefore, say they, that Jephthah did unto his daughter, and that, according to the import of the text, was to devote her to a state of celibacy, or that she might live in the manner of a religious nun all the days of her life: for the particle vau, which we render and, 'it shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up,' is a disjunctive in this place, as it is elsewhere, and signifies or; so that the true version of the passage should be, 'whatever cometh forth to meet me shall surely be the Lord's, or I will offer it up for a burnt-offering,' that is, if it be a human creature, I will dedicate it to the service of God; if a beast of any kind, proper for sacrifice, I will instantly offer it up: for that in this sense the vow is to be understood, is evident from her going into the mountains to bewail her virginity, which, had she been doomed to be sacrificed, had not been near so proper, as to bewail her untimely end. Nor can we think that Jephthah would have ever suffered her to have made a circuit of two months among her companions, for fear of her making her escape, or procuring some of her friends and acquaintance either to rescue her, or intercede for her, had she been destined to suffer death upon her return.

On the contrary, when she returned to her father, and he had done to her according to his vow, it immediately follows, that she knew not man; which shows that the purpose of his vow was answered by obliging her to a state of perpetual virginity, in some retired place, where she was secluded from all society, except that the daughters of Israel, those especially of her acquaintance, went up, either to talk and converse with her, or to celebrate her praise, or to comfort her concerning her solitary condition, for to all these senses may the word letannoth be applied, four days in the year, that is, one day every quarter.

Upon the whole, therefore, they infer, that Jephthah's daughter did not fall a sacrifice, but was consecrated to God and his service, that is, devoted to a single life, and to remain a recluse all her days; which could not but occasion Jephthah no small grief and trouble, because by this means, his family became extinct, and himself destitute of issue to inherit his estate, and perpetuate his name.

These are some of the most plausible arguments that are generally employed to prove, not the sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter, but only her obligation to a perpetual virginity in the worship and service of God.

Those¹ that maintain the affirmative, or harsher side of the question, namely, that Jephthah, in pursuance of his vow, did actually sacrifice his daughter, form their arguments in this manner. ² That the times wherein Jephthah lived, were so sadly addicted to idolatry, that ³ 'to burn their sons and daughters in the fire to their gods,' was a common practice among the Israelites, as well as other nations; and that the manner⁴ in which he lived, before he was called to the assistance of his country, which was chiefly by plunder and rapine, and bloodshed, might make him not incapable of vowing to sacrifice the first of his domestics that should meet him upon his victorious return. That this vow is delivered in general and indefinite terms, namely, 'that whosoever should come forth out of the doors of his house to meet him, that should surely be the Lord's, and it should be the Lord's, by being offered up for a burnt-offering:' that though the particle vau be sometimes used in a disjunctive sense, yet it can only be so, where things are really distinct and different from each other, but cannot be admitted, where the one manifestly includes the other, as it is in the passage before us; that therefore it is much more congruous to all the rules of good sense to understand the words of Jephthah so, as that, by promising whatsoever he met should be the Lord's, he obliged himself in general to consecrate it to God, and that, by promising farther, that he would offer it up for a burnt-offering, he specified the manner in which he intended to make his consecration.

Vows of perpetual virginity, say they, are institutions of a modern date: the word of God knows nothing of them; nor has this pretended celibacy of Jephthah's daughter any manner of foundation in Scripture; and therefore, when this circumstance is inserted, that 'she knew no man, it is not to signify, that she lived a perpetual virgin, but only, that she was so unhappy as to leave the world in her youth, and before she had the knowledge of a man.

Had Jephthah meant no more, say they, by performing his vow, than consecrating his daughter, a perpetual virgin, to the service of God, what cause was there for renting his clothes, and bemoaning himself, as we find he did? Had Jephthah made only a vow of celibacy for his daughter, whereby she was bound to nothing more painful, than to lead a single life, what reason was there for bewailing this as a grievous calamity, which some men account a thing so eminently glorious and honourable? Is the being shut up as a recluse, and entered into the list of perpetual virgins, a matter of such bitter complaint and lamentation? Was this so sore an evil, an affliction so extraordinary, that not only before she underwent it, she and her companions should, for two months together, be allowed to bewail it; but that, after she had undergone it, the daughters of Israel should be required to lament it four times a year? ⁵ If she was actually put to death, in execution of her father's vow, it is easy then to understand, why the particular circumstance of her dying without issue, when she was the only daughter of her father, and had no other prospect of posterity to keep up his family, should be represented as a sore aggravation of her violent and untimely death: but it seems very difficult to account for that bitter lamentation, made by her father, by herself, by her companions, and by all the daughters of Israel in succeeding times, if she suffered no other, no severer punishment, than that of being devoted to a single life.

These are some of the most prevailing arguments on the affirmative side; and for the confirmation of them, it is farther alleged, that both Josephus and the Chaldee Paraphrast testify the same thing; that the ancient doctors, both of the Jewish and Christian church, were of the same opinion; and that, as to the substance of the fact, the compilers of the homilies of our church, do perfectly agree with these ancient writers: so that how desirous soever we may be to clear Jephthah from the imputation of so cruel, so impious, so unnatural an act, as that of murdering his own daughter; yet if we will adhere to the more easy and obvious construction of the words, and as they appear to us at first view; or if we retain any just esteem and veneration for the sense of antiquity, we must necessarily conclude, that when it is said of him, that 'he did with his daughter according to the vow which he had vowed,' the meaning can be no less, than that he did really put her to death: but whether he acted well or ill in so doing, is another inquiry we are now to pursue.

The law of Cherem, as the Hebrews call it, which is a law of a peculiar nature, is delivered in these words: ⁶ 'No devoted thing, which a man shall devote to the Lord, of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed; every devoted thing is most holy to the Lord. None devoted, which shall be devoted by men, shall be redeemed, but shall surely be put to death.¹ Of this sort, a very learned² commentator supposes this vow of Jephthah's to have been, and that therefore he could not redeem his daughter, but was necessitated to put her to death. It is to be observed, however, that³ Cherem (which is the term here made use of) signifies either persons devoted to slaughter for their execrable impieties, as were the Amalekites and other nations, whom God commanded the Israelites to extirpate, or things destined to destruction, as were Jericho and Ai, for the wickedness of those to whom they appertained; so that the law of Cherem related only to such persons or things, as by an irrevocable vow, were destined to utter destruction for their horrid crimes, and because indeed there was particular command from God, both for the making or putting such a vow in execution; but it can by no means be pretended, either that Jephthah's daughter merited such a punishment, or that her father had any order or commission from God to inflict it. On the contrary, all human sacrifices are expressly forbidden, as odious and detestable to God: ⁴ 'Thou shalt not do so to the Lord thy God; thou shalt not burn thy sons, and thy daughters in the fire,' as the heathens used to do to their gods; 'for every abomination to the Lord, which he hateth, have they done.'

There is one law, indeed, which seems to be of some moment in the case before us, and that is this:—⁴ 'If a man vow a vow unto the Lord, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond, he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth.' But then all sober casuists are agreed, that a vow has only a constructive, not a destructive force, that is, that it can only lay a new obligation, where there is none, or where there is one, strengthen it; but that it cannot cancel a former obligation, or superinduce one that is repugnant to it. Now all our obligations to obedience proceed from God. ⁵ He hath an uncontrollable right to give laws to his creatures: but if men, by entering into vows, could free themselves from the obligation of his laws, they might then, whenever they pleased, by their own act, defeat his authority. Whatever, therefore, is in itself forbidden by God, and for that reason unlawful; whatever is against any precept of natural or revealed religion; whatever is inconsistent with those relative duties which men owe to one another; whatever, in short, is in any respect sinful, cannot, by being made the matter of a vow, become justifiable. So that he who hath vowed to do what cannot be done without sin, is so far from being obliged to perform his vow, that he is, notwithstanding his vow, obliged not to perform it; because there is not only great obliquity in making such an unlawful vow, but this obliquity is so far from being lessened, that it is aggravated by keeping it.

to his love and favour; since the natural affection of a father towards his child ought to be stifled, before he could give way to the execution of the sentence of death upon her; since the sacrificing of children to their gods was a crime, for which the heathen nations were justly detested, and punished by God; since Jephthah's offering his daughter as a victim to the Lord, might reflect a dishonour upon the true God, as if he also delighted in such sacrifices; since these, I say, and several other things, might be urged in aggravation of this action, we may safely and confidently aver,⁷ with the Jewish historian, "that the sacrifice which Jephthah offered was neither lawful nor acceptable to God,"⁸ but on the contrary a very impious act, and an abominable crime, though it might possibly proceed from a mistaken principle of religion.

The religious observation of oaths and vows has, at all times, been esteemed a duty incumbent on those that made them; insomuch, that even when they have been procured by guile, they have not been thought destitute of their obligation. The Gibeonites certainly imposed upon the children of Israel, when they obtained from them a league of amity and friendship; and yet we may observe what notions the Israelites had of this kind of obligation, when, in their public consultations, they say, ⁸ 'We have sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel; now therefore we may not touch them.' This was a remarkable instance before Jephthah's days, and it is not improbable, that he might have it in his remembrance, and imprudently make use of it, as a precedent of the irreversibility of oaths, and of the inviolable tie he was under by reason of his vow: but in succeeding times, there is a passage in Scripture, which comes nearer to the case now before us. Saul, in the day of battle, perceiving his enemies to give ground, out of the abundance of his zeal, made a vow to God, that whoever would taste any food before the pursuit was over, should certainly die; and upon this occasion his own son Jonathan had like to have been made a sacrifice, merely because his father would have been thought religious and austere to the observation of his oath; notwithstanding he was plainly excused from the obligation of it as to his son, who was both in another place, and ignorant of his father's will, and under necessity of taking some small refreshment when he was so faint and hungry. What wonder then if Jephthah, who, we have reason to believe, was a person much more religiously inclined than Saul, should think himself under an obligation to observe his vow, even though it was to the destruction of his own and only daughter.

What the acceptableness of Abraham's offering his son Isaac was, he had read in the book of Moses; and this might possibly lessen the horror of the fact he was going to commit. For though Abraham had the positive command of God for what he did, which Jephthah could not pretend to, so that there was a great disparity between their two cases; yet it was plain, from the acceptableness of Abraham's offering, and the great reward bestowed on him for his intended oblation, that the sacrificing a beloved child was not, in all cases, and under all circumstances sinful, but might be so circumstantiated as to be an act of piety, and approved in the sight of God: and when this example proved such an action, as to the matter and substance of it, not only lawful but commendable, Jephthah might from hence be led into an opinion that the difference between his case and that of Abraham was not so great, as that what was laudable and almost meritorious in the one, should be imputed as an unpardonable crime to the other.

He had read likewise in the law, that ¹ 'when thou shalt vow a vow unto the Lord, thou shalt not be slack to pay it;' and was sensible that a wilful neglect of this was a heinous crime, ² a mocking of God, a dissembling with Heaven, and an act of injustice and unfaithfulness towards him, who is a severe exactor of vows, and is wont to avenge the breach of them by the infliction of the sorest punishments; and upon these premises he might possibly argue with himself in this manner: "Though I know that the performance of my vow will be accompanied with murder, yet I consider likewise that my not performing it will be attended with downright perjury. Seeing then there is a necessity of sinning one way or other, I am resolved to choose the former; for though that be an injury to my daughter, yet the other is an affront to God. My child is dear to me indeed, but my God, my Father, is much more so. It is better therefore to be cruel than impious; to be guilty of bloodshed, than to be perjured and false to the Lord of heaven and earth. 'I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back.' I must not reverse, I dare not revoke the sacred promise which I have made to the Almighty; but my firm and unshaken purpose is to perform it." Thus the mistaken sense of the indissoluble obligation which his vow had laid upon him, blinded his eyes, and ran him upon this fatal rock.

He could not but know, had he considered at all, that no vow is obligatory, where the matter of it is unlawful; or that, what is unlawful in itself, cannot possibly be made otherwise by the interposition of a vow. Nay, he could not but know, that to act unlawfully, in virtue of a vow, was a double sin, since not only the vow itself was sinful, but the act consequent thereupon was sinful likewise; and yet so blind sometimes is the zeal of an erroneous conscience, that it will not suffer men to perceive, at least to be governed by the most rational and self-evident principles.

Upon the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that how great soever this sin of Jephthah's was, yet, properly speaking it was the sin of ignorance, and the effect of a misguided conscience. By the bitter complaint, which he uttered upon the first sight of his daughter coming out to meet him, it is evident that he was under great trouble and perplexity; and as she had done nothing to alienate his affections from her, but in this very act of meeting him, had done something to engage his affections more strongly towards her, the bowels of a father must necessarily yearn to save the life of a loving and a beloved child. The generous offer which she made him, that he might do to her what he pleased, according to his vow, though it made the doing of it less unjust, could not but add a fresh sting to his grief, and, if he had any generosity in his breast, make him do it with more reluctance. No one who is a parent; no one who has felt the workings of nature towards his own issue; no one who hath suffered, or who hath feared the loss of an only child, but must be sensible of what pangs of sorrow, what meltings of compassion, what agonies of grief, must pierce the soul of Jephthah, when he imagined himself under the sad necessity of sacrificing his own, his only, his virgin daughter, whom he could not offer up for a burnt-offering, without sacrificing: at the same time, all the propensions of nature, all the ease and pleasure of his life, all the prospect of keeping up his family. Nothing less than a mistaken opinion of the indispensable obligation of his vow could prevail with him thus to overrule the strong motives of interest and inclination; and a mistake which took its rise from so good a principle must, without question, at least extenuate the guilt, in the judgment both of good-natured men, and of an all-merciful God.

We cannot, however, part with this remarkable piece of history, without making one inference, namely, that we should be strictly careful how we engage ourselves in any rash and indeliberate vows; because, as a vow is confessedly an act of religion, when once 'we have opened our mouths unto the Lord,' we cannot, without manifest prevarication and contempt of God's authority, 'go back.' And therefore, to conclude in the words of a great ³ divine already quoted upon this subject, "as in civil life, men of the best character for integrity, and such as are most punctual in keeping their words, are observed to be very sparing in making promises; so in religion, the best way we can take to observe the precept given us by Solomon, ⁴ 'that when we vow a vow unto God, we should not defer to pay it,' will be, in the first place, to observe another precept, which he lays down before this, namely, that ⁵ 'we should not be rash with our mouths, nor let our hearts be hasty to utter any thing before God.' "

CHAP. IV.—On Jephthah's Vow.

SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.

In the course of the previous section, our author states, that Josephus and the Jewish writers in general, as well as the principal writers of the early ages of the church, were of opinion that Jephthah, in consequence of his vow, offered his daughter as a burnt-offering to the Lord, and he seems himself decidedly to incline to the same view. This opinion has been adopted by very respectable modern commentators. But from this view of the matter I dissent, as I conceive that Jephthah only devoted his daughter in a peculiar manner to the service of the Lord. I am confirmed in the accuracy of this opinion, by all that is recorded of the piety of this judge, as well as by the language in which his vow is couched. He is uniformly represented in Scripture, as a man who feared God. He is mentioned by the apostle Paul as one of the eminent men who obtained a good report through faith: and it is declared, that at this very time,—the time in which he uttered his vow,—that he was under the influence of the Spirit of God. I maintain, that all this is irreconcilable with the supposition, that Jephthah deliberately vowed to commit murder; for he must have knowingly done so, if we may imagine that he bound himself by an oath to kill the first man, woman, or child, that should meet him on his return. He, who in his expostulation with the king of Ammon, showed that he was well acquainted with the history of Israel, could not be ignorant of the law which said, 'Thou shalt not kill,' and which expressly forbade to imitate the heathen in offering human sacrifices. He who was aware that the law prescribed that, if a man even unintentionally should kill his slave, should be punished, could not imagine that the law permitted him intentionally and deliberately to kill his own daughter.

There is no similarity between the case of Jephthah and that of Abraham offering up his son Isaac. Abraham acted in obedience to the divine command; but there is no intimation that the Spirit of God, under whose influence he was, gave any such order to him. Nor even if such a sacrifice had been required for the trial of his faith, can we conceive that he would be allowed to carry it into effect.

But the idea of Jephthah's sacrificing his daughter, is not more irreconcilable with what we know of his piety than it is with the provisions which the law itself made in such a case. It permitted a valuation to be made of any thing devoted, and the ransom money to be offered in its stead. The valuation, in the case of a human being, varied according to the age and sex of the person; but, if it were a beast, the offerer was required to give as the price of its redemption, a fifth more than its estimated value. No ransom could be given for cities or possessions which God had declared accursed, and had devoted to destruction; such were the Amalekites and Canaanites, to spare whom was to sin against God. We are entitled to presume, that Jephthah, who was so well acquainted with the history of his people, was also acquainted with the law concerning vows and things devoted; and that in making his vow, therefore, he had in his view those exceptions in things offered, which the law made, and those exchanges which it admitted. Even if he had been ignorant of this, can we suppose, that the priests were so ill instructed, and so forgetful as to overlook it? Especially as the execution of the vow was deferred for two months, and great lamentation made on account of it? It is true, idolatry with its attendants, ignorance and superstition, prevailed over the land; but at no period did it prevail to the utter extinction of the worship of God, and neglect of his law. Besides, Jephthah, and the people of Israel, had united in a reformation of religion; and in doing so had obtained signal marks of the peculiar favour and presence of God. Would the people allow the instrument of their deliverance, on his return from victory, to sacrifice his own daughter? Would they not have interposed for her safety, as they did at a subsequent period of their history, on behalf of Jonathan when his father Saul had doomed him to destruction?

There is nothing in the language in which the vow of Jephthah is couched, which requires us to suppose that he devoted his daughter to death. The conjunction vau rendered and in our version, might be rendered or: and it is often thus translated in other passages, 'Whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, shall surely be the Lord's, or, I will offer it for a burnt-offering:' 'Whatever it may happen to be, it shall be consecrated to God: or, should it be fit to be offered in sacrifice to the Lord, it shall be presented as a burnt-offering.' To satisfy us that this is a correct translation, it may be remarked that the conjunction vau must be rendered disjunctively in Lev. xxvii. 28, where the law regarding things devoted is recorded. 'Notwithstanding no devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the Lord of all that he hath, either of man or of beast, or of the field of his possessions shall be sold or redeemed.'

These considerations, when viewed in connexion with those which I am about to mention, prove conclusively that Jephthah neither did sacrifice his daughter, nor was under any obligation from his vow to do so. The sacrifice of children was an abomination to the Lord: he repeatedly expressed his abhorrence of the practice; and it was prohibited by law under pain of death.¹ No father could, by his own authority, put an offending, much less an innocent child to death upon any account, without the sanction of the magistrates, and the consent of the people, as in the case of Jonathan.² The Mishna says, that "if a Jew should devote his son or daughter, his man or maid servant, the devotement would be void, because no man can devote what is not his own."

In what way, then, did Jephthah fulfil his vow? The consideration of this question will lead us to the same conclusion as that to which we have already come. After Jephthah had subdued the children of Ammon, we read that he 'came to Mispah unto his house, and behold his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and with dances, and she was his only child; beside her, he had neither son nor daughter. And it came to pass when he saw her, that he rent his clothes, and said, Alas! my daughter! Thou hast brought me very low, and thou art one of them that trouble me: for I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back. And she said unto him, My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth. And she said unto her father, let this thing be done for me, let me alone two months, that I may go up and down upon the mountains, and bewail my virginity, I and my fellows. And he said go:—And it came to pass at the end of two months, that she returned unto her father, who did with her according to his vow which he had vowed. And it was a custom in Israel, that the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite four days in a year.'

The first thing in this narrative which claims our attention, is the notice which Jephthah's daughter takes of the effect of this vow on herself. If we understand the vow as subjecting her to a life of celibacy, and of seclusion from the world, and consecration to the service of God, her language on the occasion is natural, and what might have been expected from her: but had she been doomed to death, to this she would doubtless have alluded, and have made it the ground of her lamentation. If it be supposed that her piety would have made her silent as to death, the same piety would have led her silently to acquiesce in the other calamity; and like Isaac, be willing to forego every prospect in regard to the promised land. If it be alleged, that on the supposition of her only being doomed to a life of celibacy and seclusion from the world, it was not necessary for her to ask two months to bewail her fate, since she might have years to mourn over it:—we may reply, and the reply is sufficient, that in the apprehension of the Israelites, who looked for the promised Messiah, it was a heavy affliction to die childless, that the affliction was greatly increased in the present instance, by the circumstance that she was Jephthah's only daughter, and that in her all the honours of her house would become extinct. Her fate was a kind of death by anticipation, and it was meet, therefore, that there should have been a marked and public mourning on account of it.

The language in which her father is said to have fulfilled his vow, next deserves our notice. 'Her father did with her according to his vow which he had vowed.' Here there is no mention of her death or of her having been offered in sacrifice to the Lord. While the allusions to her life of celibacy and seclusion from the world are frequent, there is not a single hint concerning her death,—a circumstance for which we cannot account, but on the supposition that that event was not contemplated, and that it did not really happen. If she had been dead, it would not have been necessary for the daughters of Israel to assemble in any particular place, since they might as well conduct their lamentations on her account, on the supposition of her death, in their respective dwelling places.

On these grounds, then, I am decidedly of opinion that Jephthah's daughter was not offered in sacrifice; but that she was devoted to a life of celibacy and seclusion from the world.

To this view of the matter, it is objected; first, that we have no intimation in Scripture of vows of perpetual celibacy, and that they appear to be a modern invention. But is there not quite as little said in Scripture of devoting to death a human being in honour of God? Nay, is not the testimony of Scripture against any such practice? If the silence of Scripture be deemed a valid objection in one case, its express prohibition is surely to be reckoned an insuperable objection in the other.

Secondly, it is further objected, that parents had no right to devote a child to a life of entire seclusion from the world. This may be true; and I would only say by way of reply, that far less had parents a right to devote a child to death. The devotement of Jephthah's daughter to the service of the tabernacle, took place with her own consent.

Thirdly, the most specious objection to the view of the matter which we have taken, is, that she might have been thus devoted to the service of God, and at the same time enter into the married state. Thus, Samson, Samuel, and others, who were devoted to God from the womb, were married. But in answer to this objection, it may be answered, that in ancient times, the condition of females was different from that of males; that while the latter were allowed to act for themselves, the former were in some measure restrained by the will of others; and that, therefore, it was necessary, that the daughter of Jephthah, who had been consecrated by a vow to the Lord, should be under no control in giving herself up to the service to which she had been thus devoted.¹

To these arguments, I am not aware of any reply that can be made, except that which is urged by Warburton—that Jephthah was a semi-pagan, who knew little of the law, and had long been accustomed to disregard it. This, however, as Bishop Gleig observes, is said without the shadow of proof; and is indeed so directly contrary to all that we know of Jephthah's character and conduct, that the ingenious prelate is forced to confess, that after he was appointed judge or chief ruler of Israel, Jephthah appears to have acquired a competent knowledge of the law; but this confession completely destroys the argument of this learned critic. For, it was after this period that Jephthah devoted his daughter.

CHAP. I.—From the Birth of Samuel to the Death of Saul.

THE HISTORY.

DURING the time of Samson's great exploits, both the civil and ecclesiastical administration seems to have been in the hands of Eli the high priest, in the beginning of whose government Samuel was born.^a He was the son of Elkanah, a Levite who dwelt in Ramah,^b a city belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, and, as the custom of those times was, had two wives, whose names were

^a According to the arrangement of the period by Dr Hales, given at the commencement of the preceding section, page 396, this statement is incorrect, as it is there stated that Samson's administration of 20 years commenced B. C. 1202, and terminated B. C. 1182, when Eli's administration of 40 years began. That he succeeded Samson is asserted by Josephus, (Antiq. v. 9. 1.) Eli was 58 years of age when he began his administration, (1 Sam. iv. 15—18,) and was the first high priest of the line of Ithamar, the younger son of Aaron. The date of Samuel's birth is not noticed in any part of the book called by his name; but it is ascertained by the research of Josephus, that Samuel at the time of his prophetic call was 12 years old; but his call was 450 years after the first division of the conquered lands, (Acts xiii. 20,) and therefore happened in the thirty-first year of Eli's administration, and consequently his birth in the nineteenth year of it. Samuel died about two years before Saul, and therefore lived about 92 years.—Dr Hales' Analysis, b. 2. pp. 299—302.—Ed.

^b Ramah signifies an eminence, or high situation, and is therefore an appellation given to several places that are built in this manner. This is said to have stood upon Mount Ephraim, thereby to distinguish it from other towns, in different tribes, of the same denomination; and the reason why it is here called Ramathaim, in the dual number, is, as some imagine, because it was built upon two hills, which made it appear a double city; and because it was situated on high, and had a watch-tower built in it, it therefore had the title of Zophim added to it. It stood upon the road that led from Samaria to Jerusalem; and for this reason, as well as its advantageous situation, Basia king of Israel caused it to be fortified, that there might be no passage out of the land of Judah into that of Israel, (1 Kings xv. 17., and 2 Chron. xvi. 1.) but in St Jerome's days it was no more than a small village. Here it was that Samuel passed a great part of his time; for his mother's dedication of him to the service of God did not confine him to Shiloh, after that God had called him out to a public employ, and appointed him his residence in a place more convenient for the execution of it. The truth is, after the captivity of the ark, and the death of Eli, all religious ceremonies seem to have ceased at Shiloh, for which reason it is said, that Samuel built an altar at Ramah, the place of his residence, to the intent that the people might resort to him, either to receive judgment, or to offer sacrifices, which, though it was contrary to the law of Moses, seems to be a case of necessity; because the ark being at one place, and the tabernacle at another, neither of them could properly be resorted to Hannah and Peninnah. ^a Thrice every year he used to go to Shiloh, there to offer up his usual sacrifice, and as he was a pious and religious man, he generally took his two wives with him, that they, in like manner, might make their oblations. Now Hannah, though she had no children, was his favourite wife, and therefore, at ^b every feast upon the peace-offering, he usually sent her a separate mess, and of the choicest of the meat; which the other perceiving, was wont to ^c upbraid her with her sterility, or want of children. Hannah took this so sore to heart that all the kind things which her husband said to her, could not assuage or comfort her; but as soon as she rose from table, away she hastens to the tabernacle, and there pours out her soul before God, desiring of him to bless her with a son, which favour if he would grant her, she promised to make him a Nazarite, and all the days of his life devote him to his service.

Her prayers were heard, and, in a proper time, she conceived, and brought forth a son, whom she called Samuel, even because she had 'asked him of the Lord,' for so his name imports, and after he was grown to a competent age, she brought him to Shiloh, and in a very joyful and thankful manner, presented him to Eli, who gladly received him, and immediately clothed him with a proper habit, even with a linen ^d ephod, that he might attend upon the service of the tabernacle.^e

Eli himself was a very good man, but by much too indulgent to his children. He had two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, who were mere libertines. They domineer-ed over the men, and debauched the women at their devotions; and so far were they from being content with the portions which God had allotted them as priests, that they forced from the people even before they had made their oblations, what part of the sacrifice they pleased; which gave so general a disgust, that religion grew into contempt, and the worship of God came to be disused.

Eli was not unacquainted with his sons' ill conduct; but instead of chastising them as his authority required, he contented himself with reproving them now and then, but that in such gentle and mild terms, as rather encouraged than deterred them from proceeding in their wicked practices; till at length, God, being provoked with this his remissness, ^f sent a prophet to threaten him and his family with utter destruction; to upbraid him with his ingratitude in slighting the sacerdotal honour which he had conferred on him; to foretell the death of his two sons both in one day, ^g the removal of his priesthood into another and better family, and the extreme poverty which his posterity would fall into, upon their ejection from the sacerdotal office. Nor was it long before God discovered the same heavy judgments to Samuel, which was the first revelation he made to this young prophet, and which Eli, when he was told it, received with a mind fully resigned to the divine pleasure: 'It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good.'

In these days ^h there were but few prophets, and revelations were very scarce; and therefore when the Israelites perceived, by the truth of his predictions, that God had appointed Samuel to the prophetic office, they were not a little rejoiced: and it was from the great expectations they had of God's favour in renewing this order of men among them, that they took up arms; in order to rescue themselves from the Philistines' yoke. The army of the Israelites encamped at a place which was afterwards called ⁱ Eben-ezer, and that of the Phil-either for sacrificing, or any other part of public worship.—Patrick's, Le Clerc's, and Calnet's Commentaries; and Universal History.

^a The precept is exactly thus,—'Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the Lord thy God,' (Exod. xxiii. 17.) which were at the feast of the passover, the pentecost, and that of the tabernacles; but women were exempted from this attendance; and therefore it was an extraordinary act of piety for Elkanah to take his two wives with him.

^b The blood of this peace-offering was shed at the foot of the altar, the fat was burnt, the breast and right shoulder was the priest's perquisite, and all the rest belonged to the person who brought the victim. With this he made a feast of charity, to which he called his friends and relations, and in several places of Scripture, God reminds him to invite the Levite, the poor, the fatherless, and the widow.—Calnet's Commentary.

^c Sterility was looked upon among the Jews as one of the greatest misfortunes that could befall any woman; inasmuch that to have a child, though the mother immediately died thereupon, was accounted a less affliction than to have none at all. And to this purpose we may observe, that the midwife comforts Rachel in her labour, even though she knew her to lie at the point of death, in these terms, 'Fear not, for thou shalt have this son also,' Gen. xxxv. 17.—Saurin, in vol. 4. Dissertation 17.

^d The ephod which the high priest wore (as we have described it elsewhere,) was a very rich habit indeed, (Exod. xxviii. 6.) but there were other kinds of ephods, which not only priests and Levites, but even laymen, upon some occasions wore, as we find in the instance of David, (2 Sam. vi. 14.) which was not a sacred, but an honorary garment, as we may call it, and such as the high priest might order Samuel to wear, to distinguish him from some other inferior officers belonging to the tabernacle.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e 1 Sam. ii. 19. The women made wearing apparel, and their common employment was weaving stuffs, as making cloth and tapestry is now. We see in Homer the instances of Penelope, Calypso, and Circe. There are examples of it in Theocritus, Idyl. 15. But what appears most wonderful is, that this custom was retained at Rome among the greatest ladies in a very corrupt age, since Augustus commonly wore clothes made by his wife, sister, and daughter.—Suet. Aug. 73. Prov. xxxi. 13.—19. Fleury's Hist. of the Israelites, p. 72.

^f 1 Sam. iii. 18.

^g Who this prophet was, commentators are at a loss to know. Some imagine, that it was Phinehas the son of Eleazar, but Phinehas very probably was dead long before this time. Others therefore will needs have it to have been Elkanah, Samuel's father; and some Samuel himself: but we nowhere read, that the father was endued with the spirit of prophecy, and the son was certainly then too young, and unacquainted with the voice of God. The safest way therefore is, to own our ignorance of what the sacred historian hath not thought proper to discover to us.—Calnet's Commentary.

^h The high priesthood was originally settled upon Eleazar, the son of Aaron, by a divine decree; but that decree being conditional only, it is reasonable to presume that there was some great offence or other in Eleazar's family, though not recorded in Scripture, which provoked God to remove it into the family of Ithamar, who was Aaron's youngest son, and from whom Eli descended; and here, for the abominable practices of his sons, which he was too negligent to restrain, God threatens to translate the priesthood back again from the family of Ithamar to that of Eleazar, which accordingly happened in the reign of king Solomon, who deposed Abiathar, the last of Eli's line, from the pontificate, and set up Zadok in his stead.—Poole's Annotations.

ⁱ Whatever revelations God might impart to some pious persons privately, there was at this time none publicly acknowledged for a prophet, unto whom the people might resort to know the mind of God: nay, so little acquainted were these ages with the prophetic spirit, that we read of no more than two prophets, (Judg. iv. 4. and vi. 8.) in all the days of the Judges.—Patrick's Commentary.

^j This place is here mentioned prophetically: for it had not this name till about twenty years after, (1 Sam. iv. 1.) wheu istines at Aphek, a city of Judah; but when they came to join battle, the Israelites were defeated with the loss of four thousand men.

The reason of this defeat was imputed by some to their want of the ark in the army, which as the symbol of God's pretence, would be a sure means of success; and therefore they sent to Hophni and Phineas to bring it with them, and when it arrived in the camp, received it with many a joyful acclamation. The Philistines at first, were dispirited at the news, as much as their enemies were animated: but at length, taking heart, and exhorting one another to act courageously, they repulsed the Israelites, when they came to attack them; and having slain thirty thousand of their foot, among whom were Hophni and Phineas, they routed the rest, and put them all to flight, so that the ark of the Lord fell into their hands.

This ill news a soldier of the tribe of Benjamin, escaping from the field of battle, brought to Shiloh that very day, with the usual emblems of extreme sorrow, ^a his clothes rent, and earth upon his head; and then there was no small outcry and lamentation in the city. Eli, inquiring the cause of it, had the soldier brought before him, who gave him an account, ^b that the Israelites were routed, his two sons slain, and the ark taken. Eli heard

Samuel fought with the Philistines, and gave them a total overthrow, and set up a monument of his victory, for the proper name signifies the stone of help, in the field of battle, which lay on the north border of Judah, not far from Mizeph, and Aphek, where the Philistines encamped, must not be far distant from it.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

^a If we consult Josh. vii. 6. Job ii. 12. and Ezek. xxvii. 39. we shall find that this was the manner of men's expressing their deep sorrow for any great calamity that had befallen them. And accordingly we find Virgil representing Latinus rending his clothes, and throwing dust upon his gray hairs, when he laments his private and public calamities: 'with his garment rent, Latinus, defiling his hoary head with dust, proceeds.'—Æneid. 12.

^b Who this Benjamite was that brought the ill news to Shiloh of the loss of the battle, the history is silent, and the conjecture of some Jews, that it probably was Saul, is very uncertain and precarious; but there is something very remarkable in the account which he gives of the action. The words are these: 'And Eli said to the Benjamite, What is there done in the battle, my son? And the messenger answered and said, Israel is fled before the Philistines, and there hath been also a great slaughter among the people, and thy two sons Hophni and Phineas, are dead, and the ark of God is taken.' (1 Sam. iv. 10, 27.) Madam Dacier highly commends the manner wherein the sacred historian makes his messenger speak, and compares these words, 'Hophni and Phineas are dead, and the ark of the Lord is taken,' with those of Antilochus to Achilles, when he tells him the sad news.—'Patroclus is stretched a corpse; the Greeks fight around him lying naked, and Hector with the dazzling helmet, is in possession of his armour.' (Il. 18.) Whereupon she quotes the glossary which Eustathius has upon this passage in Homer. "This speech of Antilochus," says that excellent critic, "affords us a pattern, with what brevity such melancholy news should be related; for, in two verses, it comprises every thing that happened, the death of Patroclus, the person who slew him, the encounter about his body, and his arms in the possession of his enemy. The Greek tragic poets have not been so wise as to imitate this; and, of all others Euripides, who, upon the most doleful occasion, is so apt to make long recitals, is most egregiously defective herein. Homer is the only author that deserves to be followed. Nothing is more ridiculous, than to hear a messenger, when he is to report some very bad news, running into tedious circumstances, and pathetic expressions. All he talks is not minded; for he to whom he addresses himself, cannot attend to what he says; the first word that acquaints him with the misfortune, makes him deaf to every thing else."—Saurin, vol. 4. Dissertation 23.

the defeat of the army, and the death of his sons with courage and unconcern enough: but when he came to understand, that the ark of the Lord was fallen into the enemy's hand, his spirits forsook him, and being both heavy and aged, he fell from his seat, and broke his neck and died, after he had been the supreme magistrate in Israel ^c for the space of forty years: and, what was a farther family misfortune, his son Phineas had a wife, then big with child, and near her time, who hearing of her father's and husband's death, and, what was the worst of all, of the captivity of the ark, fell in labour at the news, and being delivered of a son, had just strength to name him Ichabod, that is, no glory, before she died; because the ark which was the glory of Israel, as she assigns the reason, 'was departed from them.'

The Philistines having thus got possession of the ark, ^d carried it in triumph to one of their principal cities, named Ashdod, and there placed it in the temple of their god Dagon hard by his image. The next morning the people of ^e Ashdod, going into the temple, found Dagon

^c The Septuagint, and some ancient manuscripts, make the term of Eli's magistracy to be no more than twenty years; and to reconcile this with the Hebrew text, some suppose, either that he had Samson joined in the government with him for the first twenty years of his administration, or his sons, for the last; but there is no reason for the solution of a difficulty which arises from nothing else but a fault in the text of the Septuagint.—Calmel's Commentary. [See note on this subject at the beginning of this section.]—Ed.

^d It was a custom among the heathens, to carry in triumph the images of the gods of such nations as they had vanquished. Isaiah prophesies of Cyrus, that in this manner he would treat the gods of Babylon; 'Bel boweth, Nebo stoopeth; their idols were upon the beasts, and upon the cattle, and themselves are gone into captivity,' (Isa. xlv. 1, 2.) Daniel foretells of Ptolemy Euergetes, that he would 'carry captive into Egypt the gods of the Syrians, with their princes,' (Dan. xi. 8.) And the like predictions are to be met with in Jeremiah xlviii. 7. and in Amos i. 15. We need less wonder, therefore, that we find Plutarch, in the life of Marcellus, telling us, that he took away out of the temple of Syracuse, the most beautiful pictures and statues of their gods; and that afterwards it became a reproach to Marcellus, and raised the indignation of other nations against Rome, 'That he carried along with him, not men only, but the very gods captive, and in triumph.'—Saurin, vol. 4. Dissertation 24.

^e The Philistines were descendants from Mizraim the father of the Egyptians, and so, in all probability, having their first settlement in Egypt, or the parts adjoining, lay to the south-west of the land of Canaan. In process of time, however, they made inroads upon Canaan, and, in Abraham's days, had got possession of a good part of the territories which lay along the western coasts of the Mediterranean sea. This tract of ground was divided into five principalities, or little kingdoms, namely, Gaza, Askelon, Ashdod, Gath, and Akron; which for the better understanding of some particulars related of the ark, during its stay in this country, it will not be improper to describe all together. The city of Gaza, from which the territory took its name, stood, as it were, on the very south-west angle, or corner of the land of Canaan; but of this place we have spoken before. To the north of Gaza lay next the city of Askelon, called by the Greeks Ascalon, and of great note among the Gentiles for a temple dedicated to Directo, the mother of Simiramis, who was here worshipped in the form of a mermaid. To the north of Ascalon, lay Ashdod, called by the Greeks Azotus, and famous for the temple of the god Dagon, whereof we have taken notice before. Still more to the north lay Gath, memorable for being the birth-place of the giant Goliath, whom David slew, and of several others of the same gigantic race. It was dismantled by Ozies king of Judah, and finally laid waste by Hazael king of Syria; however it recovered itself, and retained its old name in the days of Eusebius and St Jerome, who place it about four miles from Eleutheropolis, in the way to Lidda. The most northern fallen down upon his face before the ark; ^a but supposing this to be an accident, they set him up again; and again, next morning, found him not only fallen down, but his head and the palms of his hands broken off, and lying upon the threshold; whence there arose a superstitious use among the Philistines, that neither priest nor people would ever ^b tread upon his threshold.

By this means the people of Ashdod could not but perceive that their Dagon was far inferior to the God of Israel, who, to make them still more sensible of this, smote them, and the inhabitants of the places adjacent, with emerods, and destroyed the fruits of their grounds with swarms of mice; so that, to redress their complaints, the princes of the Philistines ordered the ark to be removed to Gath, where the same judgments befell the people of that place; and when from thence it was carried to Ekron, not only the ^c plague of the emerods, but a wasting pestilence likewise, went along with it; so that the people were resolved to send it away, and to that purpose called their priests together to advise with them in what manner they might best do it.

The priests advised them to provide a new cart, and to yoke to it two milch kine, that had never drawn before, but to keep up their calves confined. In this cart they ordered them to place the ark, and, because it was proper to make some trespass-offering to the God of Israel, to have five golden emerods, and as many golden mice, ^d according to the number of the principal cities of the Philistines, made, and put in a coffer by the side of the ark. But above all, they cautioned them to take notice, which way the ^e kine went; for if they took of these cities, still upon the coast of the Mediterranean sea, was Ekron, called by the Greeks Accaron, a place of great wealth and power, and famous for the idolatrous worship of Beelzebub, who had here a celebrated temple and oracle. But of this idol we shall have occasion to say more, when we come to the reign of Ahaziah, king of Judah, who sent in his illness to consult him.—Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

a 1 Sam. v. 4. The destruction of Dagon before the ark of the Lord, clearly discovered the vanity of idols, and the irresistible power of God. The circumstances attending his demolition are remarkable; and in them it is possible may be traced a conformity with the manner in which different nations treated the idol deities of each other. Dagon was not merely thrown down, but was also broken to pieces, and some of these fragments were found on the threshold. There is a circumstance related in Maurice's Modern History of Hindostan, (vol. 1. part 2. p. 296.) which seems in some points similar to what is recorded of Dagon. Speaking of the destruction of the idol in the temple at Sumnaut, he says, that "fragments of the demolished idol were distributed to the several mosques of Mecca, Medina, and Gaza, to be thrown at the threshold of their gates, and trampled upon by devout and zealous Mussulmans." In both instances the situation of the fragments at the threshold seems to intimate the complete triumph of those who had overcome the idols, and might possibly be a customary expression of indignity and contempt.

Tibullus informs us, that to beat the head against the sacred threshold was, with many, an expiatory ceremony. It probably originated with the Egyptians in the worship of Isis.

For crimes like these I'd abject crawl the ground,
Kiss her dread threshold, and my forehead wound.

Granger.—Ed.

b It is somewhat strange, that when the Philistines saw their Dagon cast down before the ark of God, with his head and hands broken off, they should not thence infer, that he was no more than a vain idol: but instead of that, we find them honouring the very threshold, whereby he received these maims, as if they had been consecrated, or had some divinity infused into them, from the mere touch of this idol. This is a sore instance of blindness and infatuation; but it is no more than what other heathen nations fell into. For whether the custom took its first rise from this practice of the Philistines or no, it is certain, that among the Romans the threshold was consecrated to the goddess Vesta, and those which belonged to temples, were always held in the highest veneration, as appears from Juvenal, "adore the Tarpeian threshold;" and that other passage in Tibullus, "If I was deserving I would not hesitate to fall down before the temples and kiss their consecrated thresholds." B. 1. cl. 5. Nay, at this very day, there are some mosques in Persia, whose thresholds are covered over with plates of silver, and which the people are not allowed to tread on; for that is a crime which cannot be expiated, without undergoing very severe pains and penalties.—Camel's Commentary.

c The word Apholim, which only occurs here and in the 28th chapter of Deuteronomy, is, by different interpreters, supposed to signify different things. Some take it for a dysentery, others for what they call proclivencia anti; some for a cancer, and others for something venereal in that part. The Scripture tells us expressly, that "God smote his enemies in the hinder parts," Ps. lxxviii. 66. And therefore our translation is not amiss, which supposes their malady to have been such painful tumors in the fundament as very frequently turn into ulcers.—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries.

d 1 Sam. vi. 4. The ancient heathens used to consecrate to their gods such monuments of their deliverances, as represented the evils from which they were rescued. They dedicated to Isis and Neptune, a table containing the express image of the shipwreck which they had escaped. Slaves and captives, when they had regained their liberty, offered their chains. The Philistines hoping shortly to be delivered from the emerods and mice, wherewith they were afflicted, sent the images of them to that god from whom they expected deliverance. This is still practised among the Indians. Tavernier, (Travels, p. 92.) relates, that when any pilgrim goes to a pagod for the cure of any disease, he brings the figure of the member affected, made either of gold, silver, or copper according to his quality; this he offers to his god, and then falls a singing, as all others do after they have offered. Mr Selden also has observed, that mice were used amongst the ancient heathen for lustration and cleansing.—De Diis Syris, Syntag. l. cap. 6.

Such offerings have been made from time immemorial by the Hindoos. The women, in many parts of India, hang out offerings to their deities; either a string of beads, or a lock of hair, or some other trilling present, when a child, or any one of their family, has been recovered from illness. Among the Greeks, it was customary to devote within their temples, something more than the mere symbol of a benefit received. Inscriptions were added to such signs, setting forth the nature of the remedy that had been successful, or giving a description of the peculiar grace that had been recorded. Dr Clarke, (Travels, vol. iii. p. 329.) in a long note from Walpole's MS. Journal, gives many curious instances of this custom. The following are selected from it. In the island of Santerin there are some singular representations of the rock. Tomasinì gives the votive figure of a man in a dropsical state. At Phocæa, in the ancient Lydia, at Eleusis, at Athens, and other parts of Greece, are to be seen holes of a square form, cut in the limestone rock, for the purpose of receiving their votive offerings. Sometimes in the offerings themselves, eyes, feet, hands, have been discovered. At Cyzicum there is a representation of two feet on marble, with an inscription, probably the vow of some person who had performed a prosperous journey. The temples of Æsculapius were adorned with tablets presented by persons restored to health. Invalids were allowed to sleep in the porticoes, to obtain directions from the gods in their dreams. The medicine itself was sometimes placed in the temples; as in the case of a goldsmith, who on his deathbed, bequeathed an ointment to a temple, which those who were unable to see the physicians might use. Such votive offerings were fixed sometimes in the rock, near the sacred precincts of a temple; sometimes appended to the walls and columns of the temples, and sometimes fastened by wax to the knees or other parts of the statues of the gods. (Juven. Sat. x. 51. Prudent. contra Symm. b. 1. Lucian Philop.) The temples of the Greeks were used by different states, as banks. To this circumstance was owing, in part, the vast wealth which they contained; and this was increased by the costly offerings in gold and silver presented on various occasions.—Ed.

e It was no bad policy in the Philistines to take milch kine, that had never been yoked before, to draw the cart, in order to towards Judea, they might conclude that these judgments were of the God of Israel's infliction, if any other way, they might look upon them only as common accidents.

A. M. 2888. A. C. 1116; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4259. A. C. 1152. 1 SAM. I. TO THE END.

When all things were thus got ready, the kine were let go; and taking the road which led to Bethshemesh, in the way to Judea, they went lowing along until they came to the field of one Joshua, and there stood still by a great stone. Bethshemesh was one of the cities belonging to the Levites, and therefore, when word was brought them of the arrival of the ark, they went and took it down, and the coffer with it; and cleaving the wood of the cart for a fire, sacrificed the two kine for a burnt-offering to the Lord. But whether out of joy or curiosity, so it was, that some of the Bethshemites adventuring to look into the ark, which was expressly against the divine command, were immediately slain to the number of seventy, which so terrified the rest, that they sent to the people of Kirjath-jearim, acquainting them that the Philistines had brought back the ark, and desiring them to come and fetch it; which accordingly they did, and placed it in the house of one Abinadab, whose son was consecrated to keep it, and there it continued for the space of twenty years.

Upon the death of Eli, Samuel succeeded to the government; and having called the people together, very probably upon the occasion of removing the ark from Bethshemesh to Kirjath-jearim, ^a he exhorted them very earnestly to renounce their idolatrous practices, and to devote themselves entirely to the worship of God, and then they need not doubt but that he would deliver them from all their enemies. This the people promised him faithfully to do: so that Samuel dismissed them for the know whether there was the hand of God in what had befallen them. As these creatures were unacquainted with the yoke, it would be a wonder if they should go jointly together, and not thwart and draw counter to each other; it would be a wonder if their natural affection would not incline them to return to their calves, which were left behind; and it would still be a greater wonder, if, when there were so many different ways to take, they should go directly forward to Judea, without any manner of deviation. It was therefore a matter of no small sagacity for them to make this experiment. To say nothing, that it was a received opinion among the heathens, that in the motions of a heifer or cow that was never yoked, there was something ominous and declarative of the divine will. "Apollo says thou shalt in the lone field be met by an ox that has never felt the yoke, or been oppressed by the crooked harrow; with her as your guide proceed on your way."—Ovid. Met. b. 3.

^a The speech, which according to Josephus, Samuel makes to the people, upon this occasion, is to this effect:—"Ye men of Israel, since ye find by experience, that the malice of your enemies is implacable, and that your earnest supplications to God for relief are graciously received; you should do well to consider, that your wishing for the freedom you want will never do the business, without exerting your power to the uttermost, upon the proper means of procuring it: for to do otherwise, is but praying one way, and acting another. Wherefore, in the first place, be careful not to bring scandal upon your profession by ill manners, but turn yourselves to the love and practice of justice, without partiality or corruption. Purge your minds of all gross affections. Turn to God, call upon him, adore him, and honour him in your lives and conversations, as well as with your lips. Do good things and good will come on it, that is, liberty and victory: for these are blessings not to be obtained by force of men, strength of body, or bands of soldiers; but God, who is truth itself, has promised them, as the rewards of probity and righteousness, and you may depend upon it, he will never disappoint you."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 6. c. 2.

present, but ordered them to meet him again, within a certain time, at ^b Mizpeh.

Here they held a solemn fast and humiliation to the Lord. They wept, and prayed, confessed their sins, offered sacrifices, and ^c made libations; and Samuel took this opportunity to administer justice among them. The Philistines hearing of this their assembly, took the alarm, and coming upon them unawares, put them into no small consternation. Upon Samuel's sacrifice and intercession, however, God declared himself manifestly in favour of the Israelites: for as soon as the fight began, there was heard ^d such a dreadful peal of thunder, as struck terror and amazement into the enemy, so that they betook themselves instantly to flight, and were pursued by the Israelites as far as Bethcar. The truth is, this was so signal a victory, that for a long time the ^b The Mizpeh here mentioned, as appears from the circumstances of the story, must be different from that which is remarked in the history of Jephthah. There is indeed another Mizpeh mentioned among the cities of Judah, (Josh. xv. 38.) and a third among those of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 26.) Some are of opinion, that these two cities are one and the same, and are only supposed to be two, because they lie in the confines of each tribe: but if they are not the same, it seems most probable, that the Mizpeh in the tribe of Benjamin, was the city which is here spoken of. And we may observe farther, that as Mizpeh is said to be situated not far from Eben-ezer, and probably on the east or north side; so Shen (if it be the name of a place, and not rather of some sharp rock thereabouts) was situated not far from it on the opposite, that is, on the west or south-west side, to which Bethcar must needs be contiguous.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3. c. 1.

^c The words in our translation run thus:—"And they gathered together to Mizpeh, and drew water, and poured it out before the Lord," (1 Sam. vii. 6.) but what we are to understand by this water, the conjectures of commentators have been various. Some take these words in a metaphorical sense, to denote those tears of contrition, which were drawn as it were, from the bottom of their hearts, and fell from their eyes before the Lord. Others think, that with this water they washed their bodies, as they are supposed to have done upon another occasion, (Exod. xix. 20.) to signify the purification of their souls from the pollution of sin. Others that they made use of it to cleanse the ground where Samuel was to erect an altar, that it might not stand upon an impure place. Some suppose that it was employed as an emblem of humiliation, of prayer, of expiation, of execration, and I know not what besides. But the most probable opinion is, that this water was, upon this occasion, poured out, by way of libation, before God; and for support of this, it is commonly alleged, that libations of this kind, were very customary in ancient times; that Theophrastus, as he is cited by Porphyry, (Of Abstinence, b. 2.) tells us, that the earliest libations were of water, though afterwards honey and wine came into request; that Virgil, (Æneid, iv.) mentions the practice of sprinkling the water of the lake Avernus; and that Homer, (Odyssey, 12.) remarks, that for want of wine the companions of Ulysses poured out water in a sacrifice, which they offered to the gods. It is certain, that David poured out into the Lord the water which the three gallant men in his army brought him from the well of Bethlehem, at the hazard of their lives, (2 Sam. xxiii. 16.) and therefore, though the law does not enjoin any such libations of water; yet since there is no positive prohibition of them, why may we not suppose, that upon this extraordinary occasion, something singular and extraordinary might have been done.—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries.

^d Josephus gives us this account of the whole transaction:—"In some places God shook the foundations of the earth under the feet of the Philistines, so that they could not stand without staggering: in others, it opened and swallowed them up alive, before they knew where they were; while the claps of thunder, and the flashes of fire were so violent, that their very eyes and limbs were scorched to such a degree, that they could neither see their way before them, nor handle their arms."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 6. c. 2.

Philistines durst not appear upon the frontiers of Israel, but were forced to restore the cities which they had taken from them: so that Samuel had a good reason to set up a monument (which he did between Mizpeh and Shen, calling it 'Eben-ezer,' that is, 'the stone of help,') in memory of so great a deliverance.

After this action, the most part of Samuel's government was employed in a peaceable administration of justice.

For which purpose he took a circuit every year round a great tract of the country: but as he grew in years, he appointed his two sons Joel and Abiah to the execution of that office, who degenerating ^a from their father's example, became such mercenary and corrupt judges, that the elders of Israel came in a body to Samuel, complained of the grievances they lay under, by reason of his infirmity, and his sons' mal-administration, and thereupon demanded to have the form of their government changed, and a king instituted among them, as there was in other nations.

This demand was far from being agreeable to Samuel; however, he consulted God upon it, who gave him answer, that he should comply with the people in what they desired, notwithstanding the affront did not terminate so much upon Samuel as himself; but before they proceeded to the choice of a king, he ordered him to acquaint them with what his prerogatives were, and what rights they might expect, that he would demand from them; and withal to inform them, ^b that slavery to them and their children, subjection to the meanest offices, loss of liberty, heavy taxes, constant war, and many other inconveniences would be the consequence of a kingly power. But ^c all these remonstrances availed nothing:

^a It may probably be made a question, why God did not punish Samuel, as he did Eli, for the wickedness of his sons? But to this it may be answered, that Samuel's sons were not so bad as those of Eli: since taking bribes privately was not like openly profaning the tabernacle, and making the worship of God contemptible. And besides this, it is possible that Samuel might be ignorant of the corruption of his sons, since he lived at Ramah, and they at Beersheba.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b The rules of conduct which God prescribes to the person that should at any time be constituted king over Israel, are of a quite different sort from this practice. 'He shall not multiply horses to himself, neither shall he multiply wives to himself, neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver or gold. He shall write him a copy of the law in a book, and he shall read therein all the days of his life, that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, and to keep all the words of this law, and those statutes, to do them, that his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandments to the right hand, or to the left,' (Deut. xvii. 16.) &c. So that Samuel does not in the words before us, define what are the just rights of kings, but describes only such practices as the kings of the east, who were despotic princes, and looked upon their subjects as so many slaves, were generally accustomed to: and the prophet had reason to draw a king in those black colours, because the Israelites desired such a one as their neighbours had, who were all under the absolute dominion of their princes.—Le Clerc's and Calnet's Commentaries.

^c It is generally supposed, that what made the Israelites so urgent at this time for a king, was a present strait they thought themselves in, for want of an able leader: for Nahash the king of the Amorites coming up to Jabesh Gilead, and encamping before it, had put the inhabitants into such a fright, that, without more to do, they offered to surrender upon terms, telling him, that 'they would become subjects to him, if he would make a league with them.' (1 Sam. xi. 1.) But the haughty Amorite in contempt of Israel, let them know, that if he made a league with them, the condition thereof should be, 'that they should the people persist in the desire of a king, and God tells Samuel, that he will not fail to give them one.

The appearance of providence in the election of their king was indeed very remarkable. Saul the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, was a very tall, handsome youth; and it so happening at this time, that some of his father's asses being gone astray, he, and a servant along with him, were sent to look for them. They wandered about a great way without gaining any intelligence, till coming to Ramah, the place of Samuel's residence, at his servants' instigation, he went to advise ^d with him concerning the asses. God had apprized Samuel with the coming of the person that day, who was to be appointed king; and therefore Samuel, when he saw him, showed him all the respect that was due to his former come out to him, and let him thrust out all their right eyes, and lay it for a reproach upon all Israel.' The elders of Jabesh, in this sad circumstance, demanded seven days' respite, that they might send messengers unto all the coasts of Israel, and if in that time no succours arrived, they would submit. This, it is thought, was the reason for their pressing so hard upon Samuel at this time a king; whereas their duty was, to have inquired of the Lord, as they had done at other times, who it was that he would be pleased to constitute the general in this exigence, to lead out their forces against their enemies.—Howell's History in the notes.

^d The narration of this circumstance we have in the text, 1 Sam. ix. 5—8, as follows, we quote Boothroyd's version:—"When they were come to the land of Zuph, Saul said to his young man who was with him, come let us return, lest my father cease to think on the asses, and become anxious for us. And he said unto him, behold now, there is in this city a man of God, and he is an honourable man; all that he saith assuredly cometh to pass: let us now go thither; perhaps he may show us the way in which we should go. Then said Saul to his young man, But, behold should we go, what shall we present to the man? for the bread which was in our bags is spent, and we have not a present to bring to the man of God; what have we? And the young man answered Saul again, and said, Behold I have in my possession the fourth part of a shekel of silver; that let us give to the man of God, that he may show us the way." Presenting gifts is one of the most universal methods of doing persons honour in the east. Maundrell (Journey, p. 26.) says, "Thursday, March, 11, this day we all dined at consul Hastings' house, and after dinner went to wait upon Ostan, the bassa of Tripoli, having first sent one present, as the manner is among the Turks, to procure a propitious reception. It is counted uncivil to visit in this country without an offering in hand. All gentlemen expect it as a kind tribute due to their character and authority, and look upon themselves as affronted, and indeed defrauded, when this compliment is omitted. Even in familiar visits amongst inferior people, you shall seldom have them come without bringing a flower, or an orange, or some other such token of their respect to the person visited: the Turks, in this point, keeping up the ancient oriental custom hinted, 1 Sam. ix. 7. 'If we go,' says Saul, 'what shall we bring the man of God? there is not a present,' &c.; which words are unquestionably to be understood in conformity to this eastern custom, as relating to a token of respect, and not a price of divination." To this account it may be added, that when Lord Macartney had his interview with the emperor of China, in his embassy to that prince, in 1793, the receiving and returning of presents, made a considerable part of the ceremony. Presents of some kind or other are the regular introducers of one party to another in the east. Pococke tells us of a present of fifty radishes. Bruce relates, that in order to obtain a favour from him, he received a very inconsiderable present. "I mention this trifling circumstance," he says, "to show how essential to humane and civil intercourse presents are considered to be in the east: whether it be dates or whether it be diamonds, they are so much a part of their manner, that without them, an inferior will never be at peace in his own mind, or think that he has held of his superior for his protection. But superiors give no presents to their inferiors."—Travels, vol. i. p. 68.; Forbes's Oriental Memoirs, vol. i. p. 260.—Ed.

character. He took him with him ^a to the high place, where he was going to sacrifice; he invited him to feast with him upon the sacrifices that were to be offered; and had invited thirty guests more to bear him company. He seated him in the highest place, and distinguished him likewise by ordering the choicest dishes to be served up to him. ^b That evening he had a long conference with him in private, and the next morning ^c as he was waiting on him out of town, he ordered ^d the servant to be sent before him, that he might acquaint him with God's purpose of exalting him to the regal dignity; and having ^e anointed him to be king of Israel, he foretold him

^a In several places of Scripture, the Canaanites are said to have had their high places whereon they worshipped their idols; but this is the first instance of any belonging to the people of God; and it is the opinion of some learned men, that this appointment of a private or inferior place of worship, even while the ark and tabernacle were in being, by so great an authority as that of Samuel, gave rise to the institution of synagogues and proseuchas in so many places of the kingdom afterwards.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b I Sam. ix. 24. ^c And the cook took up the shoulder, and that which was upon it, and set it before Saul. The shoulder of a lamb is thought in the east a great delicacy. Abdolmelek the Caliph, (Ockley's History of the Saracens, vol. ii. p. 277) upon entering into Cufah, made a splendid entertainment. ^d When he was sat down, Amron the son of Hereth, an ancient Mechu-zimian, came in: he called him to him, and placing him by him upon his sofa, asked him what meat he liked best of all that ever he had eaten. The old Mechu-zimian answered, an ass's neck well seasoned and well roasted. You do nothing, says Abdolmelek: what say you to a leg or a shoulder of a sucking lamb, well roasted and covered over with butter and milk? ^e This sufficiently explains the reason why Samuel ordered it for the future king of Israel, as well as what that was which was upon it, the butter and milk.—Harmer, vol. i. p. 319.—Ed.

^c Boothroyd following the Septuagint translates, (I Sam. ix. 25, 26,) as follows. 'They then came down from the high place unto the city, and Samuel communed with Saul on the roof of the house; for in the roof a bed had been made for Saul, in which he slept. Now when the morning dawned, Samuel called to Saul on the roof of the house, saying, Arise, that I may send thee away. And Saul arose, and both he and Samuel went out abroad.' This makes the matter clear and satisfactory, and is in accordance with the customs of the east.

Sleeping on the top of the house has always been customary with the eastern people. 'It has ever been a custom with them, equally connected with health and pleasure, to pass the night in summer upon the house tops, which for this very purpose are made flat, and divided from each other by walls. We found this way of sleeping extremely agreeable; as we thereby enjoyed the cool air, above the reach of the gnats and vapours, without any other covering than the canopy of the heavens, which unavoidably presents itself in different pleasing forms upon every interruption of rest, when silence and solitude strongly dispose the mind to contemplation.'—Wood's Balbec, Introduction, and Forbes's Oriental Memoirs, vol. iii. p. 231.—Ed.

^d This was with design to let Saul understand, that what he was going to do was by the divine order and appointment; and that when it should come to the casting of lots, (as it did afterwards, I Sam. x. 20,) he might perceive that he was not chosen king by chance of a lot. There might be likewise this further reason for Samuel's bidding Saul to send away his servant, namely, lest the people suspecting Samuel to do this by his own will, more than by God's appointment, might be inclinable to mutiny. Since this royal unction then was only designed for Saul's private satisfaction, it was necessary not to have it published before the people had proceeded to a public election of their king.—Howell's History, in the notes.

^e We read of no express command for the anointing of kings, and yet it is plain from the parable of Jotham, (Jud. ix. 3,) that this was a custom two hundred years before this time. Why oil, rather than any other liquid, was the symbol of conveying a regal authority, we are nowhere informed. It is true, that God directed Moses to consecrate Aaron to the high priest's several events which should befall him in his return home, in token of the truth of his designation to that office.^f

Thus Saul was appointed king; but then it was only between Samuel and himself. To make his choice and inauguration therefore more public, Samuel called an assembly of the people together at Mizpeh, to which place the ark of the Lord was brought, that they might, with more solemnity, proceed to the election of a king. The method of their electing was this:—First, the lot was cast for every tribe separately, to know out of which the king was to be chosen, and the lot fell upon that of Benjamin: next, it was cast for all the families of this tribe, and fell upon that of Matri; and lastly, it was cast for all the persons of this family, and fell upon Saul, the son of Kish, who, when he came into the assembly, for he chose to be absent at the time of the election, and had been recommended by Samuel in a short speech upon that occasion, appeared so portly, and with so much majesty, that he gained the affections and good wishes of all, except some few disorderly persons, who disapproved of the choice, and, in pure contempt, refused to ^h make him the usual presents; which Saul office, by anointing his head with oil, (Exod. xxix. 7.) But the anointing of kings, we may presume, was of a prior date. Uction indeed, in the days of Jacob, was the common method of setting apart from common use even things inanimate, (Gen. xxviii. 18.) and therefore it may well be supposed that persons of such designation, as kings were, were all along admitted by the same ceremony, which might be of divine appointment, perhaps at the first institution of government, in the antediluvian world, and thence handed down, by a long tradition, to future generations. This rite of unction, in short, was so much the divine care, that we find God giving Moses a prescription how to make the consecrating oil, (Exod. xxx. 23.) But though Solomon was anointed with oil taken from the tabernacle, yet since Samuel was no priest, and could not therefore have any access to the tabernacle, which at this time was at some distance from him, it is more reasonable to think, though some Jewish doctors will have it otherwise, that what he made use of, upon this occasion, was no more than common oil.—Patrick's Comment.

^f The events which Samuel told Saul he should meet with in his return home, were these:—That near Rachel's tomb, he should meet two men, who should inform him, that his father's asses were found again; that departing thence, he would meet three men going to Bethel, one of them carrying three kids, another three cakes of bread, and the third a bottle of wine, and that they should give him two parts thereof; and that when he came to Geb, which was commonly called the hill of God, where there was a garrison of the Philistines, he should meet a company of prophets going into the city, where the Spirit of God should fall upon him, and he, to the wonder of all that should hear him, should begin a prophesy among them: all which signs happened exactly as Samuel had foretold them. (I Sam. x. 2, &c.)

^g The text (I Sam. x. 1.) says, 'Then Samuel took a vial of oil, and poured it upon his head, and kissed him, and said, Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance?' The kiss of homage was one of the ceremonies performed at the inauguration of the kings of Israel. The Jews called it the kiss of majesty. There is probably an allusion to it in Psalm ii. 12.—Ed.

^h It was a constant custom among the eastern nations, and is even to this day, whenever they approached the prince, to present him with something; but here, in the case of Saul, at his first accession to the throne, it was the proper method of recognising him. The Chaldee paraphrase says, that "they did not come to salute him, or wish him an happy reign;" but this is the same thing, because the first salutation offered to a king was always attended with presents, which carried with them a sign of peace and friendship, of congratulation and joy, and of subjection and obedience.—Cabnet's Commentary.—See this subject illustrated in a preceding note.—Ed.

could not but perceive, though in point of prudence he thought proper at that time ^a to overlook.

Saul had not been many days upon the throne, before there happened a fit occasion for him to exert himself. Nahash, king of the Ammonites, laid siege to ^b Jabesh-gilead on the other side of Jordan, and had so closely begirt it, that the people offered to capitulate; but on no better conditions would he permit them, than that each man should have ^c his right eye put out. Hereupon they sent to Gibeah to demand aid of king Saul ^d in the space of seven days, (for that was all the time allowed them;) and he, having summoned all Israel to come to their assistance upon pain of death, in a very short time had an army of 300,000 Israelites, besides 30,000 of the tribe of Judah, and with these he promised to relieve the besieged the very next day. Nor was he worse than his word; for dividing his army into three parts, and falling upon the besiegers about daybreak, he so totally routed and dispersed them, that scarce two of them were left together.

This victory, ^e and the deliverance which it procured from a barbarous and insulting enemy, raised their new

^a In this Saul acted a very wise and politic part, as being unwilling to begin his reign with any disorder or tumult, which his just resentment of such an affront might perhaps have occasioned. These sons of Belial, as they are termed, were very likely persons of some rank or quality; and therefore they despised Saul, for his having been related to a small tribe, and sprung from an obscure family. If then he had taken notice of this affront, and not revenged it, he had shown himself mean-spirited; and if he had resented it as it deserved, he might both have provoked a party against him, and at his first setting out, incurred the censure of rashness and cruelty: a prejudice, which, in the future course of his reign, would have been far from doing any good.—Howell's History in the notes.

^b This town lay on the east side of Jordan, and not far distant from the Ammonites who besieged it. It was in being in the times of Eusebius and St. Jerome, and was situate on a hill about six miles distant from Pella, as one goes to Gerasa. It is sometimes in Scripture simply called Jabesh, and what the inhabitants thereof are further remarkable for, is—their grateful remembrance of the benefits they had received from Saul, when, after his death, having heard that the Philistines had fastened his body to the wall of Bethshan, they went all night, and took the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons from the wall, and came to Jabesh, and burnt them there, and took their bones and buried them under a tree at Jabesh, and fasted seven days? for which they were highly commended by David, (2 Sam. ii. 5.)—Hell's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

^c The reason why Nahash was for having their right eye put out, was not only to bring a reproach upon Israel, as himself declares, but to disable them likewise from serving in war; for, as the manner of fighting in those days, was chiefly with bow and arrow, sword and shield, the loss of the right eye made them incapable of either; because, in combat, the left eye is covered with the shield, and in shooting with the bow, it is usual to wink with ^t: so that depriving them of their right eye, made them useless in war; and yet this barbarous king thought it not proper to put out both their eyes: for then he would have made them utterly incapable of doing the service, or acquiring the tribute for him, which he expected from them.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^d It may seem a little strange, that this barbarous prince should be willing to allow the Jabeshites the respite of seven days; but Josephus assigns this reason for it, namely, that he had so mean an opinion of the people, that he made no difficulty to comply with their request. Saul indeed had been appointed king, but having not as yet taken upon him the government, he lived just as he did before, in a private condition, (1 Sam. xi. 5.) So that had he, upon this notice, endeavoured to levy an army, he could not think it possible to be done in so short a space as seven days; and therefore he thought he might grant them these conditions without any danger, and without driving them to desperation as he might have done, had he denied them their request.—Patrick's Commentary.

^e Josephus acquaints us, that Saul did not content himself king's fame to such a degree, that some, remembering the indignities that were put upon him at his coronation, were, in the height of their zeal, for having them now punished with death; but Saul very prudently opposed the motion, and expressed his aversion to have the glories of that day, sullied with the blood of any of his subjects.

From this victory, however, Samuel took occasion to give those who had hitherto refused their allegiance, an opportunity of coming in, and recognising the king; and for that purpose ordered a general meeting at Gilgal to confirm Saul's election; which accordingly was celebrated with mirth and joy between both king and people, as well as with sacrifices and thanksgivings to God, as the author of all their successes.

Samuel was, at this time, to resign the government entirely into the hands of Saul; and therefore, in the speech which he made upon this occasion, he insisted not a little upon the vindication of his administration. He reminded them of the great transgressions which they and their forefathers committed: he set before them the blessings consequent upon their obedience, and the judgments which would certainly attend their disobedience to the laws of God: he gave them to understand, that they had been ^f far from doing an acceptable thing to God, in rejecting his government, and desiring a king; and (that they might not think that he mentioned this out of any prejudice, or indeed without a divine direction) he gave them this sign—That God would immediately send a storm of thunder and rain, which, in the ^g time of wheat harvest, as it was then, was a thing unusual; and with barely relieving Jabesh, but carried on a war against the Ammonites, slew their king, laid waste their country, enriched his army with spoils, and brought the people safe and victorious to their homes again.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 6. c. 6.

^f That part of the speech, which Josephus introduces Samuel, as making to the people, and complaining of their impurity for a change of government, is conceived in these terms:—"What should you choose another king for, after the experience of so many signal mercies, and miraculous deliverances, while you were under God's protection, and owned him for your governor? You have forgotten the story of your forefather Jacob's coming into Egypt with only seventy men in his train, and purely for want of bread; how God provided for them, and by his blessing, how they increased and multiplied. You have forgotten the slavery and oppression they groaned under, till, upon their cries and supplications for relief, God rescued them himself, without the help of kings, by the hands of Moses and Aaron, who brought them out of Egypt into the land you are now possessed of. How can you then be so ungrateful now, after so many blessings and benefits received, as to depart from the reverence and allegiance you owe to so powerful and so merciful a protector? How often have you been delivered up into the hands of your enemies for your apostasy and disobedience, and as often afterward restored to God's favour, and your liberty, upon your humiliation and repentance? Who was it but God, that gave you victory first over the Assyrians, then over the Ammonites, and then over the Moabites, and last of all over the Philistines, not by the influence and direction of kings, but under the conduct of Jephthah and Gideon? What madness has possessed you then, to abandon an heavenly governor, for an earthly?"—Jewish Antiq. b. 6. c. 6.

^g It is an observation of St. Jerome, that this harvest in Judea began about the end of June, or the beginning of July, in which season thunder and rain were never known, but only in the spring and autumn, the one called the former, and the other the latter rain; and therefore Samuel by this preamble, 'Is it not wheat harvest to-day?' (chap. xii. 17.) meant to signify the greatness of the miracle God was going to work; that he could, in an instant, and in a time when they least of all expected it, deprive them of all the comforts of life, as they justly deserved, for their rejecting him and his prophet, who was so powerful with him, as by his

this, coming to pass according to his prediction, so terrified the people, that they acknowledged their offence, and entreated Samuel to intercede for them; which he not only promised them to do, but to assist them likewise with his best instructions, so long as they adhered to the observation of God's laws; but if they despised them, they were to expect to be destroyed, both they and their king.

After this victory over the Ammonites, Saul, in the second year of his reign, disbanded all his army, except 3000 men, two of which he kept for his body guard, and the other thousand were to attend his son Jonathan; who being a prince of great bravery, had taken an opportunity, and cut off a garrison of the Philistines in ^a Geba, which in effect was a declaration of war.

The Philistines, upon this occasion, raised a very powerful army, which consisted of ^b 3000 chariots, 6000 horse, and a multitude of foot, almost innumerable, and came and encamped at ^c Michmash. The Israelitish army, which was to rendezvous at Gilgal, came in but very slowly, and of those that did, several were so faint-prayers, to produce such wonders.—Patrick's, Calnet's, and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^a Among the cities of Benjamin, mentioned in Joshua xviii. 24, &c., we read of Gaba, Gibeah, and Gibeon; and in Joshua xxi. 17., we read, that the two cities given to the children of Aaron, out of the tribe of Benjamin, were Gibeon and Geba; whence it is not to be doubted, but that Gaba, mentioned in chap. xviii. was the same with Geba, that we read of in chap. xxi. But then it will no ways follow, that this Geba or Gaba, is the same with Gibeah, because this Gibeah was the royal city where Saul dwelt, and is therefore expressly called 'Gibeah of Saul;' and for that reason it cannot be supposed, that the Philistines at this time had a garrison there.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

^b The words in the original, and in our translation, are, thirty thousand; but the Syriac and Arabic versions, which we have thought proper to follow, make them no more than three thousand: and indeed whoever considers, that Pharaoh king of Egypt when he had mustered all his forces together, could bring no more than 600 of these chariots into the field, and all the other princes whose equipages are related in Scripture, much fewer, must needs think it a thing incredible, that the Philistines, out of their small territories which extended no farther than the two tribes of Simeon and Dan, along the coasts of the Mediterranean sea, could ever be able to raise so vast an armament; no, nor all the nations they could possibly call to their assistance. For besides that, in the account of all armies, the cavalry is always more numerous than the chariots of war, which is different here, the largest armies that we ever read of were able to compass a very few of these chariots, in comparison of the number here specified. Mithridates, in his vast army, had but an hundred; Darius but two; and Antiochus Epiphanes, (2 Mac. xiii. 2.) but three. So that we must either say, that the transcribers made a mistake in the Hebrew copy, or with some other commentators suppose that this 30,000 chariots, were not chariots of war, but most of them carried only, for the conveyance of the baggage belonging to such a vast multitude of men, or for the deportation of the plunder they hoped to be masters of by having conquered the country.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Universal History.

^c Eusebius and St Jerome inform us, that in their time, there was a large town of this name, lying about nine miles from Jerusalem, near Ramah; and the text tells that it was eastward from Beth-aven. Now Beth-aven which signifies 'the house of iniquity;' is supposed to be the same with Bethel, and was so called after that Jeroboam the son of Nebat had set up his golden calves to be worshipped here; but as Bethel lay to the east of Michmash, and not Michmash to the east of Bethel, as the text seems to say, the translation should be, that they encamped at Michmash, having Beth-aven on the east, that is, they seized on that post which Saul had before in Michmash, on Mount Bethel, ver. 2.—Calmet's Commentary.

hearted, as to hide themselves in the rocks and caves; and others, thinking themselves never safe enough, retired even beyond the Jordan. The truth is, that both prince and people were sadly intimidated, because Samuel, whose company at this juncture was impatiently expected, was not yet come; so that the king, fearing that the enemy would fall upon him before he had made his addresses to God for success, ordered sacrifices to be made; and the burnt-offering was just finished, when news was brought him that Samuel was arrived.

Samuel had told him beforehand, that by the expiration of seven days, he would not fail to meet him at Gilgal; and therefore, being offended at his dilidence and impatience, he not only sharply rebuked him, but declared likewise that God, by this way of proceeding, would in time be provoked to remove the kingdom from him and his posterity, and give it to another that better deserved it; and so having left Gilgal, he went to Gibeah, whither Saul and his son Jonathan followed him, with a small army of about 6000, and these so badly provided for action, that they had no manner of weapons, but what they could make out of their working tools, because the Philistines would not, at that time, ^d permit so much as a smith to live among them.

^d The precaution which the Philistines took to hinder the Israelites from providing themselves with weapons is no more than what other conquerors have done to the nations they have vanquished. Porsenna, when he made peace with the Romans, restrained them from the use of all iron but what was necessary in the tillage of their ground. Cyrus, when he subdued the Lydians, for fear of a revolt, took from them the use of arms, and instead of a laborious life spent in war, suffered them to sink into softness and luxury, so that they soon lost their ancient valour: and (to instance in one prince more) Nebuchadnezzar, when he had made himself master of Judea, took along with him into 'Babylon all the craftsmen and smiths, that the poorest of the people, which he left behind, might be in no condition to rebel.' (2 Kings xxiv. 14.) The only wonder is, why the Israelites, after they had regained their liberty, under the government of Samuel, and given the Philistines so total an overthrow at Eben-ezer, did not restore those artificers, and so provide themselves with proper arms against the next occasion? But besides the extreme sloth and negligence which appears in the Israelites' whole conduct during this period, it was not so easy a matter, in so short a time, to recover a trade that was lost: especially among a people that had no iron mines, and were so wholly addicted to the feeding of cattle, that they made no account of any mechanical art. In the famous victory which they gained over Sisera, we are told, that 'there was not a shield or spear seen among fifty thousand men of Israel,' (Judges v. 8.) but notwithstanding this, they had bows and arrows, and slings which the men of Gibeah could manage to a wonderful advantage' (Judg. xx. 16.) And besides these, the Israelites, upon this occasion, might convert their instruments of husbandry, their hatchets, their spades, their forks, their mattocks, &c., into instruments of war: a much better shift than what we read of some, who, in ancient times, had no other arms than clubs and sharpened stakes, hardened in the fire. "The rural contest is not now carried on with hard clubs and stakes burned at the point."—Virgil, Æneid, 7. [The policy of the Philistines has been imitated in modern times. Mulei Ismael went farther towards a total reduction of these parts of Africa than his predecessors had done. Indeed the vigorous Mulei Rashid, his brother and predecessor, laid the foundation of that absoluteness; but was cut off in the height of his vigour, his horse running away with him in so violent a manner, that he dashed out his brains against a tree. But this sheriff brought multitudes of sturdy Arabs and Africans, who used to be courted by the kings of Morocco, Fez, &c., to such a pass, that it was as much as all their lives were worth to have any weapon in a whole village or community, more than one knife, and that without a point, wherewith to cut the throat of any sheep or other creature, when in danger of dying, lest it should die with the

While the Philistine army lay at Michmash, they sent out parties several ways to ravage the country, and met with no manner of opposition; till Jonathan, accompanied with ^a his armour-bearer only, found means to ascend a steep rock where the enemy least of all expected an invasion, and so falling upon them unawares, in a short time killed about twenty of them; which put the rest ^b into such a consternation, that mistrusting friends for foes, they began to slaughter and destroy one another, Saul had soon intelligence of this disorder in the enemies' camp, and therefore, willing to make the most of such an opportunity, he got together what forces he could, and fell upon the Philistines with such fury, that he totally routed and defeated them.

In the heat of the chase, he caused a proclamation to be made, that upon pain of death, none should dare to eat any thing until it was night, that the slaughter of the enemy might not be retarded. But herein he defeated his own purpose; for the people, for want of refreshment, grew faint in the pursuit, so that the enemy escaped into their own country: and what was another grievous consequence of this interdict, his son Jonathan, who had been absent when the proclamation was made, had like to have fallen a sacrifice to his father's rash vow, ^c merely for eating a little honey, when he was blood in it, and become unlawful for food."—Morgan's History of Algiers, p. 196.—Ed.

^a This action of Jonathan's, considered in itself, was doubtless a very rash attempt, and contrary to the laws of war, which prohibit all under command as he was, from engaging the enemy, or entering upon any enterprise, without the general's order; but what may very justly be said in excuse of it, that he had a divine incitation to it, which he might probably feel upon the sight of the Philistines appearing as if they intended to assault Gibeath, and upon the information which he might receive of the great spoil which the three parties made of the poor people in the country.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b How two men could put the whole army into such a consternation, may seem somewhat extraordinary; but it should be considered, that Jonathan and his armour-bearer, climbing up a way that was never attempted before, might come upon them unawares, and surprise them: that this action might happen, as Josephus thinks, early in the morning, when a great part of the Philistines' army was asleep; that even, had they been all awake, Jonathan might have so posted himself, as Horatius Corles did on a bridge, so as to be able to maintain his pass against all the force of the enemy: that those who made at him, as only one perhaps could at a time, he with one stroke might lay flat on the ground, and his armour-bearer immediately despatch them; that the rest, seeing them act thus intrepidly, might take them for two scouts, or van-couriers only of a great army that was coming up, and ready to fall upon them; that the army of the Philistines, being made up of different nations, might be in the greater confusion, as either not understanding or else suspecting one another: and what might complete their consternation, that God at this time might send a panic fear upon them, which, whenever he does it, even in the opinion of heathens themselves, is enough to make the stoutest tremble, and the most heroic spirits betake themselves to flight. "In frantic dread even the children of the gods (valiant heroes) fly away."—Pindar, Nemca 9.

^c When Saul told his son Jonathan, that for eating this honey, contrary to his interdict, he should surely die, "because the reverence which he had for his vow, was more to him than all the kindred and tenderness of nature," Josephus introduces the son making his father an answer, not unlike that which Jephthah's daughter, upon a like occasion, returned to him: "That death, says he, shall be welcome to me, which acquits my father of the obligation of a religious vow, and only befalls me, in consequence of so glorious a victory to him that gave me being. I have lived long enough, since I have lived to see the pride and insolence of the Philistines brought down by the Hebrews, which will serve me for a consolation in all my sufferings." And the historian ready to die with hunger, had not the people interposed, and pleaded the merit of that young prince, to whom the honour of the day was chiefly owing.

After this victory, Saul ruled the kingdom with a higher hand, and repulsed his enemies wherever they assailed him. He had indeed a very large and flourishing family. Abinoam, the daughter of Ahinuaaz, was his wife; Jonathan, Ishui, and Melchishua, were his sons; Michal and Merab his daughters; Abner his cousin-german, was general of his forces; and as himself was a warlike prince, God made choice of him to put in execution a sentence, ¹ which, for many years before, he had decreed against the Amalekites, for their opposing the Israelites in their passage out of the land of Egypt.

His commission was utterly to destroy the Amalekites, men, women, and children, and to leave not so much as one creature of any kind alive; but instead of executing this according to the letter of the precept, ^d he saved Agag their king, and the best of their cattle alive; and when Samuel came to expostulate the matter with him, his pretence was, that what he had spared was, in pure respect to God, in order to have them offered to him in sacrifice. But Samuel, who knew very well that this reserve was made out of a principle of avarice more than devotion, first laid before him the iniquity of his conduct, and then declared to him God's immoveable purpose of alienating the kingdom from his family; which made so deep an impression upon him, that he acknowledged his fault, entreated the prophet, who was going abruptly to leave him, to stay, and make intercession for him, and so far to honour him before the tells us farther, that the whole multitude was so charmed with the piety and bravery of the young man, that in ecstasy of tenderness and compassion, they took him away out of the hands of his incensed father, with an oath, "that they would not suffer an hair of that person's head to be touched, who had been so instrumental in a victory that tended to the preservation of them all."—Antiquities, b. 6. c. 7.

^d Josephus seems to hint, that Saul saved this Amalekite king alive, because he was taken with the comeliness and majesty of his person; but others rather think that he intended him to decorate his triumph. For when it is said of Saul, that he came to Carmel after his victory, and 'set him up a place,' (1 Sam. xv. 12.) the word Jab, they say, will signify an arch, as well as any thing else; and thence they conclude, that Saul's purpose was to erect a triumphal arch, in memory of his defeat of the Amalekites: and that he kept their king alive to be led captive in that magnificent procession, wherein he was to make a display of his victory.—Calmet's Commentary. ["In this place the LXX. read a hand, probably because the trophy or monument of victory, was made in the shape of a large hand, the emblem of power, erected on a pillar. These memorial pillars were much in use anciently, and the figure of a hand was by its emblematical meaning well adapted to preserve the remembrance of a victory."—Nicbubr, (Voyage en Arabie, tom. ii. p. 211. French Edition) speaking of Ali's mosque at Mesched-Ali, says, that "at the top of the dome, where one generally sees on the Turkish mosques a crescent, or only a pole, there is here a hand stretched out, to represent that of Ali." Another writer informs us that at the Alhambra, or red palace of the Moorish kings, in Grenada, "on the key-stone of the outward arch (of the present principal entrance) is sculptured the figure of an arm, the symbol of strength and dominion."—(Annual Register for 1779, Antiquities, p. 121.) To this day, in the East Indies, the picture of a hand is the emblem of power or authority. When the Nabob of Arcot, who was governor of five provinces, appeared on public occasions, several small flags with each a hand painted upon them, and one of a large size with five hands, were solemnly carried before him.]—Ed.

people, from whom he apprehended a revolt, as to join with him in worship to God, which Samuel consented to do: but before he departed, he ordered Agag, who by this time began to hope for mercy, to be brought forth to him, and himself, with his own hands, fell upon him, and slew him.

This was the last interview which Samuel had with Saul; for, after this action, he retired to his house at Ramah, where, though he visited Saul no more, he ceased not to lament the sad condition into which he was fallen. It was not long, however, before God awoke him out of his pensive mood, and sent him to Bethlehem, under colour of sacrificing there, to anoint David, the son of Jesse, king and successor to Saul. Jesse had eight sons, and when Samuel came to his house, seven of them were brought before him, Eliab, the eldest, was a goodly personage, and him the prophet supposed, at first sight, to have been the person whom God had pitched upon to succeed Saul; but being instructed otherwise, and upon inquiry, finding that Jesse had another son, who at that time was in the fields keeping the sheep, he ordered him to be sent for; and as he was a very fair and beautiful youth, immediately upon his entering the room, he perceived that he was the person whom God had made choice of; and accordingly he took an opportunity, and ^a singling him out from the rest of his brethren, poured oil on his head, and anointed him king. Nor was the ceremony useless; for from that time forward David found himself inwardly possessed with a spirit of wisdom, and prudence, and courage, and other qualifications both of body and mind that are requisite in a prince. ^b

Saul, in the mean time, declined more and more in the favour of God; and as he was naturally of a timorous and suspicious temper, an unhappy turn of mind grew

^a Our translation says, that 'Samuel anointed him in the midst of his brethren,' and for this it is pretended, that as this unction was a solemn act, and the only title which David had to the kingdom, it was necessary to have it done in the presence of some witnesses, for which purpose none were more proper than those of his own family. But it is plain, from his brother Eliab's treating him after this, (1 Sam. xvii. 28.) that he was not privy to his being anointed king-elect over God's people; and therefore, since the words will equally bear the sense of 'from the midst,' as well as 'in the midst of his brethren,' it is more reasonable to suppose, that as this was the ceremony of his designation to the kingdom only, few or none except his father perhaps, were admitted to it. And there was the less reason for witnesses upon this occasion, because David never laid claim to the crown till after Saul's decease, and was then, at two several times, first, when he was made king over the tribe of Judah, and second, when made king over all the tribes of Israel, anointed publicly. — Calmet's and Patrick's Commentary, and Howell's History, in the notes.

^b They who credit the scripture history in this affair, will easily account for these extraordinary accomplishments and improvements; for that assures us, 'that the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward,' (1 Sam. xvi. 13.) and I should be glad to learn from those who do not credit this circumstance of the history, in the strict sense of the text, how otherwise they can account for these extraordinary effects and endowments which immediately ensued on David's designation to the throne; how a designation to empire, I say, which, in its ordinary course, is too apt to corrupt, debase, and overset with vanity, should raise an obscure youth, uneducated, and little accounted of, even in the esteem of a parent's partiality, in an obscure age and country, without the advantage either of instruction or example, into the greatest musician, the noblest poet, and the most consummate hero of all antiquity. — The Life of David, by the Author of Revelation Examined.

upon him, and settled at last in a confirmed melancholy, but such an one as was frequently attended with violent perturbations, and sometimes with direct frenzy. In this condition, some of his courtiers advised him to music, which would be of some use to lull his disturbed mind to rest; and accordingly recommended David, not only as an excellent master this way, but a man of other rare qualifications, both internal and external, enough to engage his favour.

Upon this recommendation he was sent for to court, ^c where Saul was greatly taken with the beauty of his person; but when he heard him exercise his skill upon the harp, he was pleased above measure, and quite transported from all uneasy and melancholy thoughts. ^d Saul, in short, conceived such a kindness for David for having cured him of his malady, that he made him one of his armour-bearers, though David, when he found the king better, returned to his father's house again. ^e

The Philistines not long before had received a remarkable defeat from Saul; but having now recruited their forces, they came and encamped between f Succoth and Azekah, while Saul, with his army, took ground upon the hill that is above the valley of Elah, which separated the two camps. While the armies lay thus facing each other a champion named Goliath, of a prodigious gigantic stature, ^g being full ten feet high, with arms

^c 1 Sam. vi. 17. This command of Saul might originate in a desire to obtain such a person as might by his skill in playing equally contribute to his gratification and state. It seems to have formed a part of royal eastern magnificence, to have had men of this description about the court. "Professed storytellers," it may also be observed, "are of early date in the east. Even at this day men of rank have generally one or more, male or female, amongst their attendants, who amuse them and their women, when melancholy, vexed, or indisposed; and they are generally employed to lull them to sleep. Many of their tales are highly amusing, especially those of Persian origin, or such as have been written on their model. They were thought so dangerous by Mahommed, that he expressly prohibited them in the Koran." — Richardson's Dissertation on the Manners of the East, p. 69. and Forbes's Oriental Memoirs, vol. iii. p. 182.—Ed.

^d 1 Sam. xvi. 23. The power of music upon the affections is very great. Its effect upon Saul was no more than it has produced in many other instances. Timotheus the musician could excite Alexander the Great to arms by the Phrygian sound, and allay his fury with another tune, and excite him to merriment. So Eric, king of Denmark, by a certain musician, could be driven to such a fury as to kill some of his best and most trusty servants. — Is. Fossius de Poematum cantu et rythmi viribus. — 3d.

^e It seems very doubtful whether this was the case. The text in this part is confused and unsatisfactory, see note on this subject in the following chapter.—Ed.

^f Succoth and Azekah lay to the south of Jerusalem, and the east of Bethlehem, about four leagues from the former, and five from the latter; and the ancient valley of Elah must consequently lie not far distant from them, though later travellers place it at no more than a league's distance from Jerusalem. — Calmet's Commentary.

^g The words in the text are, 'whose height was six cubits and a span;' so that taking a cubit to be twenty inches and a half, and a span to be three inches, and a little more, the whole will amount to about twelve feet and an half: a stature above as tall again as usual! The lowest computation of the cubit however brings it to near ten feet, which is the standard that we have set it at; though it must not be dissembled, that both the Septuagint and Josephus have reduced it to little more than eight feet, which badly comports with the weight and vastness of his armour, though it might suit their design perhaps, in accommodating their account to the credibility of their heathen readers. But be that as it will, several authors, to show this vast size of the man not to be beyond the bounds of probability, have written, and armour proportionable, came out of the camp of the Philistines for forty days successively, and challenged any one of the Israelites to a single combat. ^a This single combat was to decide the fate of the war: but none of the Israelites durst adventure upon it, until David, who happened at this time to come to the camp, ^b with provisions for his three elder brethren, that were then in the service, seeing this great gigantic creature thus vaunt himself, and hearing what reward the king had promised to the person that should kill him, namely, that he ^c would give him his daughter in marriage and ennoble his family, was moved by a divine impulse to accept of the challenge, which he some ways discovered to the standers by. His eldest brother, Eliab, ex professo de gigantibus, among whom Hermannus Conringius, in his book de antiquo statu Holmstadii, and in another de habitu corporum Germanorum, have demonstrated, that the ancient Germans were of a vast size, even as Cæsar, de bello Gall. testifies of them, by calling them 'men of a huge greatness of body.' Nay, even Josephus himself, who is quoted for denying the existence of giants, furnishes us with an argument in their behalf, when he gives us an account of some bones of a prodigious size which were found in Hebron; as Acosta, in his History of the Indies, (b. 1. c. 10.) makes mention of bones of an incredible bigness, and of a race of giants of such an height, that an ordinary man could scarce reach their knees.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries, Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Goliath; and Dissertation of the giants.

^a The words in which Goliath's challenge is expressed, are these: 'Why are you come out to set your battle in array? Am I not a Philistine, and you servants to Saul? Choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me: if he be able to fight with me, and to kill me, then will we be your servants: but if I prevail against him, and kill him, then ye shall be our servants, and serve us.' (1 Sam. xvii. 8.) Antiquity furnishes us with examples of several such like combats as Goliath here proposes, but with none more remarkable than that between the Horatii and Curiatii, related by Livy, b. 1. c. 23. "In which case," as Grotius expresses himself, (On the Law of War and Peace, b. 2. c. 23.) "though the champions perhaps cannot, with all the innocence imaginable, engage in the combat, yet their respective states may, at least allow of it, as a less evil; as an expedient whereby a decision is made, without the effusion of much blood, or any considerable loss on either side, which of the two nations shall have the dominion over the other." "Strabo," says he, "makes mention of this as an ancient custom among the Greeks; and Æneas appeals to the Latins, whether it is not highly just and equitable, that he and Turnus should determine the controversy between them even in this manner." But whether there was any combat stipulated to be decisive of the quarrel between the two contending nations, it is certain that this speech of Goliath's was a mere bravado, proceeding from a high opinion he had of his own matchless strength, as if he had been the whole support of the nation, which was to stand or fall together with him. For that he had no authority from the princes of the Philistines to make any such declaration, is evident from the event; since so far were the Philistines from yielding themselves slaves to the Hebrews, upon the death of this champion, that they made the best of their way into their own country, and there defended themselves, and fought many battles with them afterwards.—Saurin's Dissertation, vol. 4. Dis. 32. and Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^b In those days it was customary for men to serve their king and country in the wars at their own expense; and therefore, Jesse sent a supply of provisions to such of his sons as were in the service; but since he had other sons at home, while David was chiefly in the fields, it seems to be a divine direction that he sent him from the sheep upon this errand.

^c This was no bad policy in Saul to promise largely upon so important an occasion, forasmuch as Caleb won Kirjath-sepher, by offering his daughter in marriage to the person that should take it. And David himself, when he came to the crown, encouraged his soldiers to assault the strong fort of Zion, by promising to make him commander-in-chief of all his forces who should first enter it.—Patrick's Commentary.

hearing such words drop from him, took him, and reproved him for his rashness; but, as his declaration, by this time, had reached the king's ears, the king sent for him, and having surveyed his youth, told him with concern, that he feared he would never be able to encounter a man that was so much older and stronger, and a soldier from his cradle. ^d But to this David replied, that he had already done as great things as killing this giant could possibly be; that he had slain a lion and a bear with his bare hands; and therefore did not doubt, but that the same almighty power which delivered him then, would not fail to shield and protect him now.

Saul was not a little pleased with this gallant answer; and, to equip him as well as he could for the combat, offered him his own armour: but when David had put it on, he found it too large and cumbersome; and therefore, taking only his staff, a sling, and ^e five smooth stones, which he picked out of the brook that ran by, he advanced towards the Philistine, who, perceiving him to be but a youth, and of a fair effeminate complexion, took the thing as done in contempt and derision of him; and therefore he cursed him by his gods, Dagon and Ashtaroth, and vowed to cut him in pieces, the very moment he came at him. But David's reply was of another kind, namely, that he came against him, not in any confidence of his own strength, but in the name of that God whose name he had blasphemed, and power defied. ^f And with these words he let fly a stone at him, with such force and direction, that it hit him on his forehead, and ^g piercing his brain, sunk into it, so that he fell flat on

^d Josephus introduces David as reasoning with the king in this manner: "David perceiving," says he, "that Saul took his measures from the common reason of other encounters, gave the king to understand, That this was not so much a challenge to the army, as a defiance to Heaven itself; neither was the combat to be taken, in truth, for a trial of skill between Goliath and David, but between Goliath and the Lord of hosts. 'For it is not my arm,' says he, 'that fights the battle, but the power of a gracious and invincible God, that many times brings to pass, even by the weakest instruments, the noblest of his divine purposes, for his greater glory.'"—Jewish Antiquities, b. 6. c. 10.

^e Smooth stones, one would think, part best from the sling, and, as they meet with the least obstruction from the air, fly with the greatest rapidity, and in the most direct line; and yet Ludovicus de Dieu, is of a quite contrary opinion, namely, that rough and sharp stones were proper for David's purpose; whereupon he translates the words 'five pieces of stone,' as the Hebrew indeed, without its punctuation, will bear. But it is in vain to be nice and elaborate about trifles, since of what form soever the stone which penetrated Goliath's forehead was, it is plain, that it had both the direction and rapidity of its motion from the hand of God.

^f 1 Sam. xvii. 45. The decision of national controversies by the duels of the chiefs, was frequent in ancient times. That between the Horatii and Curiatii is well known: and even before that, Romulus and Aruns, king of the Cæmenses, ended their national quarrel by the like method; Romulus killing his adversary, taking his capital, and dedicating the spoils to Jupiter Feretrius.—Val. Max., b. viii. c. 2. s. 3. Chandler's Life of David, vol. 1. p. 70, note.—Ed.

^g If it should be asked how this possibly could be, when Goliath was armed so completely, and in particular, is said to have had an 'helmet of brass upon his head?' It is but supposing that this arrogant champion, in disdain of his inferior combatant, might come negligently towards him, with his helmet turned back, and his forehead bare. It is highly probable, that when he made his menacing speech to David, he might turn back his helmet, both to speak and be heard more distinctly; and there was no such terror in David's appearance, as might induce him to cover his forehead again. But admitting he did not, it is but his face, and David ran up to him, and with the giant's sword cut off his head; ^a at the sight of which the Philistines' army fled, and were pursued by the Hebrews as far as the gates of Ekron with a very great slaughter.

When Saul saw David marching against the Philistines, he inquired of Abner, who he was? which Abner could not resolve him; but upon his return from victory, introduced him to the king, with the champion's head in his hand. The king received him with the highest applauses; and upon his inquiry, David informed him, that he was the son of Jesse the Bethlehemite. Every one entertained indeed a high conception for the author of so great an action, but none expressed so entire a satisfaction as did Jonathan, ^b who, being himself a prince of extraordinary bravery, was so taken with his courage and conduct in this engagement that he ^c supposing that David levelled his stone so right, as to hit the place which was left open for his adversary's eyes, or threw it with such a violent force, as would penetrate both helmet and head together. To make these suppositions more probable, we need only remember what we read in Judges xx. 16, of no less than seven hundred men in one place, who were so expert with their left hands, that every one could sling stones to a hair-breadth, and not miss; or what we read in Diodorus Siculus, b. 5., of some slingers, who threw stones with such violence that nothing could resist their impression; and that when they made use of lead instead of stone, the very lead would melt in the air as it flew, by reason of the rapidity of the motion which they gave it.—(Patrick's and Calnet's Commentaries.)—"The arms which the Achæans chiefly used were slings. They were trained to the art from their infancy, by slinging from a great distance at a circular mark of a moderate circumference. By long practice they took so nice an aim, that they were sure to hit their enemies not only on the head, but on any part of the face they chose. Their slings were of a different kind from the Bælearians, whom they far surpassed in dexterity."—Polybius, p. 125.—Ed.

^a 1 Sam. xvii. 51. Niebuhr presents us with a very similar scene in his Description of Arabia, p. 263, where the son of an Arab chief kills his father's enemy and rival, and according to the custom of the Arabs, cuts off his head, and carries it in triumph to his father. In a note he adds, cutting off the head of a slain enemy, and carrying it in triumph, is an ancient custom. Xenophon remarks that it was practised by the Chalybes, (b. iv.) Herodotus attributes it to the Scythians, (b. iv. c. 60.)—Ed.

^b The text says, (1 Sam. xviii. 3, 4.) 'Then Jonathan and David made a covenant, because he loved him as his own soul. And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword and to his bow, and to his girdle.' It was anciently a custom to make such military presents as these to brave adventurers. Besides the present instance of the kind, two others may be quoted. The first is from Homer.

"Next him Ulysses took a shining sword,
A bow and quiver, with bright arrows stored;
A well proved casque, with leather braces bound,
(Thy gift, Meriones,) his temples crown'd."

Il. x. 3. 7. Pope.

The other is from Virgil, in the story of Nisus and Euryalus.

"Nor did his eye less longingly behold
The girdle belt, with nails of burnish'd gold;
This present Cadæus the rich bestow'd
On Romulus, when friendship first they vow'd,
And absent, join'd in hospitable ties;
He dying, to his heir bequeath'd the prize;
Till by his conqu'ring Ardean troops oppress'd,
He felt, and they the glorious gift possessed,"—Æn. b. 9.—Ed.

^c Plutarch, in his book On Intense Friendship, makes mention of several great men such as Theseus and Pirithous; Achilles and Patroclus; Orestes and Pylades; Pythias and Damon, &c., who were joined together in the yoke of friendship, as he calls it; but none of these were comparable to what we read of Jonathan and David, who entered into the most sacred bonds of mutual contracted the tenderest and most endearing friendship with him, which lasted as long as they two lived together; but in their return home from this expedition, one thing happened which occasioned Saul's jealousy. Among the crowds that came out to meet them, and to grace their triumph, there was a chorus of women, ^d who sung to the musical instruments upon which they played, a certain song, whose chief burden was, 'Saul has slain his thousands, and ^e David his ten thousands;' which so enraged Saul against David, that from that time he never looked on him with a gracious eye. For though he thought proper to retain him in his service, and, for the present, conferred upon him some command in the army; yet the reward for his killing Goliath, which was to be the marriage of his eldest daughter, ^f he deprived him of by giving her to another.

When Saul returned to his own house, the same spirit of melancholy came upon him as before; and while David was touching his harp before him as usual, in order to alleviate his malady, the outrageous king threw a javelin at him with such fury, as would certainly have destroyed him, had not providence turned it aside. Hereupon David thought proper to withdraw; yet Saul would still continue him in his service, to have the more opportunities against his life.

It happened, too, that by this time his second daughter, whose name was Michal, had entertained kind thoughts of David, which her father was not unconscious of; and therefore he signified to him, that upon condition he would kill him an hundred Philistines, (but not without some hopes of himself falling in the attempt,) he should have the honour to become the king's son-in-law. David accepted the condition, though he could not but perceive the latent malice of it; and taking some choice men along with him, invaded the Philistines, slew double the number of them, and for a testimony thereof, ^g sent their assistance and defence, to their very death, and of kindness to their posterity, even after either of them should be dead. Jonathan, in particular, through the whole story, shows towards David such a greatness of soul, such a constancy of mind, and disinterestedness of heart, as few romances can produce examples of.—Calnet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^d 1 Sam. xviii. 6. The dancing and playing on instruments of music before persons of distinction, when they pass near the dwelling places of such as are engaged in country business, still continues in the east. This was practised by some persons in compliment to the Baron Du Tott. He says, (Memoirs, part 4. p. 131), "I took care to cover my escort with my small troop of Europeans, and we continued to march on in this order, which had no very hostile appearance, when we perceived a motion in the enemy's camp, from which several of the Turcomen advanced to meet us; and I soon had the musicians of the different hordes playing and dancing before me, all the time we were passing by the side of their camp."—Harmer, vol. 3. p. 292.—Ed.

^e Namely, in his killing Goliath; for all the conquest gained afterwards was no more than the consequence of his death.

^f This was a high affront to David, and one of the greatest injuries that could be done him; however, for the present, he thought proper to dissemble it. How Jonathan resented this usage, we are nowhere told. It is likely, that his duty to his father made him prevail with David to take it patiently, as coming from a man who was sometimes beside himself, and knew not well what he did; and that David might be the more inclinable to do this, as having some intimations given him of the good esteem which the second daughter began to entertain of him.—Patrick's Commentary.

^g The reason why Saul exacted the foreskins of David was, to prevent all cheat or collusion in the matter, and that he might foreskins, according to covenant, to the king; so that, all things being thus gallantly accomplished, and in so public a manner, the king could not refuse him his daughter, but at the same time laid many other schemes to take away his life.

Nay, to such desperate lengths did his jealousy run him, that he, casting off all disguise, ^a commanded his son Jonathan, and some of the principal men of his court, at any rate to despatch David; which Jonathan all along took care to acquaint him with, and at the same time, advised him to provide himself with some place of safe retreat, until he should have an opportunity of ^b expostulating the matter with his father; which accordingly he did, and with so good success, that his father was, seemingly at least, reconciled to David; and Jonathan next day introduced him into his presence: but the increase of David's fame, upon several defeats given the Philistines, still renewing and increasing Saul's jealousy, would not suffer this reconciliation to last long. Saul was taken with another fit of phrenzy, and David was desired to play to him: but while he was employed in tuning his harp, the other took an opportunity, as he had done before, of darting a javelin at him, which David, having a watchful eye upon him, nimbly declined, and so retired to his own house.

Thither the king sent his guards, as soon as it was light, to apprehend him; but by the contrivance of his wife Michal, who let him down from a window, he made his escape, and by the benefit of a dark night, came to his old friend Samuel at Ramah, to whom he told all his complaints, and with whom, for the better security of his person, he went to Najoh, which was ^c a school or college of the prophets, and there dwelt.

It was not long before Saul had intelligence of his abode, and ^d sent a party of soldiers to apprehend him; but they, upon their arrival at the place, where they found Samuel teaching and instructing the younger prophets, were seized with a prophetic spirit, and returned not again. After these, he sent fresh messengers, and after them others again; but no sooner were they come within the verge of the place, but they all began to be affected in like manner. Saul at length, impatient of these delays, went himself; but as he drew near to Najoh, the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, so that he went along ^e prophesying, until he came to the place where Samuel and David were, and there ^f stripping

^c When these schools of the prophets were at first instituted is nowhere indicated in Scripture; but, as the first mention we find of them is in Samuel's time, we can hardly suppose, that they were much prior to it. It may be presumed, therefore, that the sad degeneracy of the priesthood, at first occasioned the institution of these places, for the better education of those that were to succeed in the sacred ministry, whether as prophets or priests. According to the places that are specified in Scripture, (1 Sam. x. 5, 10, and xix. 20; 2 Kings ii. 5., iv. 38. and xxii. 14.) they were first erected in the cities of the Levites, which, for the more convenient instruction of the people, were dispersed up and down in the several tribes of Israel. In these places the prophets had convenient colleges built, whereof Najoh seems to be one, for their abode; and living in communities, had some one of distinguished note, very probably by divine election, set over them to be their head or president. Here it was, that they studied the law, and learned to expound the several precepts of it. Here it was, that, by previous exercise, they qualified themselves for the reception of the spirit of prophecy, whenever it should please God to send it upon them. Here it was, that they were instructed in the sacred art of psalmody, or, as the Scripture calls it, (1 Chron. xxv. 1, 7.) in 'prophesying with harps, with psalteries, and cymbals.' And hence it was, that when any blessings were to be promised, judgments denounced, or extraordinary events predicted, the messengers were generally chosen: so that these colleges were seminaries of divine knowledge, and nurseries of that race of prophets which succeeded from Samuel to the time of Malachi.—Stillingfleet's Orig. Sacra; Wealthy on the Schools of the Prophets; and Jacob Aiting, de Repub. Heb.

^d Such was Saul's implacable hatred to David, that it had abolished, not only all respect and reverence to Samuel, under whose protection David then was, but all regard likewise to the college of the prophets, which in those days had obtained the privilege of a sanctuary.—Patrick's Commentary, and Grotius on the Law of War and Peace, b. 3. c. 11.

^e This is a word of an extensive signification, and may denote sometimes such actions, motious, and distortions, as prophets, in their inspiration, are wont to express "Things dubious, while led on in an inspired course; for when the spirit is present in the heart, man becomes frantic;" (Sen. in Medea;) which, perhaps, may be very justly applied to Saul upon this occasion. But the generality of interpreters, in this place, take 'prophesying' to signify Saul's singing of psalms, or hymns of thanksgiving and praise, which even against his will he was compelled to do, to teach him the vanity of his designs against David, and that in them he fought against God himself.—Calnet's Commentary on 1 Sam. xviii. 10; and Pool's Annotations on xix. 23.

^f The words in our translation are, 'And he stripped off his clothes also, and lay down naked, all that day, and all that night.' (1 Sam. xix. 24.) In which words, and some other portions of the like import, we are not to imagine that the persons there be sure they were Philistines only whom he killed. Had he demanded the heads only of so many men, David he might think, might perhaps cut off these of his own subjects, and bring them instead of the Philistines; but now, the Philistines being the only neighbouring people who were uncircumcised, (for the Arabians, as descended from Ishmael, and all the other nations which sprung from Esau, were circumcised, as well as the Hebrews,) in producing their foreskins there could be no deception. Besides that, this would be a gross insult upon the Philistines in general, to whom Saul was desirous to make David as odious as possible, that, at one time or other, he might fall into their hands.—Calnet's Commentary.

^a It is strange, that Saul should speak to Jonathan to murder David, if he knew the friendship he had for him; and he could not be ignorant of it, since, in 1 Sam. xviii. 3, 4., he had made so public a declaration of it. But he imagined, perhaps, that his love to a father would overcome his love to a friend; and, taking an estimate from himself, might think it no mean incitement to his son, that David was going to deprive not only the father of the present possession, but the son likewise of the right of succession to the throne of Israel. But whatever Saul's reasons might be for desiring Jonathan's assistance in so vile a fact, it is plain that there was a peculiar providence of God in his disclosing himself so freely on this head, since thereby David came to a right information of his danger.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b The speech which Josephus puts in Jonathan's mouth upon this occasion, is expressed in these terms:—"You have conceived, Sir, a terrible displeasure against this young man, and given orders for his death; but upon what provocation, or for what fault, great or little, I cannot apprehend. He is a person to whom we stand indebted for our safety, and the destruction of the Philistines; for vindicating the honour of our nation from the scandal of a forty days' affront, in the challenge of a giant, whom not a creature, but this innocent youth, had a heart to encounter; a person who purchased my sister for his wife at your own price; and, in fine, a person entitled to your esteem and tenderness, both as a brave man, and a member of your own family. Be pleased to consider, then, what injury you do your own daughter, in making her feel the mortification of being a widow, before she enjoys the blessing of being a mother. Be pleased to remember who it was that cured you of your dark melancholic fits, and by that means laid an obligation upon the whole family; and who it was that, next under God, delivered us from our implacable enemies. These, Sir, are benefits never to be forgotten, without the infamy of the blackest ingratitude."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 6. c. 13.

himself of his upper garments, he lay, as it were in an ecstasy, almost naked on the ground, all that day and the next night.

David took this opportunity to make a private visit to his friend Jonathan, with whom he expostulated his father's unkindness, which the other could no ways excuse, only he assured him of his best offices; that he would make what discovery he could of his father's designs against him, and not fail to acquaint him with them. In the mean time he renewed the league of friendship that was between them, and directed him where to conceal himself for a day or two, until he could learn, whether it was proper for him to appear or no; which he was to signify to him by his shooting some arrows, in such a manner as they concluded on, and so mutually embracing, they parted.

spoken of were entirely naked, but only that they were divested of some external habit or other, which, upon certain occasions, they might lay aside. For, whereas it is said of some prophets, (Is. xx. 2. and Mic. i. 8.) that they went about naked, we can hardly think that they could be guilty of so much indecency, and especially by the express order of God, who had always testified his abhorrence of nudity, and enjoined his priests the use of several garments to cover the body, that thus they might be distinguished from the pagan priests, who were not ashamed to appear naked. The words in the original, therefore, which we render 'naked,' or 'to be naked,' signify no more, than either to have part of the body uncovered, or to be without a gown or upper garment, which the Romans called toga, and, according to the custom of the eastern people, was wont to be put on when they went abroad, or made any public appearance. And therefore it was some such vestment as this, or perhaps his military accoutrements, which Saul, upon this occasion, put off; and that this was enough to denominate him naked, is manifest from what Aurelius Victor, speaking of those who were sent to Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus, to bring him to the senate to be made dictator, says, That they found him naked, ploughing on the other side of Tiber; whereas Livy, who relates the same story, observes that he called to his wife Ruca for his gown, or toga, that he might appear fit to keep them company.—Essay towards a New Translation.

^a The speech which Josephus puts in Jonathan's mouth, upon this occasion is very tender and pathetic:—"That God, who fills and governs the universe, and knows the thoughts of my heart in the very conception of them; that God," says he, "be witness to the faith that is vowed and promised betwixt us; that I will never give over searching into, and sifting the private deliberations and purposes of my father, till I have discovered the bottom of his heart, and whether there be any secret rancour in his thoughts, or not, that may work to your prejudice. And if I shall be able to make any thing out at last, whether it be for or against you, it shall be the first thing I do to give you information of it. The Searcher of hearts will bear me witness that this is true, and that I have ever made it my earnest prayer to Almighty God, to bless and prosper you in your person and designs, and you may assure yourself, that he will be as gracious to you for the future, as he has been hitherto, and lay all your enemies at your feet. In the mean while, pray, be sure to keep these things in memory, and when I am gone, to take care of my poor children.—Jewish Antiquities, h. 6. c. 14.

^b The Jewish months were lunar, and never began before the moon appeared above the horizon; for which purpose there were certain persons placed upon the mountains, some time before the new-moon was expected, to give notice by the sound of an horn, when it first appeared, that so the news thereof might immediately be carried to Jerusalem. But lest there should be any mistake in this method of making their observation, from this example of Saul's, it is supposed, that they celebrated this festival for two days together. Whether the heathens had this rite from the Jews or not, it is certain, that other nations had feasts at the beginning of every month, and that, with the Romans, the calends in particular were festival days, consecrated

Saul returned from Natioth to celebrate; but as he observed that David's seat at the table had for two days been empty, he inquired of Jonathan what was become of the son of Jesse, as he called him in contempt. Jonathan told him that he had given him leave to go to an anniversary feast of his family at Bethlehem; whereupon Saul, suspecting very probably the reality of his answer, fell into a passion with his son, and upbraided him with his friendship for David, which, as he told him, would prove fatal to himself, and injurious to his succession; and therefore he commanded him to produce him; for resolved he was, that this rival of theirs should die. Jonathan was going to interpose something in vindication of his friend, and the unreasonableness of his father's indignation against him, which provoked his father to such a degree, that, forgetting all ties of paternal love, he threw a javelin at him with an intent to kill him. ^f to Juno, to whom sacrifices, at this time, were offered.—Calmet's Commentary. 1 Sam. xx. 5. "[As soon as the new-moon was either consecrated or appointed to be observed, notice was given by the Sanhedrim to the rest of the nation, what day had been fixed for the new-moon, or first day of the month, because that was to be the rule and measure, according to which they were obliged to keep their feasts and fasts in every month respectively. This notice was given to them in time of peace, by firing beacons set up for that purpose, (which was looked upon as the readiest way of communication,) but in time of war, when all places were full of enemies, who made use of beacons to amuse our nation with, it was thought fit to discontinue it, and to delegate some men on purpose to go and signify it to as many as they possibly could reach, before the time commanded for the observation of the feast or fast was expired."—Lewis' Rites and Ceremonies of the Jews, p. 25.—ED.

^c That sitting at table was an ancienter custom than either lying or leaning at meat, is obvious from this passage. The Egyptians, when they ate at Joseph's entertainment, sat at table, and so did the Hebrews. Homer always introduces his heroes in this posture; and that this was the known custom among the ancient people of Italy, Virgil, in these words, testifies:—"Our ancestors were always accustomed to sit at their meals."—Æneid, 7. It is not to be dissembled, however, that very early, and even in the times of Saul, the use of table beds, or beds to lie or lean upon at meals, had obtained among the Jews, for when the witch of Endor, with much entreaty, prevailed with Saul to take a little refreshment, it is said, that "he arose from the earth, and sat upon the bed," 1 Sam. xxviii. 23.—Calmet's Commentary.

^d It may seem a little strange, that Saul, who had so often endeavoured to kill David, and was now just returned from an expedition undertaken against his life, should ever expect to see him at his table any more. But he might think, perhaps, that David was inclinable to overlook all that had passed, as the effect of his frenzy and melancholy; that now he had been prophesying at Natioth, he was returned to a sound mind, and become a new man; and that, because after the first javelin darted at him, David had ventured into his presence again, he might, for the future, be guilty of the like indiscretion.—Calmet's Commentary.

^e If it be asked, how it came to pass that Saul always had a javelin or spear in readiness as on this and other occasions, to execute his evil purposes? The answer is, that spears were the sceptres of those ages, which kings always carried in their hands. That they always carried the sceptres in their hands appears from Homer, and that these sceptres were spears is evident from Justin, (b. 23. c. 3.) where speaking of the first age of the Romans, which Dr Patrick thinks was about the age of Saul, he tells us that as yet, in those times, kings had spears as ensigns of royalty, which the Greeks called sceptres.—The Life of David, by the Author of Revelation Examined.

^f 1 Sam. xx. 30. "Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman." In the east, when they are angry with a person, they abuse and vilify his parents. Saul thought of nothing but venting his anger against Jonathan, nor had any design to reproach his wife personally: the mention of her was only a vehicle by which, according to oriental modes, he was to convey his resentment

But he avoided the blow, and retired; and the next morning went into the fields, under pretence of shooting with his bow and arrows, to give David the signal. To him he communicated all that had passed between his father and him; that his father was implacable, and determined to destroy him, and therefore he advised him to escape for his life: and so, having made new protestations to each other of perpetual friendship, they embraced and parted.

Ever after this David was banished from court, and lived in the nature of an outlaw. The first place that he betook himself to was ^a Nob, where stood the tabernacle at that time, and where ^b Ahimelech was high priest; but as he had no attendants, he pretended to against Jonathan into the minds of those about him. (Harmer, vol. ii. p. 492.) An instance of the prevalence of the same principle in Africa, which induced Saul thus to express himself to Jonathan, occurs in the travels of Mungo Park. Maternal affection is everywhere conspicuous among the Africans, and creates a correspondent return of tenderness in the child. Strike me, said my attendant, but do not curse my mother. The same sentiment, I found universally to prevail, and observed in all parts of Africa, that the greatest affront which could be offered to a negro, was to reflect on her who gave him birth.—Travels, p. 261.

^a There is mention made of two cities of this name, one on the east, or further side, and the other on the west or hither side of Jordan. The generality of interpreters will have the city here specified to be that which stood on the west side, and in the tribe of Benjamin. Though it is not reckoned among the number of the cities that were at first assigned to the priests, yet that it afterwards became one of the sacerdotal towns, and especially as we may imagine, when the tabernacle came to be moved thither, is evident from 1 Sam. xxii. 19. and Neh. xi. 52. and some suppose it stood about four leagues from Gibeon.—Calmet's Commentary; and Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

^b The words of our blessed Saviour, in Mark ii. 25. are these, 'Have you never read what David did, when he had need, and was an hungered, he and they that were with him, how he went into the house of God in the days of Abiathar the high priest, and did eat the shew-bread, and gave also to them that were with him?' Now there are two things which the author of this book of Samuel asserts, quite contrary to what our Saviour declares, namely, 1st, That 'David was alone, and no man with him,' ch. xxxi. 1. and 2dly, that Ahimelech was at that time high priest; whereas our Saviour affirms, both that David had company along with him, and that Abiathar was then in the pontificate. Now, 1st, that David had company with him, and that Ahimelech knew it, is evident from his words in the fourth verse: 'There is no common bread in my hand, but there is hallowed bread, if the young men have kept themselves at least from women;' and therefore Ahimelech's meaning must be, that David had no guards to attend him, as it was usual for persons of his quality to have; or at least those that were with him might be ordered to keep at a distance, and so Ahimelech when he uttered these words, might not see them, though, when he came into a closer conference with David, David might inform him, what retinue he had brought, and consequently that all the show-bread was no more than what they wanted for their present support. 2dly, Though it be granted that the name of high priest, in its strictest sense, did not at this time belong to Abiathar, yet since it is generally agreed, that he was the sagan, as the Jews of latter days call him, who is the high priest's vicar, he might well enough, in a qualified sense, be called the high priest; especially considering his immediate succession to his father, and how short his father's continuance in the office was, after this interview with David. Nor can we see any great impropriety in saying, that such a thing was done in 'the days of Abiathar the high priest, though done somewhat before he was invested with that dignity, any more than in saying, that such things happened in the days of Henry VIII., which strictly came to pass some days before he began to reign.—Patrick's Commentary.

Ahimelech, that he was sent by the king upon ^c a business of such despatch that he had time neither to take arms nor provision with him; and therefore obtained of the high priest ^d Goliath's sword, which had been deposited in the tabernacle, and some of the show-bread, which the day before had been taken off from the golden table, and with these he proceeded to Gath, as not thinking himself safe in any part of Saul's dominions.

He had not been long in Gath, however, before he was discovered, and the king informed of his being that great man of war in Israel, who had so often defeated and destroyed the Philistines; so that, to get clear of this information, he was forced to counterfeit madness, ^e and an epilepsy, which he did so artfully, that by this means he evaded the suspicion of the king, and made his escape to ^f Adullam, a town in the tribe of Judah, where his brethren and relations, together with many malcontents, and men of desperate fortunes, met him, and made up a little army of about 400 in number. ^g

^c It must be owned, that David, in this pretence, did not speak direct truth, nor are we from hence to take an example for speaking lies; but one thing may be said in his excuse, that as he saw Doeg there, who he knew would inform Saul of what had passed between him and Ahimelech, his pretence of business was on purpose to furnish the high priest, if he were called to an account, with a better apology for his reception of David, since he knew no other, but that he came express from the king; and accordingly we may observe, that Ahimelech insists on that chiefly. It is a melancholy consideration, however, that the wickedness of the world should be such, as to put even excellent men sometimes on the necessity of lying to preserve their lives, which cannot be safe without it.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d It was an ancient custom not only among the Jews, but the heathens likewise, to hang up the arms that were taken from their enemies in their temples; and in conformity thereunto, the sword wherewith he cut off Goliath's head David dedicated to the Lord, and delivered to the priest, to be kept as a monument of his victory, and of the Israelites' deliverance. And as it was customary to hang up arms in the temples, so when the occasions of the state required it, it was no unusual thing to take them down, and employ them in the public service: from whence came that saying of Seneca, "Even temples are sometimes stripped bare for the sake of the state."—Calmet's Commentary.

^e David is not the only instance of this kind. Among the easterns, Baihass the Arabian, surnamed Naama, had several of his brethren killed, whose death he wanted to revenge. In order to it he feigned himself mad, till at length he found an opportunity of executing his intended revenge, by killing all who had a share in the murder of his brethren. Among the Greeks, Ulysses is said to have counterfeited madness, to prevent his going to the Trojan war. Solon also, the great Athenian law-giver, practised the same deceit, and by appearing in the dress and with the air of a madman, and singing a song to the Athenians, carried his point, and got the law repealed that prohibited, under the penalty of death, any application to the people for the recovery of Salamis.—Plut. Vit. Solon. p. 82; Chandler's Life of David, vol. i. p. 102. note.

^f It was a town in the tribe of Judah, of some considerable note in the days of Eusebius, and about ten miles from Eleutheropolis eastward, where there was a rock of the same name, in which was a cave, naturally strong and well fortified, to which David retreated; as indeed most of the mountains of Palestine were full of caverns, whither the country people generally betook themselves for safety in time of war.—Calmet's and Patrick's Commentaries; Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 2.

^g It appears to have been usual in ancient times for such persons as are described in this passage, to devote themselves to the perpetual service of some great man. The Gauls in particular are remarkable for this practice. The common people, who are generally oppressed with debt, heavy tributes, or the exactions of their superiors, make themselves vassals to the great, who exercise over them the same jurisdiction as masters do over

After his family had thus joined him, he could not but be apprehensive that the wrath of Saul would fall upon his aged parents, and therefore his next care was to provide them with a safe retreat; which he did by putting both himself and them under the protection of the king of Moab, who was then at enmity with Saul. And with his parents he thus continued, until the prophet Gad, who attended him, advised him to leave Moab, and to return into the land of Judah; which accordingly he did, and took up his station in the ^a forest of Hareth, where Abiathar the priest came to him, and upon this sad occasion, brought along with him all the pontifical ornaments.

During David's short stay at Nob, Doeg the king's principal herdsman, was there, and upon his return to court, gave Saul information of all that had passed between the high priest Ahimelech, and David. Hereupon Saul sent for Ahimelech, and the rest of the priests, and having accused them of a conspiracy, and traitorous practices against him, ^b notwithstanding all the high priest could say in vindication of himself and his brethren, he commanded them to be put to death. His guards, who stood by, and heard Ahimelech's defence, ^c would not undertake so barbarous an office; but Doeg, slaves.—Cæsar's Commentaries of his Wars in Gaul, b. vi. c. 13.—Ed.

^a Both St Jerome and Eusebius make mention of a place of this name in the tribe of Judah, lying westward of Jerusalem; of which Rabbi Solomon, upon the credit of some ancient tradition, says, that being before dry, barren, and impassable, upon David's coming, it became fruitful and irriguous, and that, in the 23d psalm, where he considers God as his shepherd, who would lead him into fruitful pastures, and under his protection, keep him safe in the most dangerous scenes, he alludes to this: 'He shall feed me in a green pasture, and lead me forth by the waters of comfort;' for surely it is impossible but that this, which was before a barren desert, might now, by a singular blessing from God upon the industry of David and his companions, become a green and well-watered pasture.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.; and the History of David, by the author of Revelation Examined.

^b The speech which Josephus draws up for the high priest upon this occasion is directed to Saul, and conceived in these words: "I did not receive David as your majesty's enemy, but as the faithfulest of your friends and officers, and, what is more, in the quality of your son too, and a relation in so tender a degree of affinity and alliance. For how should any body imagine that man to be your enemy, upon whom you have conferred so many honours? Or why should not I rather presume such a person, without any further inquiry, to be your singular friend? He told me, that he was sent in haste by yourself, upon earnest business; and if I had not supplied him with what he wanted, it would have reflected an indignity upon yourself, rather than upon him. Wherefore, I hope, that the blame will not fall upon me, even though David should be found as culpable as you suspect him; unless an act of pure commission and humanity, abstracted from the least thought, knowledge, or imagination of any evil intention, shall be understood to make me privy to a conspiracy: for the service I did him, was matter of respect to the king's son-in-law, and the king's military officer, not to the person or interest of David."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 6. c. 14.

^c In this they were to be commended; but much more praise they would have deserved, if they had offered up their petitions for these innocent people; if they had remonstrated to the king, that he was going to commit a thing that was contrary to all laws both divine and human; and if, when they saw that neither their reasons nor petitions availed, they had looked upon this order as the effect of one of the king's distracted fits, and accordingly seized and secured him, until the priests had made their escape, and he returned to a better mind. For to stand wringing their hands, while they saw so many innocent creatures murdered, and foreign soldiers made the instruments of the king's cruelty, who had been their accuser, at the king's command, became their executioner, and with his sacrilegious hand, slew no less than ^d eighty-five of them. Nor did Saul's bloody resentment stop here: ^e for, sending a party to Nob, he commanded them to kill man, woman, and child, and even every living creature; so that of all the children of Ahimelech, none escaped but Abiathar, as we said before, who came to David, and told him the dismal tidings of this massacre, which David could not but sadly condole, and in some measure look upon himself as the innocent occasion of it. However he gave Abiathar assurances of his protection, that he should share the same fate with him; and that, with his own life, he would shield him from all danger.

While Saul was embroiling his hands in the innocent blood of his subjects, David was employing his arms in the necessary defence of his country; for, hearing that the Philistines had made an incursion upon Keilah, a city of Judah, ^f he went and relieved the place, repulsed the enemy with a great loss of men, and took from them a considerable booty of cattle. Saul had soon intelligence of this action; and supposing that David would now fortify himself in this stronghold, he sent an army to invest it; but David having consulted the divine oracle upon this emergency, found that the inhabitants of the place would prove perfidious to him, and therefore he left them, and retired into a wood in the ^g deserts of Ziph, whither Saul, for want of intelligence, could not was much the same thing as to betray all divine and human rights, merely to please a tyrant.—Le Clerc's Commentary. See Josephus's Jewish Antiq., b. 6. c. 14., who has, upon this occasion, a curious descant about the use of power in kings, when at once from a low, they come to be exalted to a high station in life.

^d The Septuagint, as well as the Syrian version, makes the number of priests slain by Doeg to be 305, and Josephus 385, which is a large variation from the Hebrew text.—Millar's History of the Church.

^e This party, as Josephus informs us, was commanded by Doeg, the vile informer and murderer, who taking some men as wicked as himself to his assistance slew in all 385 persons, and in addition to these, it is thought by some, that the Gibeonites, (upon whose account there was so sore a famine in the days of David) who might now be at Nob, in attendance upon the priests, were at this time slain. It is certain, Saul was now become a mere tyrant, and against those poor people acted more cruelly than he did against the Amalekites, some of whom he spared, even contrary to God's command; but in this case he let none escape, on purpose to deter others from giving the least shelter or assistance to David, and to incite them the rather to come and give him information wherever his haunts or lurking places were.—Josephus's Antiq., b. 6. c. 14.

^f We read of no embassy, that the people of Keilah sent to David, to desire his assistance, nor of any particular affection they had for him; and therefore we may suppose, that David undertook this expedition out of pure love to his countrymen, to let the world see, how serviceable he could be to them, in case he was restored to his dignity again, and that, what ill treatment soever he should meet with from the hand of Saul, nothing should provoke him to abandon his love for his country.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^g In Josh. xv. 55. we read of a town of this name where mention is likewise made of Carmel, and Maon, and therefore it probably was adjacent to them. And here, in the story of David, we find Carmel and Maon mentioned as adjoining to Ziph; so that it is not to be doubted but that by the Ziph in the wilderness, where David now concealed himself, we are to understand the Ziph which was in the neighbourhood of Carmel and Maon, in the southern part of the tribe of Judah, and, according to St Jerome, about eight miles eastward from Hebron.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

pursue him; but his son Jonathan, having private notice sent him, went to him, and gave him all the comfort and encouragement that he could; assuring him, that his father's malice would never reach him; that he still hoped to see him king of Israel, and himself his second; and with these words, confirming the covenant of friendship between them, they embraced and parted.

The people of the wilderness were very officious in sending Saul intelligence where David was, and, if he would supply them with a sufficient force, undertook to betray him into his hands; but David having taken notice of their intended treachery, retired farther into the desert of Maon, whither Saul pursued him, and pressed him so close, that there was but a valley between the two armies. David's army was so very small, that Saul was thinking of encompassing the mountain, where he encamped, in order to prevent his escape, when news was brought him that the Philistines had invaded the country on the other side, so that he was forced to drop his private resentment for the public weal, and divert his arms another way: but as soon as the Philistines were repulsed, he with 3000 choice men, renewed his pursuit of David, who by this time was retired into the strongholds of a Engedi.

As Saul was on his march, he happened to turn into a cave by the way-side, where David and some of his men lay hid. His men, when they saw the king entering alone, thought it a lucky opportunity that providence had put in their hands, and accordingly instigated David to dispatch him. But David rejected the offer with abhorrence: b 'God forbid that I should stretch forth my hand against the Lord's anointed;' and only, to show Saul how much he was in his power, went softly, and c cut off the skirt of his robe. When Saul was gone out of the cave, David called to him at a distance, and showing him the skirt of his raiment, declared his innocence in such tender terms, and with such submissive behaviour, that he made the king's heart relent. So that with the utmost compunction, he acknowledged his guilt in thus persecuting the just; and from the many escapes which God had vouchsafed David, concluding assuredly that he was to succeed in the kingdom, he conjured him, by all that was sacred, d not to destroy his family; and having obtained this promise, he returned home: but David, e not daring to trust to his fair word, still kept himself close in the fastnesses of the hills.

Much about this time f the prophet Samuel died, and was buried at Ramah, the place of his habitation, in great solemnity, and g with the general lamentation of d But how did David absolve his promise, or keep his oath with Saul, when in 2 Sam. xxi. 8. he slew so many of his sons? The reply that is usually made to this, is,—That this promise or oath of David's could never be absolute or unconditional, because, upon supposition that any of Saul's family had become rebellious they had nevertheless been obnoxious to the sword of justice; that though David could bind himself with his oath, yet he could not bind God, to whose will and pleasure all private obligations must be submitted; and what is more, that this execution was not done by David's order, but at the desire of the Gibeonites, to whom God had promised that satisfaction should be made for Saul's bloody endeavours to destroy them.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

e It is an old saying, and a wise one, 'remember not to be too credulous;' and the advice of the son of Sirach is this, 'Never trust thine enemy; though he humble himself, yet take good heed, and beware of him.'—Eccles. xii. 10, 11.

f The Jews are of opinion, that Samuel died only four months before Saul. But by the generality of Christian chronologers, he is supposed to have died about two years before the death of that prince, and in the ninety-eighth year of his age, twenty of which had been spent in the government of Israel, (though Sir John Marsham will have it no more than sixteen,) before Saul's inauguration, after which he lived about eighteen. He was indeed, while he lived, an excellent governor, and through his whole administration above vanity, corruption, or any private views. Those that attend to his life may observe, that he was modest without meanness, mild without weakness, firm without obstinacy, and severe without harshness; or as the author of Ecclesiasticus has recorded his actions, and consecrated this eulogy to his memory.—'Samuel the prophet of the Lord, says he, beloved of the Lord, established a kingdom, and anointed princes over his people. By the law of the Lord he judged the congregation, and the Lord had respect unto Jacob. By his faithfulness he was found a true prophet, and by his word he was known to be faithful in vision. He called upon the mighty God when his enemies pressed upon him on every side, when he offered the sucking lamb; and the Lord thundered from heaven, and with a great noise made his voice to be heard. He destroyed the rulers of the Syrians, and all the princes of the Philistines. Before his long sleep, he made protestations in the sight of the Lord, and his anointed, and after his death he prophesied and showed the king his end.'—Eccles. xvi. 13, &c. But besides the things that are recorded of this prophet in the first book of Samuel, there are some other passages concerning him in the first book of Chronicles; as, that he enriched the tabernacle with several spoils which he took from the enemies of Israel during his administration, ch. xxv. 23. That he assisted in regulating the distribution of the Levites, which David afterwards prescribed for the service of the temple, ch. ix. 22. And, lastly, That he wrote the history of David, in conjunction with the prophets Nathan and Gad. But as he was dead before David came to the throne, this can be meant only of the beginning of that history, which by the other two prophets might be continued and concluded. There is great probability, indeed, that he composed the twenty-four first chapters of the first book of Samuel, which contain the beginning of David's life, and several historical facts wherein he himself had a large share; but as for the latter part of it, it was impossible for him to write it, because, in the beginning of the 25th chapter, there is mention made of his death.

g When they saw the disorders of Saul's reign, they had great reason to lament their loss of Samuel, and their sin in rejecting so great a prophet, and so good a magistrate.—Millar's History of the Church.

a Engedi (now called Anguedi) in the days of St Jerome, was a large village, situated in the deserts, which lay upon the western coasts of the Salt or Dead Sea, not very far from the plains of Jericho; and as the country thereabouts abounded with mountains, and these mountains had plenty of vast caves in them, it was a very commodious place for David to retire to, and conceal himself in. Eusebius makes it famous for excellent balm, and Solomon, in his Song, for vineyards, which, in all probability, were planted by his father, during his retirement in this place; and therefore so peculiarly celebrated by the son.—Cabnet's Commentary; Wells's Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.; and The History of King David, by the Author of Revelation Examined.

b This one example of David's, under all the provocations he had received from Saul, abundantly shows us, that the persons of kings are sacred and inviolable. "The authority of powerful kings is over their own flocks, that of Jove is over kings themselves."—Hor. Od.

c If it be asked, how David could do this without Saul's perceiving it? The answer might be, that this possibly might be some upper loose garments, which Saul might put off, and lay aside at some distance from him upon this occasion; and that as there were several rooms, or particular cells, in these large caverns, which might have secret passages from one to another, Saul, at the mouth of one of these cells, might lay down his upper garment, which David perceiving, and knowing all the passages of the place, might go some secret way, and cut off some small part of it. Nor could the noise which David's motion might make be well heard by Saul, because it must have been drowned by a much greater noise which Saul's army, waiting for him at the mouth of the cave, may be supposed to make.—Poole's Annotations.

the people: during which time, David took the opportunity to remove from En-gedi, and to retire farther into the wilderness of Paran, not far from Maon, where he had been once before.

In the neighbourhood of this place, there lived a wealthy man, whose name was Nabal, but himself was of a surly and morose disposition. While David abode in this wilderness the time before, he had taken great care to restrain his men from doing any injury to Nabal's flocks, and now in the time of his sheep-shearing, (which in these countries was always a season of great festivity and entertainment,) he sent messengers to him, that in consideration of the many civilities he had shown him, he would be pleased to send some provisions for the support of his army. But Nabal received the messengers very rudely, and with some opprobrious reflections upon David himself, sent them away empty, which so exasperated David, that in the heat of his resentment, he vowed to destroy all Nabal's family before next morning, and with this resolution he set forward. But Abigail, Nabal's wife, who was a very beautiful woman, and in temper the very reverse of her husband, being informed by her servant of what had passed, took this expedient to divert his ire.

She ordered her servants immediately to pack up two hundred loaves of bread, ^a two bottles of wine, five sheep ready dressed, five measures of parched corn, an hundred clusters of raisins, and two hundred cakes of figs; and with this present she made haste to meet David. David was marching with all speed, to put in execution his rash vow; but Abigail when she met him, approached him with that respect, and addressed him ^b in such moving language, that she soon disarmed him of his rage, and stopped the effects of his indignation; so that they both parted with mutual satisfaction; he, for being thus prevented from shedding of blood, and she, for having thus happily succeeded in her embassy.

When she got home, she found her husband rioting and drinking; so that she deferred telling him of what had passed until he was a little soberer the next morning. But when he came to understand the danger he had been in, he was so terrified at the thoughts of it, that ^c he turned quite stupid, and in the space of ten days died: whereupon David sent for his wife and married her, as he did likewise another woman, whose name was Ahinoam, a Jezreelite; for his first wife, who was Saul's daughter, by her father's command, ^d was at this time given to another.

^a It must be obvious to every reader, that two bottles of wine would bear no proportion to the other parts of the present, nor answer the exigencies which David's army might be in, if they be understood of such bottles as are now commonly in use with us; but in these eastern countries, they used to carry and keep their wine and water in leathern bags, made on purpose to hold liquid things, which vessels they called, or at least we translate, bottles. Such were the bottles which the Gibeonites brought to Joshua's camp, which they said were worn out, and torn in their pretended long journey, Josh. ix. 13. And of such as those it is not unlikely, that our Saviour speaks, Mat. ix. 17. where, in the marginal note of our old Bible, bottles are explained by bags of leather, or skins, borachios, wherein wine was carried on asses or camels; and that two such vessels as these might hold a quantity of wine proportionate to the rest of the present, which Abigail carried with her, needs not to be disputed.—Howell's History, in the notes.

^b The speech which the sacred historian puts in Abigail's mouth, upon this occasion, is certainly an artful piece of eloquence, full of fine turns and insinuations; nor is that of Josephus, especially in the conclusion, much amiss;—'Be pleased, Sir, I beseech you, to accept of the good will of your poor servant in these small presents, and upon my humble request, to pass over the offence of my husband, who has so justly incurred your displeasure; for there is nothing so well becoming the character of a person, whom providence designs for a crown, as clemency and compassion.'—Jewish Antiquities, b. 6. c. 41.

The Ziphites, as we said before, were always forward to give Saul information where David and his men were concealed; and therefore, understanding from them, that he was somewhere about the mountain Hachilah, ^e he took 3000 men, and went in quest of him. David had intelligence where Saul's army lay encamped; and therefore, going first of all privately himself, to reconnoitre it, he ^f took with him at night his nephew Abishai, and entering the camp, found Saul and Abner, and all the rest of the host fast asleep, Abishai, would have gladly made use of this opportunity to despatch the king, but David would by no means permit him, for the same reasons that he had saved his life in the cave; only the ^g spear, and cruise of water, that were at his bed's

^c The words in the original are, 'he became a stone;' but our translation has wisely supplied the particle as, which should always be done, when the Scripture affirms something of another that is not absolutely of the same nature. We may observe however, that this manner of expression is very common among profane authors. Thus Ovid brings in Ariadne expressing her griefs and astonishment at the loss of Theseus, who had left her in the island Dia: "Cold and wan I sat on a rock, gazing on the sea, and as much as the stone was my seat so much was I myself a stone."—The like expression is used of Hecuba, when she saw the dead body of her son Polydorus: "Like the hard stone she stood dumb and torpid." But in the case of Niobe, who is said to be turned into a statue of stone, Cicero, in his Tusculan Questions, observes, that this fable only represents her perpetual silence in mourning; and accordingly Josephus tells us of Nabal, that when his wife told him of the danger he had escaped, he was struck with such an astonishment, that he fell into a dead numbness all over his body, of which he soon died.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Dis. de statua salis.

^d The reason of Saul's putting this indignity upon David, was to extinguish as far as he could, all relation and kindred, and to cut off his hopes and pretences to the crown upon that account: but as the Jewish doctors are of opinion, that this Phalti, to whom she was given, was a very pious man, and would never approach her, because she was another man's wife, and as David had never been divorced from her, he received her again, when he came to the throne.—Poole's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

^e The inconstancy, falseness, and implacable rage of this prince is really inconceivable. Not long ago, he was obliged to David for his life, and acknowledged his error, and made David swear that he would be kind and merciful to his posterity; and yet now he openly declares himself again his enemy, and goes in pursuit of him to kill him.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f This may seem a bold and strange attempt for two persons to go into the midst of an army of 3000 chosen men; but in answer to this, many things may be considered: as that, according to the accounts of many credible historians, several gallant men have attempted things of no less danger and difficulty than this was; that David had all along assurance given him, that God would preserve him in all dangers to succeed in the kingdom; and that at this time, he might have a particular impulse and incitement from God to go upon this enterprise, and might possibly be informed by him, that he had cast them into a deep sleep, that he might give him this second opportunity of manifesting to Saul his innocence, and the justness of his cause. Next to say, that as secrecy, at this time, was the great point, David might think himself safer, in this respect, with one single companion, than with more.—Poole's Annotations, and The Life of King David.

^g That it was customary for warriors, when they laid them down to rest, to have their arms placed in order by them, is evi-head, ^a he bid him bring with him, that he might show the king how much his life had been at his mercy: and accordingly when they had got at a convenient distance, David, with a loud voice, called unto Abner, and, in an ^b ironical manner, upbraided him with this neglect of preserving the king's life, since his spear, and the cruise of water that were so near his bed's head, were so easily taken from him: and when Saul, upon hearing his voice, came out of the camp, and spake to him, he expostulated with him, much in the same manner as he did after his escape from the cave, with this additional complaint, that by thus expelling him from his own country, he forced him to converse with infidels, and, as much as in him lay, to embrace their religion. Whereupon Saul, accusing himself of cruelty, and applauding David's generosity, confessed his guilt, and promised, for the future, never to make any further attempts upon his life.

But notwithstanding these specious declarations, David, who knew the instability of Saul's temper, and how impossible it was for him to live in safety, while he continued in his dominions, determined at last to go over to the Philistines; and having obtained from ^c Achish, deut from what Silius Italicus tells us of Mago, Hannibal's brother. "He, following the warlike custom of his forefathers, lay resting his wearied limbs on a bull's hide, and in sleep forgot the heavy cares of life; not far from the hero was his sword fixed in the earth, and on its hilt was suspended his tremendous helmet, while around him on the ground his shield and coat of mail and spear, and bow, and sling, lay huddled together."—B. vii. But long before Silius, Homer describes the Thracians sleeping in this manner in their tents: "The toil-worn heroes slept and near them their beautiful armour hung in graceful order," &c.—Il. x.

^a 1 Sam. xxvi. 7. A description very similar to this is given by Homer of Diomed sleeping in his arms with his soldiers about him, and spears sticking upright in the earth.

Without his tent bold Diomed they found,
All sheath'd in arms, his brave companions round;
Each sunk in sleep, extended on the field,
His head reclining on his heavy shield;
A wood of spears stood by, that fixed upright,
Shot from their flashing points a quivering light.

^b This speech, which David makes to Abner, according to Josephus, is to this effect. "Are not you a fit man to be a prince's favourite, a general of his army, to take upon you the guard of his royal person, and under all these honourable obligations, to lie dozing, and stretching yourself at ease, when your master's life is in danger? Can you tell me, what is become of the king's lance, and the pitcher of water, that were this night taken by the enemy out of his tent, and from his very bedside, and you, in the mean time, all snoring about him, without knowing any thing of the matter? Whether this was neglect or treachery, it is the same thing: you certainly deserve to lose your head for it."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 6, c. 14.

^c Whether this was the same Achish, mentioned 1 Sam. xxi. 10. with whom David took shelter at his first flight from Saul, or some successor of the same name, is a matter of some conjecture: His being called 'Achish, the son of Maach,' seems to imply that he was a different person; because, in the nature of things, these words can have no use, but only to distinguish this Achish from another of the same name. But whoever it was, it is highly probable, that he either had invited David to come thither for his security, or that David had sent beforehand ambassadors to treat with him, and to obtain his royal promise of protection. And this we are rather induced to believe, because both found their advantage by this alliance: David secured himself against the persecutions of Saul; and Achish, knowing David's valour, and the number of troops which came along with him, thought he should give a powerful diversion to the forces of Israel, if he could at this time attach David to his king of Gath, a safe-conduct for himself and his retinue, he, for some time, lived in the royal city; but not liking his accommodation here so well, as he grew in favour with the king ever more and more, he obtained of him at last to have the ^d town of Ziklag assigned for his habitation, and, as soon as he was settled here, several of Saul's best officers and soldiers came over to him. David at first had some suspicion of them; but having, for some time, made trial of their fidelity, he received them into his service, and gave them commands: and with this accession to his army he was enabled to make several excursions against the ^e Amalekites, and other nations, in which he was accustomed to kill all, that none might carry information, and, at the same time, ^f by certain ambiguous expressions, made the king believe, that the booty he brought back with him, was taken from the Israelites, which was no unpleasant news.

In short, to such a degree of confidence was he grown with Achish, that he proposed taking him along with him to the war, which the Philistines had at this time declared against Saul; but some of the chief men about him declaring against it, as being apprehensive that in the day of battle he might possibly turn against them, prevailed with the king to dismiss him. This was an agreeable turn to David; yet he so far dissembled the interest. But whether David did well or ill in either suing for or accepting of the protection of this foreign king, is a point that we shall have occasion to discuss hereafter.—Patrick's and Calmel's Commentaries; and The Life of King David.

^d Ziklag was situate in the extreme parts of the tribe of Judah southwards, not far from Hormah, where the Israelites received a defeat while they sojourned in the wilderness. In the division of the land of Canaan, it was first given to the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 31.) and afterwards to that of Simeon, (Josh. xix. 5.) but the Philistines seem all along to have kept possession; so that it never came into the hands of either tribe, until by the gift of Achish, it became the peculiar inheritance of David and his successors. Why David desired of Achish the liberty to retire to this place, was to avoid the envy which the number of his attendants might possibly occasion; to secure his people from the infection of idolatry; to enjoy the free exercise of his own religion; and to gain an opportunity of enterprising something against the enemies of God, without the knowledge or observation of the Philistines.—Calmel's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^e In 1 Sam. xv. 7. we read, that 'Saul smote the Amalekites, and utterly destroyed all the people with the edge of the sword;' and yet we find here David making frequent incursions upon the Amalekites; and therefore the meaning of the former passage must be, that Saul destroyed as many of them as fell into his hands; for several of them might make their escape from Saul into the deserts that lay towards Arabia Felix, and upon his retreat, return and repossess their old habitation.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^f The words wherein David answered this question of Achish, 'Whither have you made a road to-day?' are these, 'Against the south of Judah, and against the south of the Jerahmeelites, and against the south of the Kenites,' (1 Sam. xxvii. 10.) By which nations David, in reality, meant the Geshurites, and the Gezerites, who were both of them relicts of the Canaanites, whom God ordered to be extirpated, and who did, in truth, lie to the south of Judah; but Achish understood him in a quite contrary sense, namely, that he had fallen upon his own countrymen. So that since the formality of a lie consists in our imposing upon those with whom we converse, we cannot but allow, that though David's answer may not be called a downright lie, yet it is an equivocation with an intent to deceive, badly comporting with that honesty and simplicity which became David, both as a prince and professor of the true religion, wherein he is no way to be excused, and much less to be imitated.—Poole's Annotations.

matter, that the king, to oblige his nobles, was forced to be very pressing and importunate with him to return to Ziklag; which accordingly he did, and in his march thither, was joined by several of the tribe of Manasseh, as those of Gad and Benjamin had done before, to a considerable augmentation of his forces. And well it so happened; for upon his return to Ziklag, he found that the Amalekites had burned and pillaged the place, ^a and carried away his two wives, and all the people that were therein; and, what was no small accession to this misfortune, his soldiers mutinied against him, as if he had been ^b the occasion of it. David, however, marching away immediately, and having gained intelligence which way the enemy took, soon came up with them, fell upon them, and cut them to pieces; and not only recovered all the persons and the booty which they had taken, but several rich spoils likewise, that they had robbed others of in this expedition, whereof he made presents to his friends. ^c

In the mean time, the Philistine army, lay at ^d Shunem, and Saul and his forces were encamped in Mount Gilboa, from whence having a prospect of the enemy's strength, ^e his courage failed him, when he saw how much more numerous the Philistines were, and found, at the same time, that God, in this pressing juncture, would not be consulted by him, nor give him any instructions what to do. He had, some time before, banished all the wizards, and such as dealt with familiar spirits, ^f of the nation; but being now in the utmost perplexity, ^g he was ^a It may seem a little strange, that the Amalekites, who had so often been cut to pieces by David, should not, upon their success, slay, rather than carry away, the people, which they found in Ziklag; but this may be imputed either to their covetousness, who might keep them for sale, and to make money of them as captives; or to their cruelty, who might reserve them for more lingering and repeated torments, or perhaps for the gratification of their brutal lusts; though principally it is to be ascribed to God's overruling providence, who restrained and set bounds to their rage.—Pool's Annotations.

^b This he might seem to be, in relinquishing his own country, and coming to Ziklag; in provoking the Amalekites by the slaughter of all that came in his way; and in going with Achish to war, while he left the place, where their wives and children were, unguarded.—Pool's Annotations.

^c His friends were chiefly those of his own tribe; but besides these, we find he sent to others, namely, to the inhabitants of the city of Bethel, which belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and this he did, not only in the acknowledgment of the shelter and support which he had received from them in his banishment, but in prospect of their future favour and interest, in case there should happen a vacancy in the throne.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^d Shunem was a city on the borders of the tribe of Issachar, about five miles to the south of Mount Hermon, according to St Jerome and Eusebius, who tells us likewise, that Gilboa was a ridge of mountains, six miles distant from Scythopolis, anciently called Bethshan; and that Endor was a town in the valley of Jezreel, at the foot of Mount Gilboa.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament; and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^e The Philistines must have had, on this occasion, several hired forces, otherwise Saul had no reason to have been afraid of them, because the small tract which the Philistines inhabited could not possibly supply them with an army any thing equal to the Hebrews, who, in some of their wars, have carried to the field some hundred thousands of men.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^f A strange imputation this of Saul! He had banished all wizards and sorcerers out of his kingdom, as a dangerous sort of people, who made profession of a wicked and unwarrantable art; and yet he here inquires after one, and puts his whole confidence in what he had so wisely exploded before; as if a witch with resolved to consult some one of this profession, in order to know what the fate of this war would be. At Endor, about three leagues from Mount Gilboa, he was told there lived a ^g witch or sorceress; and therefore disguising himself, and taking but two servants with him, that he might not be suspected, he came to the woman ^h by night, and desired of her ⁱ to raise up the ghost of Samuel.

Whether it was the ghost of Samuel, which God, upon this occasion, permitted to appear, or some evil spirit whom the witch, by her enchantments, might raise up; but so it was, that from this spectre ^k the woman learned that it was Saul who had employed her; and Saul, when he saw it, bowed his face to the ground. The apparition spake first, and demanding the reason ^l why he had her incantations, and other diabolical arts, was capable of allaying the uneasiness of his mind, or securing him from the apprehensions of danger. It may be observed, however, that he mentions a woman rather than a man to be consulted upon this occasion, because he might mention that the weaker sex might more easily be deceived by evil spirits, and were generally more addicted to these unlawful practices.—Calmet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^g The Septuagint have called her, 'a woman that speaks from her belly, or stomach,' as most magicians affected to do: and some modern authors have informed us, that there were women who had a demon, which spake articulately from the lower part of their stomachs, in a very loud, though hoarse tone: "The spirit conversing with the witch shrieked loud and dismally."—Hor. Sat. 8.

^h They could not go the direct way; for then they must have passed through the enemy's camp; and therefore they took a compass, and travelled by night, that they might not be discovered; besides that the night was the properest time to consult those that pretended to magical incantations, it being a common opinion among the Greeks, as perhaps now it might be among the Hebrews, that none of the terrestrial demons did appear in the daytime.—Patrick's Commentary.

ⁱ It was a common pretence of magicians, that they could raise up ghosts from below, or make dead persons appear to declare unto them future events. "Gore was poured out into a dish that thereby they might draw out the manes, those spirits of prophecy."—Hor. Sat. b. 1. And therefore Saul addresses the woman, as if he believed her abilities in that way. This however shows, not only the antiquity of necromancy, but the prevailing opinion then, that the soul, after the death of the body, did survive; otherwise it would have been impertinent for Saul to desire the woman to raise up Samuel. Which makes it the greater wonder, that we have nowhere, in the Old Testament, a positive declaration of the soul's immortality.—Calmet's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^k How the woman came to know it to be Samuel, we may thus imagine. She saw an apparition she did not expect; she knew the prophet; she knew the veneration which Saul had for him; she knew that prophets were only sent to kings; and she knew withal, that her art, whatever it was, had never before that time exhibited a person of that figure to her; and from hence she concluded, that the apparition must needs be Samuel, and the person who came to consult her, in all probability was Saul.—The History of the Life of King David.

^l The words of Samuel are, 'why hast thou disquieted me, and brought me up?' which seem to imply, that Samuel was raised up by the force of this woman's enchantments. But as it is not in the power of witches to disturb the rest of good men, and bring them into the world when they please, it is much more rational to think, that the Scripture here expresses itself in a manner suitable to the prejudice of the vulgar, among whom it was a common notion, that these incantations gave trouble to the souls that were at rest. For which reason, they were either to be appeased by offerings, or constrained by the force of enchantments; for so the tragedian has informed us, "He pours out the magic song, and in a threatening tone hurriedly sings whatever either appeases or constrains the airy spirit."—Seneca in Æpid.

raised him from the dead, was answered by Saul, that the Philistines, with a powerful army had invaded him, and in his distress, God had forsaken him, and would give no answer ^a which way soever he consulted him. To whom the spirit replied, that for his disobedience in not destroying the Amalekites, God had taken away the kingdom from his family, and given it to David; and as to the fate of the war, the Philistines, ^b the next day, should rout his army, and he and his sons fall in the battle.

Saul had no sooner heard his doom, but he fainted away; and as he had eaten nothing for some considerable time, ^c the woman and his servants, with much ado, prevailed with him to take some refreshment: which when he had done, he went away, and marched all night, that he might come early enough to the camp next morning.

The next morning the two armies met, and engaged; but the Israelites were forced to give way, and maintained a running fight, until they came to mount Gilboa, where, gaining the advantage of the ground, they attempted to rally again, but with as little success as before. Saul and his sons did all that was possible for brave men to do; but the Philistines aiming wholly at them, in a short time, overpowered them with numbers, ^d so that Jonathan and two others of his brothers, Abin-

^a The sacred historian has reckoned up three several ways of inquiring of God, namely, by dreams, by Urim, and by prophets; and it may not be amiss to observe, that there were the same methods of consulting their gods among the Gentiles; as it appears by what Achilles says in the council of the Greeks, when met together to consult about the plague which Apollo sent among them. "Come now let us address some prophet or priest, or interpreter of dreams, for dreams ever are from Jove."

^b The phrase wherein Samuel expresses himself, is thus, 'to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me.' Where the word to-morrow, as some interpreters imagine, is not to be taken in a strict sense, because, as they conceive, this battle was not fought till some time after; but in the passage before us, there seems to be no reason why to-morrow should not be taken literally. For as Endor was at no great distance from the Israelites' camp, Saul might go that night, consult the witch, stay, and eat with her, and get back to the camp before it was light. The next day the battle begins; Saul is vanquished, and seeing his army routed, despairs, and stabs himself. All this might very well be done in the space of twelve or fourteen hours; and therefore I see no occasion why we should depart from the plain signification of the words.—Calmel's Commentary.

^c Josephus seems to be very warm in his commendation of this woman's generosity to Saul. 'She received him, treated him, and relieved him; and all this so cheerfully, and so frankly, that she gave him all she had, without any prospect of reward; for she knew that he was doomed to die. And what is more, this she did for the very man whose prohibition had been her ruin.' But he rashly supposes, that in the words of the sacred history, the narration is accurate, and defective in no one circumstance; whereas, for any thing we know, this woman was far from being poor; Saul had amply rewarded her for raising up Samuel, and his attendant might give her a round price for her lamb. And though it must be owned, that her address to the king is tender and respectful enough; yet whether it proceeded from fear or affection, may admit of some debate.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^d It was certainly no small grief to David to hear of Jonathan's death, and a trial it might be of his patience and resignation to the divine will; but still there seems to be a direction of providence in suffering him to be slain, that David might more easily come to the throne. For though Jonathan, no doubt, would have made a voluntary dedication of it, yet as he was the people's great favourite, some there might possibly be, who would not allow of the adab and Malchishua, were killed upon the spot, and the whole army put in confusion.

Saul defended himself as well as man could do; but the small party that remained with him, being entirely broken, and the ^e enemy's archers pressing hard upon him, he found himself so weakened with his wounds and loss of blood, that for fear of falling into their hands, and being insulted, he fell upon his own sword, and so died. He had requested of his armour-bearer before this to despatch him; but his armour-bearer was startled at the proposal and refused to do it: however, when he saw his master dead, ^f he desperately followed his example, and in the same manner put an end to his life.

The next day, when the Philistines came to take a view of the field of battle, finding the bodies of Saul and his sons among the slain, they stripped them of their armour, cut off their heads, and sent expresses to every place of their victory. ^g Their armour they sent to the temple of Ashtaroth, ^h their heads they fixed up in the dedition, and so a civil war might have arisen concerning the successor, which, by his dying in this manner, was prevented.—Poole's Annotations.

^e There is no mention of archers in any of the Philistines' armies, or battles, before this, in which they are said to have pressed hard upon Saul, as doubtless they were of great advantage to the Philistines in making their attack; 1st, because an assault with this kind of weapon was new and surprising, and therefore generally successful; and, 2dly, because the arrows destroying the Israelites at a distance, before they came to close fight, threw them naturally into terror and confusion. And for this reason some think, that when David came to the throne, he taught the Israelites the use of the bow, (as we read 2 Sam. i. 18.) that they might not be inferior to the Philistines, nor fall into the like disaster that Saul had done; and for this reason it certainly was, that when he had made a peace with the Philistines, he took some of their archers, who in the following books are frequently mentioned under the name of Cherethites, to be his body guards.—Patrick's Commentary, and The History of the Life of King David.

^f The learned and ingenious author of the Historical Account of the Life of King David, seems to make it evident, that Saul and his armour-bearer died by the same sword, namely, that which belonged to the armour-bearer. 'Now, it is an established tradition of the Jewish church,' says he, 'that this armour-bearer was Doeg the Edomite, who, by Saul's command, slew such a number of priests in one day, (1 Sam. xxii. 18.) and if so, then Saul and his executioner fell both by the same weapon wherewith they had before massacred the servants of the Lord. Even as Brutus and Cassius killed themselves with the same swords with which they treacherously murdered Cæsar; I say treacherously murdered, because they lay in his bosom at the same time that they meditated his death.'—Vol. 1.

^g We have taken notice before, that it was an ancient custom among sundry nations to hang up the arms and other spoils taken from the enemy, in the temples of their gods, as trophies and monuments of their victory; and need only remark here, that the custom prevailed among the Greeks and Romans, as appears from this passage of Virgil:—"In the hallowed halls hang many an instrument of war; battle chariots taken from the foe, shattered axes, helmets, huge bars of gates, javelins, shields, and rostra wrenched from war ships."—Æneid 7.

^h 1 Sam. xxxi. 10. The custom of dedicating to the gods the spoils of a conquered enemy, and placing them in their temples as trophies of victory, is very ancient. Homer represents Hector as promising that, if he should conquer Ajax in single combat, he would dedicate his spoils to Apollo:—

And if Apollo, in whose aid I trust,
Shall stretch your daring champion in the dust,
If mine the glory to despoil the foe,
On Phœbus' temple I'll his arms bestow.

temple of Dagon, and their bodies they hung upon gibbets against the walls of Bethshan. But the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead, hearing of this indignity, and retaining a grateful sense of the services Saul had done them, sent a party of their best soldiers by night, who took down their bodies, and brought them away to Jabesh, where the people first ^a burned the remains of their flesh; next honourably interred their bones and ashes, in a grove that was near their city; and then for the space of ^b seven days, fasted and made great lamentation for them.

In the fourth chapter of this book of Samuel we read, that upon a defeat which the Israelites had received from the Philistines, the elders of Israel advised together in council what might be the occasion of their ill success; 'Wherefore,' say they, 'hath God smitten us to-day, before the Philistines?' The justness of their cause, they thought, was enough to entitle them to God's favour, how wicked soever they were in their lives; and therefore, without any thought of amending these, they devised another expedient that would not fail of securing them victory: 'Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the Lord,' say they, 'out of Shiloh, that when it comes among us, it may save us out of the hand of our enemies.'¹ They had good reason to look upon the ark of the covenant as a certain token of the presence of God among them, and of his protection over them. They had had frequent experience of battles won by virtue of his presence, and lost in the absence of it; and whenever they had this token of the divine assistance along with them, they always esteemed themselves invincible. They re-by the Athenians, after the battle of Marathon, and shields taken from the Gauls under Brennus.—Chandler's Travels in Greece, p. 262.—ED.

^a It is certain that the usage among the Hebrews was not to burn, but to embalm the bodies of their dead with aromatic spices; but in this case the people of Jabesh might act otherwise, either because the bodies of Saul and his sons were, by this time, so dried or corrupted, that they were not fit to be embalmed; or because they were apprehensive, that if they should embalm them, and so bury them, the people of Bethshan might, at one time or other, come and dig them up, and fix them against their walls again; and therefore the Jabeshites thought it advisable to recede from their common practice, and for the greater security, to imitate the heathens in this particular: "Weeping for their gentle companion, they gathered up his whitened bones into a golden urn." (Hom. Il. xxiii.)—Calmet's and Le Clerc's Commentary.

^b It seems a little strange, that we nowhere read of any general mourning that was made for Saul and his sons, who died in battle; but the national troubles, which followed upon his death, might perhaps be an obstruction to this. David and his men mourned but one day for Saul; and therefore, when it is said of the Jabeshites, that they fasted seven days, their fasting must not be understood in a strict sense, as if they ate nothing all this time, but in a more large and general signification, as it is used both in sacred and profane writers, namely, that they lived very abstemiously, ate little, and that seldom, and that but mean food, and instead of wine drank water only.—Calmet's Commentary, and Pole's Annotations.

membered the story of the walls of Jericho³ falling down by the power of this ark's seven times surrounding them. They had heard⁴ of the defeat which their forefathers had suffered, when they presumed to march against the Canaanites without their leader, and without this ark; and were fond enough to imagine, that God himself might be looked upon as overcome, if the Philistines should have the advantage, when the ark of his presence was with them. By this means, therefore, they thought to interest his honour in the war, and make him responsible, as it were, for any disaster that should befall them; and upon these motives it was that they sent for the ark.

But because they presumed to send for it, without ever consulting God, as they used to do upon all momentous affairs; because the iniquities of the people were become so enormous, as not to deserve any longer the divine presence among them; and because the flagitiousness of the priests, who were killed in defending the ark, had for a long time, called for some judgment upon them; that therefore his predictions concerning the sons of Eli might be fulfilled, he permitted the ark to be taken, as thinking it more inconsistent with his honour to afford assistance to the wicked and presumptuous, than to admit of the profanation even of the most sacred things. What an affliction the loss of this ark was to the people of Israel we may learn from the sad fate of Eli, and his daughter-in-law, who both died for grief at the bare hearing of it; and therefore we may suppose that a farther reason for God's permitting it, might be, to bring his own people to a sense of their apostasy and ingratitude to him, when they came to consider what a damage they suffered in the departure of this symbol of his presence, which was deservedly esteemed⁵ the glory of Israel.

What afflictions the taking or withholding the ark brought upon the Philistines, the fall of their god Dagon, the mice, the emerods, the pestilence, and other sore judgments, do abundantly testify; and therefore we may suppose yet farther, that God's design in permitting this capture of the ark, was to demonstrate his power among the heathens, and to let the Philistines know, that his dominion reached everywhere; that he was equally the Lord both of the conquerors and conquered; and that the pretended deities whom they adored, in comparison of him, were of no avail.

It was from an intent, therefore, to illustrate his almighty power, and not from any inability to preserve it; that God suffered this ark of the covenant to be taken; and though what the Jews call the shechinah, or visible token of God's presence, which abode under the two cherubim upon the propitiatory, or covering of the ark, in the shape of the cloud, might not be so apparent, after it fell into the hands of the Philistines; yet that it had divine and miraculous power attending it, is evident by their own confession, who, upon seeing the destruction that its presence had occasioned, do frankly declare, that⁶ 'the ark of the God of Israel should not abide with them, because his hand was sore upon them, and upon Dagon their god.'

It was a particular prohibition,⁷ that not only the common people, but even the Levites themselves, should not dare to look into the ark, or any other of the holy utensils, belonging to the service of God, upon pain of death: and the severity of this law will not seem so unreasonable, when it is considered, that in every nation it was always accounted a great profaneness, and frequently attended with exemplary punishments, for such as were not initiated, ¹ to obtrude into the mysteries of religion; and that, if the Philistines, for their irreverence to the ark, were treated with less rigour than the Bethshemites, it was because the former were not instructed in the laws of God, nor obliged to observe them.

It must be acknowledged, indeed, that there is a mistake in our translation, as well as in several others. Bethshemesh is a place of no great note in sacred history, and ² by Josephus it is called no more than a village; and therefore it is hardly conceivable, how it could contain such a number as fifty thousand and threescore and ten inhabitants, or why God, who is goodness itself, should make such a slaughter among those who received his ark with so much joy, and testified their gladness, by their oblation of sacrifices. To solve this difficulty, therefore, some have observed, that the words in the original, and according to their natural construction, stand thus:—He smote of the people ‘threescore and ten men, fifty thousand men;’ where there is plainly wanted some particle or other, to make the sense complete. They observe further, that if this is to be taken for a total sum, the order of the words is plainly inverted, and that the thousands should go before the inferior numbers, as is usual in all languages; and therefore, since there is a manifest defect in the copy, they think it not amiss to supply it with the particle mem, out of, which in many other instances is known to be omitted, and here makes the sense complete, namely, that of the people of Bethshemesh, for their irreverence to the ark, he smote ‘seventy men out of fifty thousand.’ For though fifty thousand men can hardly be supposed in so small a place; yet, upon hearing of the arrival of the ark, the country might flock in from other parts, and in a few days make up that number; and though possibly most of them might be guilty of the same profane rudeness, yet God, in his great clemency, might punish no more than seventy of them, and that on purpose to deter others from the like irreverence. ^a For it is not unlikely, that these people might hold the ark in more contempt, since the time that it had been conquered, as it were, and led captive by their enemies: and for this reason, God might the rather exert his vindictive arm, on purpose to teach them, that this symbol of his presence had lost none of its miraculous power, by the ill usage it had met with in its absence.

Upon the removal of the ark from Bethshemesh, ³ it is not unlikely that there was a general assembly of the elders of Israel, and that to prevent the like offence, the ceremony was performed with the greatest order and solemnity; but why it was not carried to Shiloh, and reposed in the tabernacle, the most probable opinion is, that after the death of Eli, the Philistines had destroyed the place, and the tabernacle was removed from thence to Nob, where it continued until the death of Samuel. As Kirjath-jearim therefore stood at no great distance, was a place of considerable strength, and had a remarkable eminence in it, proper for the reception of the ark, thither it was ordered to be removed for the present, with a design, no doubt, to have it restored to its ancient seat, at a convenient season: but through the neglect of religion, as well as the disturbance of the times, its removal was deferred from day to day: so that, though David first brought it to the house of Obededom, and then to his palace at Zion, yet we nowhere read ^b of its being replaced in the tabernacle any more.

When Samuel was highly displeased with the elders of Israel for desiring a king, and thereupon applied himself for advice, the answer which God returned him was this: ‘^c Harken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee; for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them.’ These are, no doubt, the words of an angry sovereign, resenting the slight upon his government, and the indignity done to his person; and therefore, to give a full answer to the objection, we shall first consider the nature of the government they were under, and of that which they desired, and from thence deduce the several aggravations of their guilt, in being so importunate for a change.

Josephus ^d in his book against Apion has these remarkable words: “Several nations have their several forms of government, and their diversities of customs. Some governments are committed to a single person, others to a certain number of select men, and others again to all the people in general; but our lawgiver,” says he, “has declared, that ours shall ^e be a theocracy,

^b The future history of this sacred ark is this. After the building of the temple at Jerusalem, Solomon had it removed from Zion, into a proper place that was consecrated for it, where it remained with all suitable respect, till the times of the latter kings of Judah, who gave themselves up to idolatry, and were not afraid to put the images of their gods in the holy place itself. Hereupon the priests, being unable to endure this profanation, took the ark, and carried it from place to place, that by this means it might escape the fury of these impious princes: but Josiah, who was a good man, and restored the true worship of God, commanded them to bring it back to the sanctuary, and forbade them to carry it into the country, as they had done. The Talmudists, however, have a tradition, that Solomon having learned by revelation, that the Assyrians would one day burn the temple, which he had lately built, and carry away all the rich materials which he had placed there, took care to have a private hole made under ground, where in case of necessity, he might conceal the most valuable things belonging to it from the knowledge of any enemies; and that Josiah, having a foresight of the calamities which were coming upon the Jewish nation, here hid the ark of the covenant, together with Aaron’s rod, the pot of manna, the high priest’s pectoral, and the holy oil; but that during the Babylonish captivity, the priests having lost all knowledge of the place where these things were concealed, they were never seen more, and were not in the second temple.—Calmet’s Dictionary, under the word Ark.

^c As God’s design in separating the Israelites from the rest of mankind, was to perpetuate the knowledge of himself, and the doctrine of his unity, amidst an idolatrous and polytheistic world; and has ascribed all rule and sovereign power to God alone." For though it was necessary, for the due execution of his commands, that there should be some visible minister between him and his people, such as Moses and Joshua were in the time of their administration; yet it is certain, that they never ordained any thing of moment without a special command from him. The same direction which was given Joshua, that 'he should stand before Eleazar the priest, who should ask counsel for him, after the judgment of Urim before the Lord,' was required of all other persons that presided in public affairs. ² In all cases of weighty concern, they were to have recourse to him, who always reserved to himself the sole power of establishing laws, and appointing magistrates, and making war. Nay, so very desirous was God to show himself to be King of the Hebrews, that there was no ensign of royalty belonging to earthly princes that, by his own appointment, was not provided for him, on purpose to engage the people's attention, (as the Commentator on Maimonides speaks,) and to make them perceive, that their King, who was the Lord of hosts, was in the midst of them.

^a There is without doubt an interpolation in the Hebrew text here, as fifty thousand is too great a number. Boothroyd and Dr Clark follow the reading of Josephus adopted by the author, and makes the whole number 70 men, while Dr Hales contends for the reading of the Syriac and Arabic versions, which have 5070 men. See Clarke and Boothroyd on the passage, and Hales’ Analysis, vol. ii, p. 304. ‘Seventy men out of a small place in a harvest day, was a great slaughter.’—Eip.

What design God Almighty had in constituting himself the King of this people, is evident from the instructions which he gives Moses; ' ³ Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel, ye have seen what I have done unto the Egyptians, and how I bore you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people; for all the earth is mine, and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation.'

No government can certainly be imagined more happy, more safe, more free, more honourable, than that wherein the fountain of all wisdom and power, of all justice and goodness, presides; and therefore the least that we can say of the Israelites, in desiring to change this form for such a one as was in use in the nations round about them, that is, for an absolute and despotic government, where the princes were tyrants, and the subjects all slaves, argues at least a great pitch of folly and indiscretion, a baseness of mind, an ingratitude of temper, a spirit of rebellion, and a secret attachment to the idolatrous practices of those people, whose king they were so eager to imitate. For, 'make us a king to judge us,' was equivalent in their mouths, as 'one expresses it, to what their forefathers demanded of Aaron, 'make us gods that they may go before us; because in this manner, he who best knew the secrets of their hearts, in his answer to Samuel, has expounded their meaning: 'They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them; according to all the works which they have done, since the day that I brought them up out of Egypt, even unto this day, they have forsaken me, and served other gods.'

We have but one thing more to remark upon this subject, and that is, that the manner in which they demanded a king, was no less culpable than the ends they proposed by it: for instead of consulting God upon an affair of this consequence, they went hastily to Samuel, and when, by fair remonstrances, he is attempting to dissuade them from so dangerous an enterprise, they turn impetuously upon him, and say, 'nay, but we will have a king;' and this may be the reason perhaps why God gave them one in his anger, descended of the meanest tribe in Israel, and of the meanest family in that tribe, to show them, that he himself was not satisfied with their proceedings, nor could be pleased with any thing that was extorted from him by undutiful importunities.

The meanness of Saul's family indeed was the reason that some, who were present at his election, openly despised him, and said, ' ⁶ How can this man save us?' And therefore it is not unlikely, that as these seditious men refused to submit to his government, he might leave the public affairs in Samuel's hands, and return to his father's house, and there live privately, until some opportunity of better establishing his authority should happen to present itself. But even in this interval, supposing he did betake himself to some rural employment; yet where is the great disparagement of this, when we find the same done in other nations, by persons of the like rank and quality? When we find your Curii, your Attilii, your Cincinatti, and several other illustrious Romans, leaving the plough to assume the reins of government, and afterwards leaving the government to return to the plough.

It must be acknowledged, however, that Saul's external qualifications, namely, the stature and comeliness of his person, was no small recommendation to a people who desired a king, such as their neighbours had. For whatever we may think of the matter, the people of the east had always a regard to these in the choice of their kings; and accordingly Herodotus, having taken a review of Xerxes's whole army, after a short pause declares himself thus; 'that ⁷ among such a multitude of people there was not one, who, for tallness and goodness of person, did deserve the throne so much as he;' and in another place assures us, 'that ⁸ the Ethiopians always esteemed him who was of the most advantageous stature, the fittest to be chosen king;' which cannot but remind us of what Samuel says to the people when he so was he pleased to stand in two arbitrary relations towards them, in that of a tutelar deity and protector, and in that of a supreme magistrate and lawgiver; besides the natural relation in which he stood towards them and all other nations in common: but how long this theocracy continued among the Jews, the learned are not so well agreed; some thinking, that from the first commencement of regal power, or especially from its settlement in the line of David, it ceased, as God's words to Samuel seem to import, 'they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them,' 1 Sam. viii. 7. Whilst others imagine, that from God's first espousing the cause of the Israelites, in the time of their tribulation in Egypt, even to the coming of his blessed Son our Saviour Christ in the flesh, it all along subsisted, though with some abatements, sometimes with seeming interruptions; and to this they apply that famous prophecy of Jacob, 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor the lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come,' Gen. xlix. 10: that is, the theocracy shall continue over the Jews, until Christ come to take possession of his father's kingdom. For what lawgiver was there ever in Judah, until the coming of Christ, but God, by the ministry of Moses.—*Opinions of several Theologians, letter 7. presents Saul to them: ¹ See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen, that there is none like him among the people; for the historian hath told us before, that ² from his shoulders and upwards, he was higher than any of the people.³

Nay, had I leisure to gratify the curious, I might show, that not only in the east, but in the western and most polite countries, this tallness of stature, and gracefulness of appearance were always deemed no unbecoming qualifications for the regal dignity; and therefore we find Pliny, who certainly was a fine speaker, and knew how to single out the proper qualities in any great man, telling his audience, in his panegyric to Trajan, that “the strength and tallness of his body, the nobleness of his aspect, the dignity of his countenance, and the gracefulness of his speech, did everywhere denote and proclaim the prince.” As on the contrary, what notions the ancients had of a prince of a low stature, and mean appearance, we may gather from the fine which ⁴ Plutarch tells us the Lacedemonians set upon their king, for marrying a little woman, who was likely to bring ‘not kings, but kinglings,’ to reign over them.

It must be remembered, however, that tallness of stature was not the only thing that recommended Saul to the kingdom. His father is said to have been ⁵ ‘a mighty man of power;’ which though it may not signify his great wealth, and interest in his country, because ⁶ Saul himself declares the contrary, yet it doubtless denotes his strength, and courage, and fortitude of mind, which in a great measure he transmitted to his son. For who in war was more brave and undaunted than he, had he but known how to use his victories as well as acquire them? But here was his great misfortune, that when he was successful, he was too apt to be unmindful of what God had enjoined him. Who in peace was more prudent and politic than he, till his fears and jealousies of David, mixed with an unhappy temper of blood, made him malicious and implacable? Nothing can be supposed more wise and discreet, than his ⁷ ‘holding his peace,’ and taking no notice of the slights which were put upon him at his first election; nothing more great and generous, than his answer to some who would have prompted him to revenge, after he had established his throne by a glorious conquest; ⁸ ‘There shall not a man be put to death this day; for to-day the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel.’

Nothing certainly was more different, than Saul’s modestly declining the offer of a kingdom; when elected, passing by indignities, and returning to a private life; when called out to action, mastering his forces, leading out his armies, vanquishing his enemies, relieving his friends: and when settled in peace, forgiving injuries, and conferring benefits; and the same Saul, sullen and discontented with himself, false to his promises, jealous of his friends, listening to sycophants, quarrelling with his relations, attempting the life of his own son, murdering a whole city of God’s priests, and instead of consulting the divine oracle, flying to the devil for advice in his distress; and therefore we need less wonder, that we find the beginning of his reign so prosperous, and the latter part of it ending in so sad a catastrophe.

Whether Saul deserved this fate or no, we may best perceive by a review of some instances wherein he is said to have offended God. In the beginning of the third year of his reign, the Philistines raised so powerful an army against him, that his own forces for fear of them, deserted in great numbers. Gilgal was the place of their rendezvous, and Samuel, who had hitherto transacted matters between God and Saul, had given him assurance, that in seven days’ time, he would come thither, ⁹ ‘to offer sacrifices and peace-offerings, and to show him what he was to do;’ but, as Abarbanel has observed, every one of these articles he transgressed. For, besides that he distrusted Samuel’s word, or thought it scorn perhaps, that the king should stay for a prophet, instead of waiting till the appointed days were expired, he called for the sacrifices on the seventh morning; instead of ordering a proper person to officiate, himself adventured to offer up the sacrifice; and instead of inquiring of God in a regular way, he was determined to begin the war without any previous consultations: so that, in this behaviour of his, there were all the signs of pride and ingratitude, impatience and distrust, neglect of God, contempt of his prophet, and an apparent invasion of the priestly office; upon which accounts Samuel declares, that ¹⁰ God would reject him, and not continue the kingdom in his family.

God, no doubt, by his divine omniscience, foresaw what other sins Saul would commit, and might therefore without any breach of his mercy, have pronounced a peremptory sentence against him; but the passage before us implies no such thing. It is no more than a threat, or a simple denunciation of what God would do, if he were not more observant for the future, and might have been revoked, had he not persisted in his disobedience, and committed a much greater offence against the divine Majesty in the war against Amalek.

The opposition which these people gave the Israelites, while they were on their journey to the land of Canaan, provoked God to such a degree, that, as the historian relates the matter, he swore, that ¹¹ ‘he would have war with Amalek from generation to generation;’ and therefore commanded Moses ‘to write it, for a memorial, in a book, and to rehearse it in the ears of Joshua, that he would utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven: and when they were upon the point of entering upon the promised land, they were reminded of the same divine decree against that wicked people: ¹² ‘Remember what Amalek did unto thee by the way, when ye were come forth out of Egypt, how he met thee by the way, and smote the hindmost of thee, even all that were feeble behind thee, when thou wast faint and weary, and he feared not God. therefore it shall be, when the Lord thy God hath given thee rest from all thine enemies round about in the land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it, that thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven; thou shalt not forget it.’ In this passage we have some reasons assigned, why God was so highly incensed against the Amalekites.¹³ They were descendants of Esau, and therefore by pedigree, were allied to the Israelites, and of the stock of Abraham. ¹ They seem to have broke off with the Edomites very early, and to have joined themselves with the old Horites, a nest of idolaters, that lived on Mount Seir; and so turned apostates from the religion of Abraham. These apostates were the first that drew the sword against the Israelites, who were their brethren in blood, and without any manner of provocation, took the advantage, and came upon their rear, while they were feeble, faint, and weary, which was not only a great inhumanity, but done with an intent to defeat God's design in bringing up the people of Israel, and to hinder, if possible, their entrance into Canaan; for which reason the impiety of these people is particularly taken notice of, namely, ² that they feared not God, but that their hand was lifted up against the throne of the Lord, against the throne of the God of Abraham, their father, which was no small aggravation of their crime. It was for these reasons, then, that God had determined to destroy the whole race of Amalek, and had made choice of Saul to put his decree in execution: and if, to indulge his own covetousness, he thought proper to prevaricate in the matter, he became guilty of the like sin (to use the words of the learned Dr Jackson) "as if a judge or inferior magistrate, being intrusted to do justice in a matter unto which his sovereign had peremptorily and determinately sworn, should upon a bribe, or other sinister respect, neglect his duty, and, as much as in him lay, make his master forsworn." And as a judge that would dare to do this, deserves more deaths than one; so, considering the infinite difference between God and man, and the long train of wickedness which Saul afterwards ran into, the severity can hardly be thought excessive, in God's punishing his contempt of this great command, by the alienation of the crown from his family.

"But why should the Amalekites, for offences committed by their forefathers so many years before, deserve this punishment? Or suppose they did, why should young children and infants suffer as guilty, for the crimes of their parents?" Our blessed Saviour, in a case somewhat like this, has helped us to a solution of the former part of this question, when he tells the Jews of his time, that ³ they built the sepulchres of the prophets, which their fathers had killed: that in so doing, they allowed or approved of their deeds: and that therefore the blood of all the prophets, which had been shed from the foundation of the world, should be required of that generation. ⁴ From whence we may draw this inference,—That when any particular people commit the same crimes that their ancestors did; when they approve of them, when they imitate them, and, by the like actions, declare, that if they were in their circumstances, they would pursue the same steps, they are justly punishable, even in virtue of the sentence which passed upon their ancestors; and that the divine suspension of that sentence, in order to try whether they would reform and amend, is so far from being an hardship, that the longer it is continued, the more it is an instance of God's mercy, and patience, and long-suffering.

Now, whoever looks into the conduct of the descendants of these old Amalekites, and considers the several oppressions which occasioned the exploits of Ehud, Gideon, Jephthah, and Saul, will soon perceive, that these later generations were every moment renewing the rancour and hostilities of their forefathers against the children of Israel, and consequently were very justly comprised under the sentence which had originally passed upon them.

⁵ Children indeed shall not be put to death for their fathers: but this prohibition, we must observe relates to men, and not to God. ⁶ Men, when they put a child to death for the sin of his father, assume an authority that they have no right to. The law which authorizes them to punish the father, gives them no power over the life of the child, ⁷ but God is sovereign Lord and Master of the lives of both. Men who kill the child, to aggravate the punishment of the father can give the child no equivalent for the loss of his life; but God, in the future dispensation of things, can render him an ample compensation for it: and therefore, since in a general devastation, whether of war, famine, or pestilence, without a divine interposition for every particular person, the innocent must necessarily suffer with the guilty, it is satisfaction enough to think, that these innocent persons do not finally perish when they die, but are thenceforward taken under God's immediate care, and in the world to come, will find their retribution. ⁸ Those, of all others who die, in their infancy, in what manner soever it be, have reason to bless God, what grief soever it may give their parents, for being delivered out of the miseries of this life, in order to be made happy in another.

Several of the Jewish doctors are of opinion, that after the death of Eli and his sons, Samuel, by God's particular election, succeeded to the high priest's office; and this they are the rather induced to believe, because they read of his offering sacrifices in places distinct from the tabernacle; of his wearing an ephod, which was a vestment peculiar to the priest; of his consecrating two kings, Saul and David; and find ⁹ the Psalmist placing him among persons of that order and distinction. But the more probable opinion is, that he was no more than a Levite, and, by birth, incapable of the priesthood, which was only annexed to Aaron's family; that there is no mention made in Scripture of his having any particular designation to that office; that there is no reason to think, that God would break through his own laws and ordinances, in favour of him, when there was no occasion for it, since Hophni and Phinehas, when they died, ¹⁰ might have sons of sufficient age to succeed them; that his putting on an ephod, was no more than what David did; his sacrificing from the tabernacle, what Gideon and Saul did; and his anointing kings, what both Elias and Elisha did: so that these little incidents of his life could never give him that character. And though it be granted that the Psalmist has thought proper to place him in company with Moses and Aaron, yet, at the same time, he has taken care to point us out the difference between them; Moses and Aaron among the priests, and Samuel 'among such as call upon his name,' that is, who sing God's praise, which was the common employment of the Levites. Put the case, then, that Samuel was no priest, yet it seems to be a privilege indulged to some great men, upon some extraordinary occasions, to offer sacrifices, where there was neither the tabernacle, nor any altar, but what they themselves erected. Thus ¹ Gideon and Manoah both, by the directions of an angel, made their burnt-offerings just by their own habitations, and upon no other altar than a rock; and yet, that they were accepted by God, is evident from the miraculous fire that did consume them.

⁵ A God, indeed, in a law given to the Jews, threatens that he will punish the children for their fathers' iniquity: but God hath the highest right of authority both over our affairs as well as our life, since it is but his gift, which he, without any cause, and at any period, can take from man when he pleaseth.—Grotius on the Right of War, vol. 2.

⁶ It is generally supposed, but without any grounds that the exercise of the high priest's function was not entered upon till such an age; and that Eli's grand-children were not as yet qualified for it: but Josephus (Antiq. b. 15. c. 2.) informs us, that Aristobulus the brother of Mariamne, was both admitted into that place, and officiated in it, when he was no more than seventeen years old.—Culmei's Commentary, on 1 Sam. xxv. 1.

In most countries, indeed, the priesthood was a privilege annexed to the regal dignity, and even in the Jewish economy, where the sacerdotal office was distinct. Thus David, upon the reduction of the ark, sacrificed oxen and fatlings,² and Solomon, in the beginning of his reign, and before the temple was built, sacrificed in high places.³ But there is much more to be said for Samuel: he lived in a place that was an academy of the prophets, and whither much people resorted to be instructed in the law. Shiloh was now laid desolate, and the ark, which was the tabernacle's chief furniture, was separated from it; so that till God had declared his choice of some other place, the people were, in a great measure, at liberty where to offer their devotions; and Samuel more especially, in a city of so great concourse, and where he himself presided, was obliged in conscience to provide the people in the best manner he could, with a public place of worship. He himself did but rarely, and upon extraordinary occasions, officiate in the sacrifice, yet that, whenever he did it, he did it with the acceptance and approbation of God, is plain from the testimony of Scripture, and the success which God gave him against his enemies, after he had performed such an act of devotion: for thus the account is,⁴ 'And Samuel took a sucking lamb, and offered it for a burnt-offering wholly unto the Lord; and Samuel cried unto the Lord for Israel, and the Lord heard him, and the Lord thundered with a great thunder on that day upon the Philistines, and discomfited them, and they were smitten before Israel.'

^a The Jews themselves acknowledge, that a prophet is not subject to the ceremonial law, but may, at any time, himself sacrifice in what place he pleases: and therefore, when Samuel went to Bethlehem to anoint David, it cannot be questioned, but that he had a right to sacrifice there, though there was neither ark nor tabernacle in the place; nor can it be denied, but that one part of his errand was to offer the sacrifice which he carried along with him. He had indeed an affair of greater consequence to transact at the same time; but I cannot see under what obligation he was to discover that. ⁵ Secrecy is of great use in all important negotiations, and the concealing of one design, under the umbrage of another is as just and laudable a practice, as the drawing of a curtain to keep out spies. Acts of religion indeed are sometimes made cloaks for iniquity; but it is hard to conceive, what possible prevarication there could be, in performing one act of obedience towards God, in order to facilitate the performance of another. The short of the matter is, when there are two ends of any action, as there were in the case now before us, a man may, without any injury to truth, declare the one, and conceal the other; nor can any imputation justly fall upon God, for suggesting an expedient to his servant, in the execution of which there confessedly was no sin.

And for the same reason, because it was by God's direction, or the instigation of his Holy Spirit, that Samuel cut Agag in pieces, we cannot say that this resentment carried him beyond the bounds of respect that was due to his sovereign. Agag had been a bloody tyrant, and was now cut off; not for the sins of his ancestors only, but for his own merciless cruelty. His death had been predicted above 400 years before,⁶ by the prophet Balaam; but Saul, out of a mistimed compassion, and in opposition to the express commands of God, had thought proper to spare him. Here therefore was a fit occasion for Samuel to exert himself, and notwithstanding the presence of his prince, to vindicate the honour of his God, by expressing a zeal suitable to ⁷ that of Phineas, in slaying Zimri, or of that noble band of Levites,⁸ who destroyed the worshippers of the golden calf, though it does not necessarily follow, that he slew him himself,⁹ because what he commanded might be called his own act, though it was nevertheless done by the public executioner of justice.

Some commentators have been so far carried away with the manner of the Scripture expression, viz., that ¹⁰ 'an evil spirit from the Lord troubled Saul,' as to think that he was really possessed with a devil, which at certain times came strongly upon him, and threw him into all the mad fits whereof we read: but it should be considered, that the word 'spirit,' in the sacred language, is of a very extensive signification, and denotes frequently, not only the dispositions of the mind,¹¹ but those of the body likewise; that the custom of the Jews was to imagine, that every affliction, whose cause they were ignorant of, proceeded immediately from God; and that it is a very common thing to find the Scripture phrase accommodating itself to this vulgar prejudice. Now, in our interpretation of Scripture, this I think should be a rule:—That when a passage is capable of two senses, whereof the one supposes a miracle, and the other a natural event only, the latter should take place, especially when there are no circumstances to determine us to the contrary. But now in the case before us,¹² the frequent access of Saul's malady, the symptoms that attended it, and the remedy made use of to assuage it, do sufficiently denote, that it proceeded from a deep melancholy, or black bile inflamed; and that the man was hypochondriac, rather than possessed. Agreeable to this bad complexion of body was the natural temper of his mind, which through his whole conduct was suspicious, diffident, cruel, passionate, and vindictive. Add to this, that the remorse of his conscience, the menaces of Samuel, God's rejection of him, and his continual apprehensions of being either dethroned or put to death, by his competitor, confirmed still more and more the evil dispositions which his temper engendered, and carried them by fits into downright madness: and as madness is occasioned by an atrabilious humour highly inflamed, and diffused through the blood, and from melancholic vapours which ascend to the brain and make an alteration in its temperature, it is no hard matter to conceive, that the agreeable sound of a musical instrument, which occasions joy and self-complacency, should dissipate these bad humours, and make the blood and spirits return to their equal and natural motion.

What the power of music is, to sweeten the temper, and allay and compose the passions of the mind, we have some examples from sacred history, but many more from the profane. As this same Saul was returning from Samuel, he met, at the place which is called ¹ 'the hill of God,' a company of prophets, playing on several instruments; and such was the effect of their melody, 'that the Spirit,' as the Scripture expresses it, 'came upon him, and he was turned into another man.' When Elisha was desired by Jehoshaphat, to tell him what his success against the king of Moab would be, the prophet required a minstrel to be brought unto him, ² 'and when the minstrel played, (it is said) that the hand of the Lord came upon him: ³ not that we are to suppose, that the gift of prophecy was the natural effect of music, but the meaning is, that music disposed the organs, the humours, the blood, and in short the whole mind and spirit of the prophet, to receive the supernatural impression. The truth is, common experience, as well as the testimony of the gravest authors, does prove, that there is in music a certain charm, to revive the spirits, mellow the humours, allay the passions, and consequently, to dissipate that rage, or melancholy, which either fumes up into the brain in vapours, or overspreads the heart with grief and dejection. We need less wonder, therefore, that we find ⁴ the Pythagoreans, whenever they perceived, either in themselves or others, any violent passion beginning to arise, immediately betaking themselves either to their flute or guitar; that we find ⁵ Theophrastus declaring that music is an excellent remedy against several distempers, both of the mind and body; ⁶ others, that Asclepiades, a renowned physician among the ancients, was used to cure madness by the power of symphony; and ⁷ others again, that the most violent poison, that of the sting of the tarantula, has been expelled very frequently by this means. The only remaining difficulty is, how David, with his single harp, and unassisted with any other instruments, could effect such a cure upon Saul? And to satisfy this, I must be obliged to inquire a little into the nature of the Jewish music which was possibly in vogue at that time.

Music, though an art of no necessity to human life, was certainly of a very early invention. Before the deluge, Jubal is called the father, or master of those who played upon the harp, and ^a ancient organ, as the two Hebrew words ⁸ in that place are generally translated. In the time of Jacob, we find his father-in-law complaining of him, ⁹ that he had stolen away from him, and not given him an opportunity of dismissing him honourably, with mirth, and with song, with tabret, and with harp.

¹⁰ Moses, upon his passage over the Red Sea, composed a song, which was sung in parts by himself, at the head of the men, and by ¹¹ his sister, with timbrels and dancing, leading up the women. Samuel, upon his institution of the schools of the prophets, introduced several kinds of music: so that before Saul's election to the kingdom, ¹² we read of the psaltery, and tabret, the pipe, and the harp, in use among them. The kings of the east made it a point of their grandeur and magnificence, to have men to play to them upon several occasions; and therefore we may suppose, that Saul, when he came to the throne, in some reasonable time, conformed to the mode. David, who was himself a great master of music, kept in his house ¹³ some companies of singing men and singing women, as the words of old Barzillai seem to imply; and Solomon, who denied his heart no pleasure, came not behind his father in this respect; for he had his ¹⁴ men-singers and women-singers likewise, and musical instruments of all sorts. Josephus tells us, that he had made four hundred thousand, merely for the use of the temple; and therefore we may well suppose, that he had no small variety of them, for the use of the musicians that attended his person.

M. Le Clerc seems to be of opinion, that the music of the ancient Hebrews was not very regular: "They were a nation," says he, "entirely given to agriculture, and had neither theatres nor any public diversions of this kind; all the use which they made of their music, consisted in singing some sacred hymns, which David instituted; but we have no reason to think, that their performances of this kind were either harmonious or methodical;" but now the learned Kircher has confuted all this. For ¹⁵ "it is not probable," says he, "that such an innumerable quantity of musical instruments, made by the most skillful hands, should serve only to produce some rude and artificial sounds. Among the Hebrews there was certainly a wonderful order of songs and chanters, a wonderful distribution of the singers, and a wonderful agreement of words fitted to harmonious notes; neither is it likely that all the instruments of one choir, did perform their parts in unison, but that they made a various harmony, with an admirable and accurate contexture of the upper parts with their respective basses."

But suppose we, as some imagine, that they wanted the harmony of a concert, or several parts of music going on at the same time; yet it is much to be questioned, whether that simplicity of composition, which resembles nature most, is not a greater beauty and perfection than that combination of several voices and tunes, which constitutes our concerts. For, to use the words of another author, in a science wherein I profess to be no adept, "The ancients," says he, "had as great a number of instruments as we; they had their symphonies, and voices of all sorts, as well as we; but then they had this advantage above us, that their singing voices and instruments neither drowned the words nor destroyed the sense of what they sung. While their ears were charmed with the melody, and their hearts touched with the delicacy of the song, their minds were transported with the beauty of the words, with the liveliness, grandeur, or tenderness of the sentiments. So that, at one and the same time, they had all the pleasurable impressions and sensations that the most exact imagery of thoughts and sentiments, joined with symphony, or a true harmony, could produce in their breasts;" and for this reason, it is rightly supposed by Josephus, that while David played upon his harp, he sung psalms and hymns to king Saul, whose words very probably were adapted to the occasion, and that both these put together were conducive to his cure; though God without doubt, who gave a blessing to his endeavours, was the principal cause of the removal of the malady.

That David's skill in playing upon the harp, in a great measure removed Saul's melancholy, is manifest from his retiring from court to his father's house, and betaking himself to his usual occupation of a shepherd. How long he continued with his father, the Scripture is silent: but a short time might be sufficient to impair the king's remembrance of him, especially when he appeared in another dress than what he wore at court, and was just now come off rough from a journey. He had played to the king indeed, and happily relieved his disorder: but who knows, but that he then wore an habit proper for his profession as a musician, and, as clothes make a great alteration in a man, appeared now quite another creature in his plain shepherd's garb? Who knows, but that the minister, whoever he was, that recommended him to the king, finding that his music proved medicinal to him, might take the freedom to send to his father, and request that his son might continue a little longer at court, even without the king's knowledge or direction? And it seems not unlikely, that the office of armour-bearer, whatever it imported, was a place of honour and respect, more than strict duty and attendance, because we find David sometimes retiring to his father's house, as not obliged always to reside at court.

Without our supposing then, as some commentators have done, that Saul's distemper had disturbed his head, and impaired his memory, we need but consider the humour and fashions of a court, the hurry of business, the multitude of servants, the variety of faces, and the shoals of comers and goers, that are every day seen there; and withal, consider the momentous issue of a battle lost or won, and what full employ the king or his chief commander must have for all his thought and attention, when an army is drawn up in array, and ready to engage; and then we may easily account both for Saul and Abner's wanting recollection, when they saw David disguised in his shepherd's coat, and now entering upon an action that was quite contrary to the character of a musician.

But after all, the words in the text say nothing of Saul's forgetfulness of David, or that he inquired who he was. They only intimate, that he was ignorant of his family, and desired to be informed from what parent he was descended; and considering how many servants there are in every court, especially in a lower station, whose pedigree the king knows nothing of, and how apt we are all to forget the names of those that live at a distance, as Jesse did from Saul, and with whom we hold little or no intercourse, we need not much wonder, that Saul, who had no concern for David's family before this adventure, should quite forget the name of his father, living in another country, and which he had cursorily heard perhaps, but never once fixed in his mind: but now that the son was going upon a desperate enterprise, and was to have great riches, as well as the king's daughter, if he came off victorious, it did not a little behove the king to know something more of the parentage of this young champion, and into what family he was to match his daughter: and upon this presumption, there is no madness, no absurdity, no incongruity, in his bidding Abner to inquire whose son the stripling is. "It is a brave and gallant youth. I am charmed with his behaviour. If he falls in the attempt, he shall have an honourable interment; if he succeeds, and slays the giant, he shall be my son-in-law."^a

The Jews give a very romantic reason for David's going to Achish, the king of the Philistines, namely, that it was to demand an execution of the treaty, whereby the conqueror was to have a sovereign power and dominion over the conquered, which Goliath proposed when he challenged the Israelites; and that upon this account, the chief ministers about that king were so alarmed at his arrival, "Is not this David, the king of this our land?"^b as some take the words. It is apparent, however, from the context, that the land, to which these words relate, is Judea, and that David, at this time, was in no condition to make any high demands.

Saul's rancour and rage against him were so implacable, and now that so many were turned informers against him, his power to apprehend him was become so great, that there was no staying any longer in his dominions;

^a The suppositions of our author to account for Saul's inquiry who David was, after we are told in the text, that he had been made Saul's armour-bearer, and had played for a time before him, is perhaps the best that could be made in the circumstances, but is by no means satisfactory. In fact, the whole account in the text is so incoherent, that we can hardly record it as a part of the original. Accordingly we find, that in the Septuagint, ver. 12—31, ver. 41 and ver. 54 to the end of chap. xvii. are wanting, as also, verses 1—5, 9, 10, 11, 17, 18, 19, of chap. xviii.; and if the narrative is read, omitting the verses, it will be seen that nothing is wanting to complete the sense, and make it connected. These verses are all wanting in the Vatican copy of the Septuagint; and though they are found in the Codex Alexandrinus, Kennicott has shown, that, in all probability, they were not there till Origen inserted them. See Kennicott's Gen. Diss. p. 9, and Pilkinton's remarks on this passage. Michaelis, Dathic, Houbigant, Boothroyd, Dr A. Clarke, and other critics, consent that these passages are interpolated. Dr Clarke has quoted a considerable part of Kennicott's remarks, and some most judicious observations will be found in Boothroyd's English Translation, and also in his Hebrew Bible.—Ed.

and therefore David's business was to find out some safe retreat. All the other neighbouring princes were at peace with Saul, and must have delivered him up, had Saul demanded him. Achish was the only one in hostility with him, and therefore his kingdom the most proper place for David's refuge, where, though he might not hope to lie long concealed, yet he might nevertheless promise himself kind quarter, from the advantages that would accrue to Achish, in attaching to his interest a person that was evidently the strength of the Jewish, and terror of the Philistine, army. Had was the fate of David, it must be owned, when he was forced to fly for protection to those whom he had reason to believe were his bitterest enemies; but many great men have been compelled to the same thing; Themistocles to go over to the Persians, and Alcibiades to the Lacedemonians, without turning apostates to the interest of their country.

Self-preservation is one of the first laws of nature, and therefore, if David, when he came to the court of Achish, found his life in manifest danger, I cannot see why he might not make use of any means, consistent with a good conscience for the preservation of it. He chose to personate the fool, because he presumed that Achish would readily conclude, that the troubles he had suffered under Saul's persecution of him, had stupified his senses, and turned his head. But he was not the last wise man who put on that disguise; for ¹ did not Solon, when he found that the Athenians were going to surrender Salamine, his native country, into the hands of the people of Megara, counterfeited the madman, that he might with more impunity take the freedom to divert them from it? And ² Lucius Brutus, that wise imitator of the fool, as he is called, made use of the same artifice, to escape the suspicion of Tarquin, who had already murdered his father and eldest brother, in order to seize on their great riches.

But supposing that there were no examples of other wise men to countenance this practice of David's; yet wherever did we read, in the word of God, that stratagems were not allowable against an enemy? When the Israelites besieged Ai, God himself gave them orders to make a feint, as though they fled, that they might thereby draw the people out of the city; and can the difference be so great, in pretending to a want of courage, and in counterfeiting a deprivation of reason? A divine direction indeed was in the one, and we do not read that it was in the other case; but why might not God, who had David always under his immediate care and protection, put him upon this expedient, as the only escape he had for his life? Or if the expedient was matter of his own invention, since the circumstances he was in did absolutely require it, it cannot deserve our blame, according to that common distich, that goes under no less a name than Cato's:

Insipiens esto, cum tempus postulat, aut res;

Stultitiam simulare loco, prudentia summa est. a

This might be some apology for David's conduct at th's critical juncture, supposing that he personated the fool or madman. But if we look into the Scripture count of this transaction a little more narrowly, we may possibly perceive, that David did not dissemble or act a part upon this occasion, but that he was really seized with a distemper; and that distemper, in all probability, was an epilepsy, or falling-sickness.

For whereas it is said of David, that ³ he was struck to the heart (for so it should be rendered) at the words which the officers of Achish said to their master, and thereupon was sore afraid of the king, lest, at their instigation, he should put him to death; ⁴ nothing is known to cause an epilepsy sooner ⁵ than a sudden and violent fright. Whereas it is said in our translation, that ⁶ he changed his behaviour before them; the words in the Hebrew are 'his taste,' whereby some understand his reason, 'was changed;' but the Septuagint seem to have hit upon the right sense, 'his visage, or countenance, was changed;' for every one knows what a sudden alteration a fit of this distemper occasions in any one's looks. Whereas it is said in our translation, that he 'feigned himself mad in their hands,' the Septuagint render it, 'he trembled, and was convulsed in his hands,' as having no power to direct their motions, which is another known effect of an epilepsy. Whereas, again, our translation says, 'that he scrambled, or according to the marginal note, made marks 'upon the doors of the gate,' the Septuagint render the words, 'he fell down against the door of the gate, and the Hebrew word tava implies, with such force and violence, as even to leave marks or prints upon them; so that he could not but bruise and hurt himself very much by these falls. Nor is this all; for there is something in the words of Achish, if we will but adhere to the version of the Septuagint, that shows David's distemper to have been the falling-sickness, beyond all controversy. For, whereas our translation is, 'Lo, you see the man is mad, wherefore then have you brought him to me? I have no need of madmen;' the words of the Septuagint are, 'Why did ye bring this man before me? Ye see that he is in an epilepsy, and epileptic men I do not want. Why then did ye bring him to be taken with a fit in my presence?' Had David all this while been only playing the fool, as our translation makes him, he might possibly have given Achish some diversion (as ⁷ fools in great houses were often kept to give diversion) by his awkward or frantic tricks; ⁸ but the horror wherewith the king was struck at the first sight of him, and his indignation against his officers, for bringing him into his presence, are enough to make one believe, that his distemper had made him a frightful object: and therefore the king commanded immediately to have him removed out of his presence, and out of the palace.

Upon the whole, therefore, we may conclude, that as David had the true symptoms of an epilepsy upon him, which, in all probability, was occasioned by a violent fright; God, in his good providence, might permit this distemper to befall him at this juncture, in order to facilitate his escape out of the hands of Achish, and as soon as the danger was over, restored him to his former health again. For this reason we find him, in those psalms, which he is thought to have composed upon this occasion, alluding both to the nature of his distemper, and to God's goodness, in preserving him in it, and delivering him from it: ¹ 'Great are the troubles of the righteous; but the Lord delivereth him out of them all. He keepeth all his bones; so that none of them is broken;' and therefore ² 'unto thee, O God, will I pay my vows, unto thee will I give thanks; for thou hast delivered my soul from death, and my feet from falling, that I may walk before God in the light of the living.'

David, upon his escape from the court of Achish, not knowing of any other place of retreat, betook himself to the cave of Adullam, where he found it necessary to provide for his security, by putting himself upon some foot of defence. Jonathan, from full conviction, had told him, (as himself from frequent experience had found,) that his father, at all adventures, would endeavour to take away his life. His family by this time were fallen under the displeasure of Saul, and were in danger of being all cut off (as lately were the priests of Nob) under pretence of a conspiracy against him; and therefore it is no wonder, that his brethren, having this apprehension of danger before their eyes, resorted to him for their own security; no wonder, that in ^a times of national discord, refugees of all kinds, either through their private wants, or the oppression of their enemies, a disaffection to the government, or a zeal for the next successor, should flock to David: nor was David any ways blamable, for receiving them, ³ since we have abundant reason to presume, that he took none under his protection, but such as were forced to fly from Saul's injustice and oppression, nor screened any debtors, but such as were under a real inability to satisfy their creditors, and were therefore necessitated either to leave their country or lose their liberty. The submission and discipline wherein he kept his people, and the high notions of respect and reverence which he always infused into them, for the government and person of the king, are an ample testimony that he meditated no defection or revolt; and the debtors whom he secured from cruel prosecutions or slavery, he put in a condition to pay their creditors, by leading them against the enemies of Israel, from whom, in several expeditions, they returned laden with rich spoils.

There is one part, however, of David's conduct, that cannot so well be vindicated; and that is, what passed between him and Achish, upon his second retreat to his court. We may suppose, indeed, that during this interval, an alliance was made between Achish and him, (though the sacred historian makes no mention of it,) and that this new ally, hearing how violently Saul persecuted him, might in hopes of making the breach wider, and of exasperating David against him, voluntarily invite him into his dominions; but certainly we cannot but say, that David should by no means have gone. God had expressly commanded him by his prophet to return into the tribe of Judah, and, at the same time, gave him assurance, that he would be his safeguard and protector. It was therefore an apparent diffidence of God's providence, which had been so long employed in his preservation, to make an enemy's country the place of his refuge; and a breach it was of truth and fidelity to his new ally, to make him believe that he was fighting against his foes, when all the while he was destroying his confederates.

But what can we say for his conduct, when he joins forces with the enemies of his country, takes the field with them, promises to act offensively, and looks upon it as a kind of slight and indignity to be dismissed? ⁴ 'What have I done,' says he to Achish, 'that I may not go fight against the enemies of my lord the king?' One would really suspect, by his asking the question, that he had an intention, not unlike that of the famous Martius Cariolanus, who, to revenge himself of the ingratitude of his country, joined with the Volsci to destroy it. But if his intention was either to stand neuter, or to turn against the Philistines in the day of battle, his perfidy and ingratitude to Achish must be open and conspicuous.

In short how well soever we may wish David's character, there is no vindicating his conduct in this particular. Which party soever he had taken, he must have been culpable; and one party he must have taken, had not Providence so timely interposed to preserve his honour, without injuring his conscience. However, if we would suppose any thing in extenuation of his fault, we must represent to ourselves a fugitive, pursued by a formidable enemy, and every moment in danger of falling into his hands; this fugitive kindly received at a foreign court, and protected by a prince that was in hostility with his persecutor; this prince expecting of his refugee, in consideration of the favours he had conferred on him, that he should attend him to the war, and espouse his cause against their common enemy; and all this while the other bound in gratitude not to be unceiv, and considering the dangerous situation of his own affairs, not daring to discover his real purposes. If we imagine this, I say, we must allow, that if in any case, what they call a finesse in policy were allowable, it was in this of David's, when he had unhappily brought himself into these circumstances.

^a Though there be no comparison between the proceedings of a very righteous and a very wicked man, David and Catiline, yet it may not be amiss, upon this occasion, to take notice of what Sallust says of Manlius, Catiline's agent and ambassador. In Etruria Manlius was engaged in collecting those individuals who, oppressed by poverty and grief in having by the tyranny of Sylla lost their property and effects, were become desirous of revolution: robbers also of every description, and in no scant numbers, flocked around his standard, &c. It is not improbable, however, that the usage now prevailed among the Jews, which Cesar tells us, anciently obtained among the Gauls, for those that were in debt, oppressed by tributes, or the tyranny of the great, to betake themselves to the service of some eminent man for protection. By him they were maintained, and to him they devoted themselves, under a solemn obligation to live and die with him. These were called in the Gallic language, Soldarii, from whence the word soldier is derived; and as they might be honest and good men, though they had the misfortune to be in debt, or could not submit to tyrannical treatment; so, in all probability, David's companions were.—See the Life of David, by the author of Revelation Examined.

It may seem a little strange, perhaps, that David, who in these and several other grosser instances, could not but be culpable in the eyes of God, should nevertheless be styled in Scripture, 'the man after his own heart;' but, whoever observes the occasion of that expression, will find that it ought to be taken in a comparative sense only, and in derogation indeed to Saul, whose transgression, in sparing Amalek, the prophet Samuel was then reproofing; that in executing his decrees upon the idolatrous nations round about him, David would be more punctual, and not so remiss as Saul had been; and in this respect would conform to the divine will, or be the man after God's own heart. This seems to be the primary sense of the words, though the common solution, viz. that though David was a great and grievous sinner, yet the severity of his repentance cleared him in the sight of God, and made an amends for the enormity of his transgressions, be not much amiss.

It cannot, however, with justice be said, that David was any ways culpable in sparing the life of Saul, even when Providence seems to have put it in his hand. This trial God made of his virtue and clemency; and a glorious conquest it was, not only to overcome his own resentments, which were justly enough founded against Saul, but the arguments and instigations likewise of those about him: 'Behold the day, of which the Lord said unto thee, Behold, I will deliver thine enemy into thine hand, that thou mayest do to him, as it shall seem good unto thee.' God had delivered him into his hand, indeed; but had given him no order, or permission to slay Saul. He had promised him the kingdom likewise, but would by no means allow him to ascend the throne by blood. His title to the succession was real and incontestable, but not allowed to be put in force, or himself to attempt, by ways of violence, the possession of the crown, as long as Saul was permitted by God to reign, and recognised as sovereign by the people. David, as yet, being only a private man, had no authority to wage war against Saul; and though it be allowable for any one to defend himself against any unjust aggressor, and to repel force by force, yet this must be done only in order to secure his own life, and not to take away that of his adversary; for what the apostle says of judging, or censuring, is much more forcible in the matter of killing: 'Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth, or falleth; for there is one lawgiver, who is able to save, and to destroy: who art thou then that judgest another?' And these rules, which ought to be observed by private persons, are much more extensive when they relate to a prince and his subject. The subject is obliged in duty, even though he be innocent, to bear patiently the ill-treatment of his prince. David, no doubt, was conscious of his own integrity; but were it not for the preceding promises of God in his favour, and the orders which, from time to time, he received from the high priest's oracle, it would not have been so easy a matter to justify some part of his conduct. His flying from his country, enlisting men, and putting himself in a condition of defence, would, even under our mild government, be looked upon as seditious and rebellious proceedings. And therefore we may suppose, that David himself might not have so favourable an opinion of the course of life he was compelled at that time to follow; might think that he gave some umbrage to Saul's jealousy, and suspicion of him; and might thereupon be more inclinable to excuse the violence of his persecution, and to make no other use of the advantages he had against him, than to demonstrate his own innocence, and the groundlessness of the other's suspicions; for such seems to be the sense of his own words: 'Wherefore doth my lord thus pursue after his servant? For, what have I done, or what evil is in my hand? Wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, David seeketh thy hurt? Behold this day thine eyes have seen how the Lord hath delivered thee into mine hand in the cave, but mine eye spared thee; therefore cursed be they before the Lord, who make this difference betwixt us; for they have driven me out this day from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord.' For herein he not only pleads his own innocence, and good intentions towards the king, but, in some measure, excuses the king's conduct towards him, as being under the influence of evil counsellors, who both imposed upon the king's credulity, and compelled him to such a method of life as was far from being agreeable to his interest or inclination.

Upon many accounts, therefore, it was an act of his great and generous soul, for David to spare the life of his severest enemy. But though we cannot, in like manner, justify his indignation against Nabal, and the oath which he swore to destroy his whole family; yet something may be offered in excuse of it, if we attend a little to what occasioned it, and the too common effect which such treatment, as Nabal's was, is apt to have upon such spirits as we may suppose David's to have been. David while he continued in the wilderness of Paran, had given his men charge, not only to do no injury to Nabal's shepherds and herdsmen, but even to protect and assist them, in case they were invaded by any of the neighbouring Arabians; and now that their master was shearing his sheep, which was always a festival season, not far from the place where David was encamped, to show him the greater respect, he sent no less than ten young men of his company to make his compliments to him, and, in the most civil manner, to request something of him, as it was the custom to be generous and liberal at such a time as that, for the relief of himself and his followers, in this form: 'Peace be to thee,' as the young men's instructions were, 'and peace be to thine house, and peace be unto all thou hast.' Peace, in the sacred language, comprehends all manner of blessings, both spiritual and temporal; and therefore a higher compliment, as he say, or a more affectionate salutation, could not have been devised: 'And now I have heard that thou hast shearers, and thy shepherds, which were with us, we hurt them not, neither was there ought missing unto them, all the while that they were in Carmel:' a sufficient argument, one would think, to engage Nabal's grateful acknowledgment: because it certainly was a matter of no small courtesy, for a body of men in arms, and in want of the common necessaries of life not to take by violence what they could not be hindered from. Such men claim a kind of license to do injuries with impunity; and therefore it ought to be deemed a great favour, when they do them not. David and his men, however, are so far from magnifying their services to Nabal, that they only say, 'they did them no hurt;' whereas his own servants acknowledge, 'that they were a defence, and a wall to them both by night and by day, all the while that they were with them keeping sheep.' Upon this presumption, the matter of their request was, 'Let the young men find favour in thine eyes, (for we come in a good day:) give, I pray thee, whatsoever cometh unto thine hand unto thy servants, and thy son David.' Words can hardly be invented more full of respect and humility; ² for he pays a deference to Nabal, either upon the account of his seniority, or descent from the same tribe, and desires no rarities, no delicacies, but any thing that first came to hand, and what he could most conveniently spare.

Nabal, as we just now hinted, was of the same tribe with David, and could not therefore be supposed ignorant either of his exploits in defence of his country, or of the true cause of Saul's indignation against him: and yet, observe the rudeness and insolence of his answer to such a civil message and humble request: ³ 'Who is David, and who is the son of Jesse? There are many servants now-a-days, that break every man from his master. Shall I take the provisions I have made, for my shearers, and give them unto men, whom I know not whence they are?' Nothing certainly could be more provoking than such an answer as this. The charging David with being a vagabond, and rebel to his prince, was a reproach insufferable to a man of a liberal spirit, who knew himself innocent: and therefore no wonder that David, upon the report of the messengers, who were themselves brought under the same predicament, and therefore had no reason to alleviate matters, was resolved, in his passion, to be revenged upon Nabal. For ⁴ there were four things in the matter before us that seem to have inflamed his resentment, and put him upon this sanguinary design. 1st, The want which both he and his companions, at present laboured under, but hoped to have relieved out of the abundance of a wealthy man, who might easily have done it without hurting himself. 2dly, the deception he was under, in finding no compensation made him, for the care which he and his people had taken of Nabal's cattle, though perhaps he had given them his word and assurance that something of this kind would be done. 3dly, The resentment which easily rises in the breast of any generous man, when, instead of thanks, and a grateful acknowledgment, he meets with contumely and opprobrious language. And 4thly, The vexation which an innocent man, conscious of his own merits, and the services he had done his king and country, must necessarily feel, when he perceives himself vilified and treated as a scoundrel. ⁵ Fugitive and slave are imputations of the grossest nature; and when retorted by an ungrateful person upon his guardian and benefactor, are provocations past bearing.

Any one of these things singly was enough to irritate

a man of a lofty spirit; but all put together, could hardly fail of inflaming his mind to such a degree, as to make him lose the government of his passions, and fall into the most vindictive rage, which is generally more observable in military men, whose courage and spirits run high, and being too much accustomed to blood and slaughter, even in lawful wars, have not that dread and abhorrence of cruel and outrageous executions, as the rest of mankind have, who live more retired and peaceable lives.

It was to the sudden transport of David's passion then, and perhaps that exasperated by the instigations of his own men, that we are to impute his vow, and design of destroying Nabal's family: and though in this we cannot commend him, yet certainly there is something praiseworthy in his speedy reconciliation upon Abigail's first address and application to him, in the room of her husband: ⁶ 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which sent thee this day to me; and blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, which hast kept me this day from coming to shed blood, and from avenging myself with mine own hand.' ⁷ In a word, the resolution against Nabal, as one elegantly expresses it, was the resolution of a mortal, not to say a military man, too much injured and provoked, and urged by necessity and self-preservation: the change and the thanksgiving, upon being averted from evil, were the sentiments of an hero and a saint.

The Jews indeed, as we quoted the objection from Josephus, give us an high commendation of Saul, and seem to prefer him before David himself, in regard to the magnanimity of his death. But it is much to be questioned, whether self-murder, which was certainly Saul's case, be an act of magnanimity or not. For besides that the laws of all nations have condemned it, as abhorrent to the dictates of nature and reason, of self-love and self-preservation, the wisest of the heathen world ever looked upon it as an instance of madness and brutality, and with great wisdom have concluded, that such an action is so far from savouring of true courage and generosity, that ^a it is the sure effect of a weak and pusillanimous temper of mind; since true greatness of soul as they justly argue, consists in supporting the evils of adversity, and not in shifting them off; which is a mark of a poor impatient spirit, sinking under the common calamities of life, and not knowing how to bear the blows of bad fortune. ⁸ 'Draw thy sword, and thrust me through therewith, lest the uncircumcised come and mock, or abuse me,' ^b was the request which Saul made to his armour-bearer, and shows that it was not bravery and courage, but the fear of insults, and a conscious

^a By the proper understanding of the right rules of reason, that is not reckoned a true greatness of soul when any one, in not being able to endure the calamities of life, undertakes to end them by laying violent hands on himself; for it is rather a display of weakness of mind when a man cannot endure either the oppressive slavery of his own body, or the sneer of a dastardly world, and surely greater magnanimity must deservedly be said to belong to him who would rather fight than fly from the struggle of a calamitous life.—Aug. de Civit. Dei, b. I. c. 22. And to the same purpose is that in an heathen author: 'It is an easy matter to despise a life of adversity; he is the true hero who can be miserable.'—Martial, Epig.

^b How much nobler was that resolution of Darius, who, finding himself betrayed, and that he was either to be murdered by his own subjects, or delivered into the hands of Alexander, would not however be his own executioner. 'I had rather,' says he, 'die by another's guilt, than my own.'—Curtius, b. 5.

inability to bear them with a becoming superiority of mind, that made him shun the storm, when he saw it approaching, by withdrawing from the stage of life.

Saul's case indeed was very dolorous; but he had not therefore any authority to destroy himself. His life was a sacred depositum of God's, and not to be taken away without invading his right, and violating his laws at the same time. For whatever some may think of the silence of the Scripture concerning self-murder, there is no question to be made, but that it is included in the sixth commandment, under which Saul then lived. ¹ The commandment forbids murder in general; and it is certainly as much murder, to kill ourselves, as to kill another man: and the reason which the Scripture gives, why we are not allowed to do it, in both cases, is the same, because ² 'in the image of God, made he man.' For if I must not shed the blood of another, because he is made in the image of God; I must not shed the blood of mine own self, because I also am a man, and made in the image of God, as well as he. The reason therefore why we have not more frequent prohibitions against this sin is plainly this, ³ that whatever sins or offences God, as a lawgiver, prohibits, he prohibits with a penalty, that is, he affixes such a punishment to such a crime, and he who commits the crime, is to undergo the punishment in this world, whether it be restitution, loss of limb, or loss of life itself. But now this can never happen in the case of self-murder, because self-murder prevents all punishment, the man being dead, before any cognizance can be taken of his offence, and therefore prevents all laws concerning it; and can, consequently, only be included under general commands, and forbidden as a sin, whereof God alone can take cognizance in the world to come.

Since, upon the whole then, Saul may be said to have died in an act of cowardice, and in the violation of God's law, whereof he had no space to repent, it has been a matter of some inquiry, what we are to think of his salvation. The Scripture indeed tells us, that ⁴ 'Saul died for his transgression, which he committed against the Lord, and also for asking counsel of one who had a familiar spirit, to inquire of it, and inquired not of the Lord; and therefore the Lord slew him.' But it is doing a manifest violence to the sense of these words, to apply them as some have done, to his final perdition, when they plainly relate to no more than his temporal death. The dangerous and destructive nature of self-murder is, that it makes repentance, the only revealed condition of man's salvation, impossible; but then we are to know, that in that inexhaustible fountain of goodness, there may be some uncontracted mercy, some sovereign and prerogative grace, that may make favourable allowances for the distraction of men's thoughts or passions, the violence of their fears or troubles, or the over-bearing weight of any other temptation.

But to determine this question more pre-emptorily, though it certainly be consonant to the mercy and goodness of God, to think, that no man shall answer for any miscarriage which is wholly occasioned by the power of a disease, or the distraction of the brain, because whatever is committed, in such a case, is not the man's free act, and consequently cannot be his guilt; yet we have no reason to presume, that the case is not so with those, who, out of pride, or haughtiness, fear of miseries to come, or impatience under present sufferings, distrust of God's providence, or despair of his mercy, lay violent hands upon themselves; because the act was both voluntary and vicious, and not to be amended by repentance: but without limiting thy goodness, O Lord, unto thy mercy we commit their souls!

Thus we have endeavoured to satisfy most of the popular objections which have been raised against several facts, occurring in the first book of Samuel; and for the farther confirmation thereof, we shall only instance in one or two ancient traditions among the heathens, which in all probability derived their original from this part of sacred history. The Scythians, upon their return out of Egypt, passing through the country of the Philistines, robbed the temple of Venus at Askalon, and for their punishment (as ⁵ Herodotus tells us) they, and their posterity, were for a long while afflicted with emerods. Whereupon ⁶ the learned Prideaux remarks, that the Philistines had till then preserved the memory of what they had formerly suffered on account of the ark of God. The Athenians when the mysteries of Bacchus were brought out of Beotia, having not received them with all the pomp and solemnity that the god expected, were smitten ⁷ with a disease in their secret parts, which resembled the malady of the people of Ashdod, and so did their cure too; for having consulted the oracle, they were informed, that the way to get rid of their plague, was to offer unto Bacchus golden figures of the part wherein they were afflicted. The Grecians, at the taking of Troy, discovered an ark dedicated to Bacchus; and when Eurypilus, as Pausanias ⁸ tells us, adventured to open it, he found therein the image of the god, but was immediately deprived of his senses for daring to look into it; which seems to be a plain transcript from the irreverence and fate of the Bethshemites. ⁹ Clemens Alexandrinus has observed, that the fable of Æacus's praying for rain in a great drought, and when Greece was sadly distressed for want of corn, was borrowed from that part of Samuel's history, where he is said to have called down thunder and rain, in the time of wheat harvest, when the sky was all serene and clear: and therefore we need less wonder at the story between Saul and the witch of Endor, when we read of Circe, Medea, Erichtho, Manto, Antonoe, and several other women, who, in the heathen world, became famous for their necromancy, and of the many votaries that resorted to them; when we find Statius introducing Tiresias, as raising altars, making libations, and offering sacrifices, ¹⁰ with solemn invocations to the infernal gods; and Homer himself, spending a great part of ¹¹ one book of his poem, in representing Ulysses as invoking the ghost of his same Tiresias, and attending to the oracles which proceeded from his mouth. These things had their foundations in some early traditions, which at first

CHAP. III.—On the Jewish Theocracy.

SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.

It is of great importance to have a right understanding of the nature and design of that government under which the Israelites were placed on their departure from the land of Egypt. This has been called a Theocracy, that is, a government of which God is the immediate Head. The persons to whom the administration of this government was committed, were neither legislators nor sovereigns; but merely officers who acted under the authority of God, whose duty it was to see the laws which he had enacted put in force.

It is evident that the fundamental principle of the Mosaic law was the maintenance of one true God, and the prevention, or rather proscription, of polytheism and idolatry. The covenant of Jehovah with the Hebrew people, and their oath by which they bound their allegiance to Jehovah their God and King, was, that they should receive and obey the laws which he should appoint as their supreme Governor, with a particular engagement to keep themselves from the idolatry of the nations around them. In keeping this allegiance to Jehovah, as their immediate and supreme Lord, they were to expect the blessings of God's immediate and particular protection, in the security of their liberty, peace, and prosperity, against all attempts of their idolatrous neighbours; but if they should break their allegiance to Jehovah, or forsake his covenant, by going and serving other gods, then they should forfeit these blessings of God's protection.¹ In this constitution, it will be observed, that it is enforced chiefly by temporal sanctions, and with singular wisdom, for temporal blessings and evils were at that time the common and prevailing incitements to idolatry; but by thus taking them into the Hebrew constitution, as rewards to obedience and punishments for disobedience, they became motives to continuance in the true religion, instead of encouragements to idolatry.²

In the theocracy of the Hebrews, the laws were given to them by God, through the mediation of Moses, and they were to be of perpetual force and obligation, so long as their policy subsisted. The judges by whom these laws were administered, were represented as holy persons, and as sitting in the place of God.³ These judges were usually taken from the tribe of Levi, and the chief expounder of the law was the high priest. In difficult cases of law, however, relating both to government and war, God was to be consulted by Urim and Thummim; and in matters which concerned the welfare of the state, God frequently made known his will by prophets, whose mission was duly attested, and the people were bound to hearken to their voice. In all these cases, Jehovah appears as sovereign King, ruling his people by his appointed ministers.

A subordinate design of this constitution of the Hebrew government was, the prevention of intercourse between the Israelites and foreign nations. The prevalence of the most abominable idolatry among those nations, and the facility with which the Israelites had, on more than one occasion, adopted their idolatrous rites, during their sojourning in the wilderness, rendered this seclusion necessary, in order to secure the fundamental principle of the Mosaic law above-mentioned; and many of the peculiar laws will, on this principle, be found both wisely and admirably adapted to secure this design.⁴

The form of the Hebrew republic was unquestionably democratic. When Moses promulgated the laws, he convened the whole congregation of Israel, to whom he is repeatedly said to have spoken; but as he could not possibly be heard by six hundred thousand men, we must conclude that he only addressed a certain number of persons, who were deputed to represent the rest of the Israelites. By comparing Deut. xxix. 9. with Joshua xxiii. 2. it appears that these representatives were the heads of tribes, of families, and judges, and officers.

All the various branches of Abraham's descendants, like the ancient Germans, or the Scottish clans, kept together in a body according to their tribes and families; each tribe forming a lesser commonwealth, with its peculiar interests, and all of them at last uniting into one great republic. The same arrangement, it is well known, obtained among the Israelites, who appear to have been divided into twelve great tribes, previously to their departure from Egypt. By Moses, however, they were subdivided into certain great families, which are called families by way of distinction: each of whom, again, had their heads, which are sometimes called, heads of houses of fathers, and sometimes simply heads. These are likewise the same persons, who in Josh. xxiii. 2. and xxiv. 1. are called elders. It does not appear in what manner these heads or elders of families were chosen, when any of them died. The princes or heads of tribes did not cease with the monarchy; for it is evident that they subsisted in the time of David;⁵ and they must have proved a powerful restraint upon the power of the king.

It will now be readily conceived how the Israelitish state might have subsisted not only without a king, but even occasionally without that magistrate who was called a judge. Every tribe had always its own chief magistrate, who may not inaptly be compared to the lords lieutenants of our British counties: subordinate to them, again, were the heads of families, who may be represented as their depute-lieutenants, and if there were no general ruler of the whole people, yet there were twelve smaller commonwealths, who in certain cases united together, and whose general convention would take measures for their common interest. In many cases particular tribes acted as distinct and independent republics, not only when there was neither king nor judge, but even during the times of the kings. Instances of wars being carried on by one or more particular tribes, both before and after the establishment of the regal government, may be seen in Josh. xvii. 15—17. Judg. iv. 11. and xviii—xx. 1 Chron. iv. 18—23. It appears from 1 Chron. xxiii. 11, that a certain number of persons was necessary to constitute a family, and to empower such a family to have a representative head: for it is there said, that the four sons of Shimei had not a numerous progeny, and were therefore reckoned only as one family. Hence we may explain why, according to Micah v. 1. Bethlehem may have been too small to be reckoned among the families of Judah. It is impossible to ascertain, at this distance of time, what number of individuals was requisite to constitute a house or family.¹

The judges who were appointed by Moses, had also a right by virtue of their office, to be present in the congregation, or convention of the state. After the departure of the Israelites from Egypt, Moses, for some time, was their sole judge. Jethro, his father-in-law, observing that the daily duties of this office were too heavy for him, suggested to him the institution of judges, or rulers of tens, of fifties, of hundreds, and of thousands, who determined every affair of little importance among themselves, but brought the hard causes to Moses.² Of the judges of tens, therefore, there must have been sixty thousand; of the judges of fifties, twelve thousand; of the judges of hundreds, six thousand; and of the judges of thousands, six hundred. These judges seem to have been a sort of justices of the peace in several divisions, probably taken from the military division of a host into thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens; this was a model proper for them as an army marching, and not unsuitable to their settlement as tribes and families, in a sort of counties, hundreds, and tithings.

After the Hebrews were established in the land of Canaan, Moses ordained that judges should be appointed in every city,³ and it should seem that they were chosen by the people. In succeeding ages these judicial offices were filled by the Levites, most probably because they were the persons best skilled in the law of the Hebrews.

During the sojourning of the Israelites in the wilderness, Moses established a council or senate of seventy, to assist him in the government of the people. The Jewish rabbinical writers, who have exercised their ingenuity in conjecturing why the number was limited to seventy, have pretended that this was a permanent and supreme court of judicature; but as the sacred writers are totally silent concerning such a tribunal, we are authorized to conclude that it was only a temporary institution. After their return from the Babylonish captivity, it is well known that the Jews did appoint a Sanhedrim or council of seventy at Jerusalem, in imitation of that which Moses had instituted. In the New Testament, very frequent mention is made of this supreme tribunal, of which an account will be found in a subsequent part of this work.

Thus, the form of the Jewish government was, as Josephus very properly terms it, a theocracy, under which sins as well as crimes were punished, and piety and private virtue, as well as public services to the state, rewarded even in this world. No other government, at least since the earliest ages, has been, or indeed could be, administered in this manner, for no government administered by mere man can either punish or reward any thing but overt acts; nor do ordinary civil governments concern themselves with the practice of religious duties or private virtues, farther than those duties and virtues affect the peace of society. Without taking cognizance of these things, however, the civil constitution of the Israelites would not have answered the purpose for which that people was separated from the rest of the world; for their minds in general were too grovelling to have been restrained from the universal propensity to polytheism and idolatry which then prevailed, by any thing but immediate rewards for duties performed, and immediate punishment for impiety and vice.

That this theocratic government continued until the elevation of Saul to the throne is unquestionable. From the death of Joshua to that period, the highest permanent officer in the state as well as in the church was evidently the high priest: and this was the natural consequence of God himself being the supreme civil governor of the nation. Occasional magistrates were indeed raised up from time to time under the denomination of judges; but from their history it appears that their office was rather military than civil; that most of them were employed in leading armies to battle against the oppressors of their country rather than in dispensing justice to the people; that they were raised up by an immediate impulse from heaven, and not by the choice of the nation; and that when they were not themselves supernaturally enlightened by the Spirit of God, they were to undertake nothing of importance, either in peace or in war, but by the direction of the high priest, after he had consulted God for them by Urim.

Such was the theocratic government of Israel in the time of the judges; but when, toward the end of Samuel's administration, the people mutinously demanded a king to reign over them, and God directed the prophet to comply with their request, the general opinion till very lately, was, and perhaps still is, that the government of Israel ceased to be theocratic, and became such a monarchy as other civil governments which are administered by one man. Such indeed they wished it to be; for their demand was to "have a king over them, that they also might be like the nations;" and in this sense their demand was understood both by God and by the prophet. "They have not rejected thee, said the Lord to Samuel, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them;" and had their demand been granted to the utmost extent of their wishes, they would very quickly have proceeded to abrogate the law, and to reject Jehovah as their only God.

The magistrate called a king in those days and countries around them, was supreme and absolute. His edicts were laws, which he could enforce, suspend, or abrogate, at his pleasure; but such authority never was possessed by Saul, by David, or by any other king, either of Israel or of Judah. All writers on politics have agreed, indeed all men capable of reflection must agree, that in every government there is necessarily a power, from which the constitution has provided no appeal, and which may therefore be termed absolute, omnipotent, and uncontrollable. But this power can be nothing else than the legislature; and where the right of enacting and executing the laws is vested in different bodies, the government is more or less free according to circumstances. The sole legislator of Israel was God; and therefore, as the kings could neither enact a new law nor repeal an old one, the government continued to be a theocracy, as well under their permanent administration, as it was under the occasional administration of the judges; and the only difference that we can discover between the two species of government, is, that the conduct of Judges was generally directed by him, and that of the kings either by the inspiration of God vouchsafed to themselves, or by prophets raised up from time to time to reclaim them when deviating from their duty as laid down by the law. That the theocracy ended not with the judges, has been proved by Bishop Warburton in so masterly a manner, that I should do my reader injustice were I not to lay before him an abstract of that learned and ingenious prelate's reasoning on the subject.

I. "Though the people's purpose, in their clamours for a king, was indeed to live under a Gentile monarchy, like their idolatrous neighbours; yet in compassion to their blindness, God, in this instance, as in many others, indulged their prejudices, without exposing them to the fatal consequences of their project, which, if complied with in the sense in which they had formed it, would have been a withdrawing from them of his extraordinary providence, at a time when they could not support themselves without it. He therefore gave them a king; but such a one as was only his viceroy or deputy: and who, on that account, was not left to the people's election, but chosen by himself, and chosen for life, which it does not appear that all the judges were.

II. "This king had an unlimited executive power as God's viceroy, for which he was amenable to God alone, whom David therefore repeatedly calls his own King, as well as the King of Israel.

III. "He had no legislative authority, which every king then had, but which no viceroy could possibly have. David and Solomon indeed appointed the courses of the priests; but the latter is said to have done so according to the order of the former, who is expressly styled 'the man of God,' who, therefore, acted under the direction of the Holy Spirit.

IV. "The king was placed and displaced by God at pleasure, of which as viceroy, we see the perfect fitness; but as sovereign, by the people's choice or by any other right, we cannot easily account for. No doubt God is by inherent right the sovereign Dispenser of all things both in heaven and in earth; but in the establishing of the government of Israel, he appears to have treated with that people, as men equally independent treat with each other, and to have left it at first to their own option whether they would have himself for their King.

V. "The very same punishment was ordained for cursing the king as for blaspheming God, namely, stoning to death; and the reason is intimated in these words of Abishai to David—'Shall not Shimei be put to death for this, because he cursed the Lord's anointed?' the common title of the kings of Israel and of Judah.

VI. "The throne and Kingdom of Judea is all along expressly declared to be God's throne and God's kingdom. Thus, in the first book of Chronicles, it is said, that Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king instead of David his father. And the queen of Sheba, who had doubtless been informed by Solomon of the true nature of his kingdom, compliments him in these words, 'Blessed be the Lord thy God, which delighteth in thee to set thee on his throne, to be king for the Lord thy God.' In like manner, Ahijah says to the house of Israel, on their defection from Rehoboam; 'And now ye think to withstand the kingdom of the Lord in the hands of the sons of David.'¹

VII. "The penal laws against idolatry were still in force during their kings, and put in execution by their best rulers; which alone is a demonstration of the subsistence of the theocracy; because such law would be absolutely unjust under any other form of government.²

VIII. "It appears that a certain degree of inspiration was vouchsafed to their several kings, or at least to the first of each dynasty of kings, to enable them to discharge properly the duties of God's vicegerents, and that this gift was not withdrawn till they were rejected from their high office, or had rendered themselves unworthy of it. Thus when Saul was anointed to be captain over the Lord's inheritance, as soon as he had turned his back to go from Samuel, God gave him another heart, and turned him into a new man, to qualify him, as Bishop Patrick observes, for the government of his people; but when he had rendered himself, by his rebellions against his divine sovereign, unworthy of the office, that spirit was withdrawn from him, and conferred on David, who was anointed to succeed him. In like manner, when Solomon succeeded to the kingdom, God bestowed on him 'a wise and understanding heart, to enable him to govern and judge the people,' who are expressly called not Solomon's, but God's people."³

It is justly observed by Warburton, that had the people's demand of a king been complied with in the sense and to the extent that they meant it, the equal and extraordinary providence, rewarding piety and virtue in this world, and punishing idolatry and vice, must have been withdrawn from them; and that they could not then have supported themselves under an ordinary providence in which 'all things here come alike to all,' surrounded as they were by exasperated enemies, more powerful than themselves. But it is of more importance perhaps to consider the equal and extraordinary providence as necessary at that period, and long afterwards, to check their propensities to idolatry, and to prepare them gradually for the reception of that future Messiah, promised to their forefathers, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed. A long succession of prophets was accordingly sent to open up gradually the nature of that dispensation, which Moses had taught them to expect from a prophet to be raised up among them like unto him; and to remove, by little and little, the shadows of their law, as they became more and more able to bear the splendour of the light within. That splendour, however, the nation at large was never considered fully able to bear; and therefore the extraordinary providence was never wholly withdrawn from them till some time after their return from their Babylonish captivity, by which they appear to have been completely cured of their propensities to polytheism, and led to turn their attention more steadily to the prospect of that future state, which had been presented to them by some of their later prophets.

During the captivity Bishop Warburton supposes that the administration of the theocracy lay, as it were, in abeyance, but it appears that the Jews were there permitted to live as far as possible, that is, to regulate their own private concerns, by their own laws; and we are sure that they were protected by a miraculous interposition of providence, from the tyranny of those who attempted to compel them to worship idols or to neglect the worship of their own God.¹ On their return to their own country, however, the theocratic government was again administered, as is evident from the declaration of the Almighty, by the prophet Haggai: 'yet now be strong, O Zerubbabel, saith the Lord; and be strong, O Joshua, son of Josedeck the high priest; and be strong all ye people of the land, saith the Lord, and work, for I am with you, saith the Lord of hosts: according to the word that I covenanted with you when you came out of Egypt, so my Spirit remaineth amongst you: fear ye not.'² "What was that covenant?" asks the Bishop. "That Israel should be his people, and he their God and King. It cannot barely mean, that he would be their God, and they should be his people; for this was but part of the covenant. Nor can it mean that they should be conducted by an extraordinary providence, as at their coming out of Egypt, and during the first periods of the theocracy, for this was but the effect of the covenant, which soon ceased after their re-establishment in their own country."

Then indeed the extraordinary providence was wholly withdrawn from the Jews, among whom, as among other nations, there was thenceforth, 'one event in this world, to the righteous and to the wicked,' whose prosperity or adversity appeared no longer to be the result, as formerly, of their righteousness or their sins. Still, however, their government continued to be a theocracy; for they were governed by laws which, as they were given by God, none but God could repeal or change. If then, as all writers on political philosophy agree, every government receives its denomination from the supreme or sovereign power of the state; and if no power can be supreme, but that in which resides the power of legislation, it is obvious that the government or constitution of the Jewish state continued to be a theocracy till the coming of that prophet, who was to be a lawgiver like unto Moses; for none else had, or could have authority to repeal, or in any way change those laws which they had received from God, by his ministry. Jesus the promised Messiah erected, indeed, a new and spiritual kingdom, to be governed by a new and spiritual law; and proved the divine origin of that kingdom, by miracles equally numerous and stupendous with those by which the theocracy had been originally established; whilst he completely abolished the Mosaic dispensation, by rendering it impossible to administer even the form of the theocratic government.³

How long the profession of necromancy, or the art of raising up the dead, in order to pry into future events, or to be informed of the fate of the living, has obtained in the world, we have no indications from history. We perceive no footsteps of it in the ages before the flood: and yet it is strange, that a people, abandoned to all kinds of wickedness in a manner, could keep themselves clear of this: but our account of these times is very short. The first express mention that we meet with of magicians and sorcerers, is almost in the beginning of the book of Exodus, where Moses is soliciting the deliverance of the children of Israel out of Egypt; and therefore Egypt, which affected to be the mother of most occult sciences, is supposed to have been the inventress of this. From Egypt it spread itself into the neighbouring countries, and soon infected all the east: for as it undertook to gratify man's inquisitiveness, and superstitious curiosity, it could not long want abettors. From Egypt it is certain that the Israelites brought along with them no small inclination to these detestable practices; and were but too much addicted to them; notwithstanding all the care that the state had taken to suppress them, and the provision which God had made, by establishing a method of consulting him, to prevent their hankering after them.

The injunction of the law is very express. ⁴ 'When thou art come into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not learn to do after the abominations of those nations. There shall not be found among you any that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a con-

^a What our English translation makes a familiar spirit, the Septuagint and Vulgate render the spirit of Python; but the Hebrew calls it the spirit of Ob. The word Ob, or Oboth, in its primary signification, is a bottle or vessel of leather, wherein liquors were put; and it is not unlikely that this name was given to witches and wizards, because, when they were in their fits of enthusiasm, they swelled in their bellies like a bottle. The occasion of this swelling is said by some to proceed from a demon's entering into the sorceress per partes genitales, and so ascending to the bottom of her stomach, from whence at that time, she uttered her predictions; and for this reason the Latins call such persons 'ventriloqui,' and the Greeks εγγαστριμύβοι, 'people who speak out of their bellies.' That there have been such people as these, might be shown by several examples both in ancient and modern history; but at present, we shall content ourselves with one taken from Cælius Rhodiginus, (Lecti. Antiq. b. 8. c. 10.) his words are to this effect. "While I am writing," says he, "concerning ventriloquous persons, there is, in my own country, a woman of a mean extract, who has an unclean spirit in her belly, from whence may be heard a voice, not very strong indeed, but very articulate and intelligible. Multitudes of people have heard this voice, as well as myself, and all imaginable precaution has been used in examining into the truth of this fact. Quando futuri avida portentus mens, sæpe accessit ventriloquam, ac exantam amictu nequid fraudis occultare, inspicere et audire concupivit. This demon," as our author adds, "is called Cincinmatulus, and when the woman calls upon him by his name, he immediately answers her." In like manner several ancient writers have informed us, that in the times of paganism, evil spirits had communion with these ventriloqui per partes secretiores; but at present, we shall only take notice of a remarkable passage in St Chrysostom, which we choose to give the reader in Latin. "Traditur Pythia fœmina fuisse, quæ in Tripodes sedens sulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer; for all that do these things are an abomination to the Lord; and therefore their punishment was this. ¹ 'A man, or a woman, that hath a familiar spirit, or that is a wizard, shall surely be put to death. They shall stone them with stones, their blood shall be upon them.' Nor was it only the practisers of such vile arts, but those likewise that resorted to them upon any occasion, were liable to the same punishment; for ² 'the soul that turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards to go a-whoring after them, I will even set my face against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people,' saith the Lord.

Such was the severity of the Jewish laws against those who either practised, or encouraged, any manner of magical arts; and it must be said in Saul's commendation, that he put the laws in execution against such vile people; he had destroyed and driven away ³ 'those that had familiar spirits, and the wizards out of the land;' and yet, observe the weakness as well as the wickedness of the man! when himself fell into distress, and had abundant reason to believe that God had forsaken him, he flies to one of these creatures for relief, and requests of her to raise up his old friend Samuel, as expecting, very probably, some advice from him. But whether this was really done or no, or if done, in what manner it was effected, are points that have so much exercised the heads and pens, both of ancient and modern, both of Jewish and Christian, writers, that little or nothing new can be said upon them; and therefore all that I shall endeavour to do, will be to reduce their several sentiments into as narrow a compass, and to state them in as fair a light, as I can, by inquiring into these three particulars:

1. Whether there was a real apparition.
2. What this apparition, if real, was; and,
3. By what means, and for what purposes, it was effected.

1. It cannot be denied indeed but that those who explode the reality of the apparition, and make it to be all nothing but a cheat and juggle of the sorceress, have found out some arguments, that at first sight make a tolerable appearance. They tell us, ⁴ that the sacred history never once makes mention of Saul's seeing Samuel with his own eyes. It informs us, indeed, that Saul knew him by the description which the woman gave, and that he held, for some considerable time, a conversation with him; but since it is nowhere said that he really saw him, "Why might not the woman counterfeit a voice, and pretend it was Samuel's? When Saul asked her to ^a raise him up Samuel, that is, to disturb the ghost of so great a prophet, she might think he was no common man; and when ⁵ 'he sware unto her by the Lord,' that he would defend her from all danger, he gave her intimation enough that he was the king. ⁶ The crafty woman, therefore, having picked up the knowledge of this, might retire into her closet or cell, and there, having her familiar, that is, some cunning artful man, to make proper responses, in a different voice, might easily impose upon one who was distracted with anxious thoughts, and had already shown sufficient credulity, in thinking there was an efficacy in magical operations to evocate the dead.

"The controversy between Saul and David every one knew; nor was it now become a secret, that the crown was to devolve upon the latter: and therefore that part of the discourse which passed between Saul and Samuel, any man of a common genius might have hit off, without much difficulty. Endor was not so far distant from Gilboa or Shunem, but that the condition of the two armies might easily be known, and that the Philistines were superior both in courage and numbers; and therefore his respondent, without all peradventure, might prognosticate Saul's defeat; and though there were some hazard in the last conjecture, viz. that he and his sons would die in battle; yet there was this advantage on the side of the guess, that they were all men of known and experienced valour, who would rather sacrifice their lives, than turn their backs upon their enemies." Upon the whole, therefore, the maintainers of this hypothesis con-

This said; she runs the mangled carcass o'er,
And wipes from every wound the crusty gore;
Now with hot blood the frozen breast she warms,
And with strong lunar dews confirms her charms.
Amo she mingles ev'ry monstrous birth,
Which nature, wayward and perverse, brings forth.
Nor entrails of the spotted lynx she lacks,
Nor bony joints from fell hyenas' backs;
Nor deers' hot marrow, rich with snaky blood,
Nor foam of raging dogs, that fly the food.
Her store the tardy remora supplies,
With stones from eagles warm, and dragons' eyes;
Snakes that on pinions cut their airy way,
And nimbly o'er Arabian deserts play, &c.
To these she joins dire drugs without a name,
A thousand poisons never known to fame;
Herbs, o'er whose leaves the hag her spells had sung,
And wet with cursed spittle, as they sprung,
With every other mischief most abhor'd,
Which hell, or worse Erichtho, could afford.

Having thus prepared the body, she makes her invocation in these words:—

Ye furies! and thou black, accursed hell!
Ye woes, in which the damn'd for ever dwell!
Chaos, the world's and form's eternal foe!
And thou, sole arbiter of all below,
Pluto! whom ruthless fates a god ordain,
And doom to immortality of pain,
Ye fair Elysian mansions of the blest,
Where no Thessalian charmer hopes to rest!
Styx! and Persephone, compelled to fly
Thy fruitful mother, and the cheerful sky!
Third Heate! by whom my whispers breathe
My secret purpose to the shades beneath!
Thou greedy dog, who at th' infernal gate,
In everlasting hunger still must wait!
And thou, old Charon, horrible and hoar!
For ever lab'ring back from shore to shore, &c.
Hear all ye powers! if e'er your hell rejoice
In the lov'd horrors of this impious voice, &c.

^a What forms of enchantment were anciently used in the practice of necromancy, we are at a loss to know; because we read of none that the Pythoness of Endor employed; but this might probably happen, because the ghost of Samuel came upon her sooner than she expected, and before she had begun her incantations. That however there were several rites, spells, and invocations used upon these occasions, we may learn from almost every ancient author; but from none more particularly than from Lucan, who brings in Erichtho animating a dead body, in order to tell young Pompey the fate of the civil war. The ceremonies clude that as there is no reason, so there was no necessity for any miraculous interposition in this affair, since this is no more than what any common gypsy, with another in confederacy to assist her, might do to any credulous person who came to consult her.

They who undertake to oppose this opinion, lay it down for a good rule in the interpretation of Scripture, that we should, as far as we can, adhere to the primary sense of the words, and never have recourse to any foreign or singular explication, but where the literal is inconsistent either with the dictates of right reason, or the analogy of faith. Let any indifferent person then, say they, take into his hand the account of Saul's consulting this sorceress, and upon the first reading it, he must confess, that the notion which it conveys to his mind, is that of a real apparition; and since the passages that both precede and follow it, are confessedly to be taken in their most obvious meaning, why should a strange and forced construction be put upon this? Have we not as much reason to entertain a good opinion of the author of this history, his ability, his integrity, his knowledge of what he wrote about, and his undesigning to deceive us, as we can have of any critic or commentator upon it? And therefore when he gives us to understand that the woman saw Samuel, upon what presumption are we led to disbelieve it? Saul and his companions might possibly be deceived by an impostor in Samuel's guise; but was the sacred historian therefore deceived, or did he mean to deceive us, when he gives us this plain account of an apparition? Saul was a bold man, and too sagacious to become a dupe to a silly woman. He and his two attendants came upon her by night, and before she was prepared to act any juggle or imposture. They were too well acquainted with the voice, and stature, and figure of Samuel, for any other to personate him, without being detected. But admitting the cheat passed upon them, how can we think but that the author of this account, who pretends to relate the transaction as it really happened, and is supposed to have written by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, would in some measure, have let us into the secret of this imposture? His business doubtless was to expose such practices, as far as truth would allow; and therefore it is unaccountable (unless he meant to delude us with a false persuasion) that he should admit every thing that tended to discover the fraud, and in his narration, insert every thing that tended to confirm the reality of the prophet's appearance.

² That spirits of another world may assume such vehicles as may admit them to a sensible commerce with us, in like manner as our spirits are clothed with these bodies of ours, the best philosophy will admit; and that they have done so upon extraordinary occasions, ³ the appearance of Moses and Elias, and their conversing with our Saviour on the mount, do abundantly testify. And therefore if God, for wise reasons of his providence, thought fit either to appoint, or permit Samuel to appear to Saul upon this occasion, there seems to be no more difficulty in the thing, than his appearing to him at any other time, while he was alive, and subsisting in the world; for Saul saw his spirit then no more than he did now, and his spirit was every whit as able to bear a body as it was then.

It is owned, indeed, that according to the series of the narration, Saul did not see the apparition, be it what it will, so soon as the woman did, because probably the woman's body, or some other object, might interpose between him and the first appearance; or perhaps because the vehicle, which Samuel assumed upon this occasion, was not, as yet, condensed enough to be visible to Saul, though it was to the woman: but that he did actually see him is manifest, because when he perceived, which word in the original signifies seeing so as to be assured of our object, that it was Samuel, as 'he stooped with his face to the ground, and bowed himself;' which a man is not apt to do to bare ideas or imaginations.

Persons of this woman's character, who are under the displeasure of the government, generally affect obscurity, live privately, and are little acquainted with affairs of state. But suppose her to have been ever so great a politician, and ever so intimate with what had passed between Saul and Samuel heretofore, ever so well assured that God had rejected him, and elected David in his stead; yet how could she come to the knowledge of this, namely, that the battle should be fought the next day, the Israelites be routed, Saul and his sons slain, and their spoils fall into the enemy's hands; since each of these events, even in the present situation of Saul's affairs, was highly casual and uncertain? For might not this prince lose a battle, without losing his life? Or, if he himself fell in the action, why must his three sons be all cut off in the same day? Whatever demonstrations of innate bravery he had given in times past, after such severe menaces as he now received from the apparition; prudence, one would think, would have put him upon providing for his safety, either by chicaning with the enemy, or retiring from the field of battle, without going to expose himself, his sons, and his whole army, to certain and inevitable death. These are things which no human penetration could reach, and which only he, who is the absolute and almighty Ruler of all causes and events, could either foresee or foretell. And how unlikely is it, that God Almighty should make use of this sorceress ⁴ as a prophetess, and give her the honour of revealing his counsels, when, at the same time, he concurred with her in the imposition put upon Saul, by making him believe that Samuel appeared and talked, when there was no Samuel there?

a That 'Saul's stooping to the ground,' and 'bowing himself,' was a certain indication of his seeing Samuel, is apparent from several expressions of the same nature in the sacred history. Thus, when Jacob met Esau, the text tells us, that the 'handmaids, and Leah, and Rachel, and their children bowed themselves,' Gen. xxxiii. 6, 7. When David arose out of his hiding-place, upon the signal that Jonathan gave him, the text tells us, that 'he fell with his face to the ground, and bowed himself,' 1 Sam. xx. 41. And when the messenger from Saul's camp came to David at Ziklag, the text tells us, that 'he fell to the earth, and did obeisance,' 2 Sam. i. 2. But the text takes no notice, either of the messenger's seeing David, or David's seeing Jonathan, or Jacob's family seeing Esau. This is sufficiently implied in their making their obeisance to them; because it is incongruous to suppose, that any would bow, and show other tokens of outward reverence and respect, to persons they did not see.—The History of the Life of King David, vol. 1.

But the truth is, those menacing predictions, how proper soever for a messenger sent from God to utter, were highly imprudent, either in this witch's, or her accomplice's mouth. For, since they knew nothing of futurity, and were, at the best, but put to conjecture, it is much more reasonable to believe, that at such a juncture as this, ¹ they would have bethought themselves of flattering the king, and giving him comfort, and promising success, and not of thundering out such comminations against him, as might probably incense him, but could do themselves no good. They could not but know, that the temper of most kings is to hate to hear shocking truths, and to receive with the utmost despite those that bring them ill news. And therefore it is natural to suppose, that had these threatening replies been of the woman's or her confederate's forming, they would have given them quite another turn, and not run the hazard of disobliging the king to no purpose, by laying an additional load of trouble upon him. In short, ² the whole tenor of Samuel's speech to king Saul is too rough and ungrateful, too grave and solemn, I may also add, too full of truth and reality, ever to have proceeded from their contrivance and invention only.

The woman, by her courteous entertainment of Saul, seems to be a person of no bad nature; and therefore, if she had any accomplice, who understood to make the most of his profession, his business at this time must have been to soothe and cajole the king, which would have both put money in his pocket, and saved the credit of his predictions. For, had he foretold him of success and victory, and a happy issue out of all his troubles, he and the woman had been sure of reputation, as well as farther rewards, in case it had happened to prove so; and if it had not, since no one was privy to their communion, the falsehood of the prediction, upon Saul's defeat and death, must, in course, have been buried with him.

From these reasons, then, we may infer, that the woman in this transaction did not impose upon Saul, since he had a plain sight of the apparition. What the apparition foretold him was above human penetration; and upon the supposition of a juggle, the witch and her confederate would have certainly acted clean contrary to what they did. And so the next—

2. Inquiry meets us, namely, what this apparition was? Some of the ancient doctors, both of the Jewish and Christian church, have made an evil angel the subject of this apparition, in pure regard to the honour of God. "God," say they, "had sufficiently declared his hatred against necromancy, and all kinds of witchcraft, in the severe laws which he enacted against them; but it is certainly denying himself, and cancelling his own work, to seem in the least to countenance or abet them, as he necessarily must do, if, on the evocation of an old hag, any messenger is permitted to go from him. Far be it from us, therefore, to have such conceptions of God. He is holy, and just, and uniform in all his ways; and therefore this coming at a call, and doing the witch's drudgery, must only appertain to some infernal spirit, who might possibly find his account in it at last. It was one of this wicked crew, that either assumed a phantom, or a real body, appeared in a mantle like Samuel, spake articulately, and held this conversation with Saul; which, considering his knowledge and foresight of things, he was well enough qualified to do, notwithstanding the sundry predictions relating to future contingencies, which are contained in it."

How far the honour of God is concerned in this transaction, will more properly fall under our next inquiry. In the mean time, I cannot but observe, that whatever incongruity may be supposed in the real appearance of Samuel, it is not near so much, as to find one of the apostate spirits of hell expressing so much zeal for the service of the God of heaven, and upbraiding Saul with those very crimes which he himself tempted him to commit; as to find this wicked and impure spirit making use of the name of God, that sacred and tremendous name whose very pronunciation was enough to make him quake and shiver, no less than seven times in this intercourse with Saul, without any manner of uneasiness or hesitation; as to find this angel of darkness and father of lies prying into the womb of futurity, and determining the most casual events positively and precisely. ³ We do not indeed deny, but that the devil's knowledge is vastly superior to that of the most accomplished human understanding; that his natural penetration, joined with his long experience, is such, that the greatest philosophers, the subtlest critics, and the most refined politicians are mere novices in comparison of him: yet what genius, however exalted and improved, without a divine revelation, could, as we said before, be able to foretell things that were lodged in God's own breast, namely, the precise time of the two armies engaging, the success and consequence of the victory, and the very names of the persons that were to fall in battle? This is what the apparition plainly revealed to Saul: and yet this, we dare maintain, is more than any finite understanding, by its own mere capacity, could ever have been able to find out.

But without this multitude of arguments, if we are to take the Scripture in its plain and literal sense, read we over the story of Saul and the witch of Endor ever so often, we shall not so much as once find the devil mentioned in it. And therefore it is somewhat wonderful, that he should be brought upon the stage by many learned men, merely to solve a difficulty, which, upon examination, appears to be none at all. But now on the other hand, it appears, that, through the whole narration, Samuel is the only thing that is mentioned. It is Samuel, whom Saul desires to be called up; Samuel, who appeared to the woman; Samuel, whom the woman describes; Samuel, whom Saul perceives, and bows himself to, with whom he converses so long, and because of whose words he was afterwards so sore afraid.

The Scripture indeed speaks sometimes according to the appearance of things, and may call that by the name of Samuel, which was only the semblance or phantom of him: but, that this cannot be the sense of the matter here, we have the testimony of the wise son of Sirach, an excellent interpreter of canonical scriptures, who tells us expressly, that ⁴ Samuel, 'after his death, prophesied, and showed the king his end;' pursuant to what we read in the version of the Septuagint, namely, that ⁵ Saul

'asked counsel of one that had a familiar spirit, and Samuel answered him.' So that, upon the whole, we may be allowed to conclude, that it was the real soul of Samuel, clothed in some visible form, which at this time appeared to the king of Israel: but by what means, or for what purposes it appeared, is the other question we are now to determine.

3. Several of the ¹ fathers of the Christian church were of opinion, that the devil had a certain limited power over the souls of the saints, before Jesus Christ descended into hell, and rescued them from the tyranny of that prince of darkness. ² St Austin, in particular, thinks, that there is no absurdity in saying, that the devil was as able to call up Samuel's soul, as he was to present himself among the sons of God, or to set our Saviour on one of the pinnacles of the temple; and a ³ learned Jewish doctor supposes, that devils have such a power over human souls, for the space of a year after their departure, as to make them assume what bodies they please; and thereupon he concludes, but very erroneously, that it was not a year from the time of Samuel's death to his appearance. But these are such wild and extravagant fancies, as to deserve no serious confutation. It is absurd to say that the souls of saints, such as we are now speaking of, were ever in hell, and more absurd to say, that if they are in heaven, it is in the power of any magical, nay, of any diabolical incantations to call them down from thence. ⁴ Great, without all doubt, is the power of apostate angels; but miserable, we may say, would the state of the blessed be, if the other had any license to disturb their happiness, when, and as long as they pleased: for "God forbid," ⁵ says Tertullian, "that we should believe, that the soul of any holy man, much less of a prophet, should be so far under his disposal, as to be brought up at pleasure by the power of the devil."

Since the devil then has no power to disturb the happiness of souls departed, this apparition of Samuel could not proceed from any magical enchantments of the sorceress, but must have been effected by the sole power and appointment of God, who is the sovereign Lord both of the living and of the dead: and accordingly, we may observe, from the surprise which the woman discovered upon Samuel's sudden appearing, that the power of her magic was not concerned therein, but that it was the effect of some superior hand. The scripture relates the matter thus: ⁶ "When the woman saw Samuel, she cried with a loud voice; and the woman spake unto Saul, saying, Why hast thou deceived me, for thou art Saul? And the king said unto her, be not afraid: what sawest thou? And the woman said unto Saul, I saw gods ascending out of the earth." Now, it is plain from this narration, that the woman saw something she was not accustomed to see. ⁷ Her necromancy had ordinarily power over demons only, or such wretched spirits as were submitted to the devil's tyranny; but on this occasion, she saw an object so august, so terrible, so majestic, so contrary indeed to any thing she had ever raised before, and that coming upon her before she had begun her enchantments, that she could not forbear being frightened, and crying out with a loud voice, as being fully satisfied that the apparition came from God.

"But since the scripture assures us, that God had wholly withdrawn himself from Saul, and would answer him neither by prophets nor by dreams; how can we imagine that he should, all on a sudden, become so kind, as to send Samuel to him, or that Samuel should be in any disposition to come, when it was impossible for him to do any good by his coming?"

⁸ Now there seems to be some analogy between God's dealing with Saul in this particular, and his former treatment of the prophet Balaam. Balaam was for disobeying the orders which God had given him to bless the Israelites; and was searching into magical secrets for what he could not obtain of God, namely, a power to change into curses the blessings which God had pronounced by his mouth. In this case there was but small likelihood, that God would continue to communicate himself to a person so unworthy of any extraordinary revelation; and yet he did it: but then it was with a design to reveal to him those very miseries, from which his mercenary mind was so desirous to rescue the Midianites. The application is easy: and it farther suggests this reason, why God appointed Samuel at this time to appear unto Saul, namely, that through him, he might give him a meeting where he least of all expected one; and might show him, that the fate which his own disobedience had brought upon him, was determined; that there was no reversing the decrees of Heaven, no procuring aid against the Almighty's power, no flying, though it were to hell, from his presence, no hiding himself in darkness from his inspection, ⁹ 'with whom darkness is no darkness at all, but the night is as clear as the day, and the darkness and light are both alike.'

¹⁰ That the souls of men departed have a capacity, and, no doubt, an inclination, to be employed in the service of men alive, as having the same nature and affections, and being more sensible of our infirmities, than any pure and abstracted spirits are, can hardly be contested; that, in their absent state, they are imbodied with aerial or ethereal vehicles, which they can condense or rarefy at pleasure, and so appear or not appear to human sight, is what some of the greatest men, both of the heathen and Christian religion, have maintained; and that frequent apparitions of this kind have happened since the world began, cannot be denied by any one that is conversant in its history. If therefore the wisdom of God, for reasons already assigned, thought proper to despatch a messenger to Saul upon this occasion, there may be some account given, why the soul of Samuel, upon the supposition it was left to its option, should rather be desirous to be sent upon that errand: for whatever may be said in diminution of Saul's religious character, it is certain, that he was a brave prince and commander; had lived in strict intimacy with Samuel; professed a great esteem for him, in all things; and ¹¹ was by Samuel not a little lamented, when he had fallen from his obedience to God. Upon these considerations, we may imagine, that the soul of Samuel might have such a kindness for him, as to be ready to appear to him in the depth of his distress, in order to settle his mind by telling him the upshot of the whole matter, namely, that he should lose the battle and he and his sons be slain; that so he might give a specimen, as the Jews love to speak in commendation of him, of the bravest valour that was ever achieved, by any commander; fight boldly when he was sure to die; and sell his life at as dear a price as possible; that so in his death, he might be commemorated with honour, and deserve the Threnodia which his son-in-law made on him: ¹ 'The beauty of Israel is slain upon the high places. How are the mighty fallen! From the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, the bow of Jonathan turned not back, and the sword of Saul returned not empty. How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle!'

CHAP. IV.—On the Witch of Endor.

SUPPLEMENTAL BY THE EDITOR.

I AGREE with the author in the opinion, that it was the spirit of Samuel himself, wearing, as Dr Hales observes, the same mantle in appearance, which was rent at the final rejection of Saul from the kingdom, which appeared on this occasion. Many authors of reputation maintain that this was a mere imposition practised upon Saul by the witch; but it is evident, that the witch herself expected not to see such a spectre as presented itself before her; and that the spectre made its appearance before it was called.

"I have myself," says Bishop Gleig, "conversed with a ventriloquist, who performed the most extraordinary feats in his art, who was extremely communicative on the subject of his art, and ready to answer every question which I put to him; but he was unfortunately so very illiterate as to speak a language which was hardly intelligible. I found no difficulty whatever in tracing his art to the principles on which it was founded, but he would not tell me in language which I could understand, by what means he produced his acoustic deceptions. That he was a great master of his art, however, he gave me, and thousands besides me, the most complete proofs, making his voice appear to come sometimes from the roof of the room, sometimes from without the door, sometimes from below the floor, and once from the pocket of a gentleman who was sitting close by me. Had this man combined with his ventriloquism that phantasmagoric art, by which some of our modern jugglers frighten the vulgar in a darkened room, he easily could have exhibited such a ghost as I have no doubt the witch of Endor meant and expected to exhibit to Saul."

The ghost, however, which really came was sent by a different and a higher power, and sent for the same purpose that the dumb ass was, for the ass was made to reprove the madness of Balaam, and that enchanter himself made to bless Israel. Necromancy was among the arts forbidden by the law of Moses. Saul had in obedience to that law, lately exterminated, as he thought, all such impious diviners from Israel; and yet, finding himself, in his capacity of king, forsaken by God, he had recourse in his extremity to one of those wretched beings who had escaped from the effects of his righteous zeal. But even Saul himself, conscious as he was of being forsaken of God, could not expect from her the information which he wanted, but through some means forbidden by that law which it was his duty to enforce; and if she was not aided by a familiar spirit, she must have practised arts calculated to persuade the people that she was. These arts were of heathen invention, and led to that idolatry which Saul was bound to root entirely out of the land; and no method can be conceived better calculated to confound the impious monarch, and to prevent the wretched woman from practising her impious arts for the future, than that which the supreme Disposer of events adopted on this occasion. Before she commenced her incantations, the real Samuel appeared before her, and gave to the infatuated king such an answer as there is no reason to suppose he would have received from any pretended Samuel exhibited by her.

It has been maintained by some respectable writers that the apparition was an evil angel, who appeared in the mantle and in the shape of Samuel. As the ground of this opinion, they mention the abhorrence which God had shown against those who practised the arts of necromancy and witchcraft, and its being inconsistent with this declared hatred, so far to countenance these arts as to send a messenger from the invisible state, at the moment when this woman was engaged in them. To this it may be answered, that if the appearance of Samuel on the present occasion be deemed inconsistent with the divine procedure, there is much greater difficulty in believing that the apparition was an evil spirit, since the whole strain of his address to Saul is at variance with the character of an angel of darkness.

It may indeed seem strange, that God, who had rejected Saul, and who answered him not when he consulted him, should now send a departed prophet, to tell him his fate. But the reason is plain. To have answered his inquiry when he consulted him, not in a private capacity, but as the king of Israel, not with the view of obtaining reconciliation, but of ascertaining his fate, would have been an acknowledgment of him in this character; whereas he had been for many years rejected and disowned of God as his deputy: when, however, he applied not to him, but to another, for the purpose of learning his future destiny, and had, for the time, ceased to be king, God gave him through his servant such an answer as he had not expected.

SECT. IV.

CHAP. I.—From the Death of Saul, to that of Absalom. In all thirty-three years.

THE HISTORY.

DAVID was at Ziklag when news was brought him of the defeat of the Israelitish army, and of the death of Saul. The messenger was an Amalekite, ^a who pretended that he was the person who despatched the king after he found himself mortally wounded; and, however he came by them, produced Saul's crown and bracelet to verify what he said. He expected, no doubt, an ample compensation for this message and present; but instead of that, David ordered his guards to fall upon him, because, according to his own declaration, he had been accessory to the king's death. ^a

^a By the account which we have of king Saul's death, in the conclusion of the foregoing book, namely, that he 'fell upon his own sword, and expired,' (1 Sam. xxxi. 4.) it seems very evident,

A. M. 2940. A. C. 1055; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4341. A. C. 1070. 2 SAM. i—xix.

Upon this conjuncture, David, ^b by God's directions, removed with his family and forces ^c to Hebron, whither the princes of Judah in a short time, came to congratulate his return into his native country, and to offer him the crown of their particular tribe; for, by this time, Abner the late king's uncle, and general of his army, who had proclaimed his son Ishbosheth successor to the throne, had taken up his residence at ^d Mahanaim, on that the whole story of this Amalekite was a mere fiction of his own inventing, on purpose to ingratiate himself with David, the presumptive successor to the throne. But then the question is, how he came by Saul's crown and bracelet, since it is incongruous to think that he would ever wear them in the time of action, and thereby expose himself as a public mark? As therefore it is presumed, that they were carried into the field of battle by some of his attendants, in order to put on, in case he had obtained the victory, and returned in triumph; so the Jews have a conceit, that Doeg, the infamous murderer of the priests at Nob, 1 Sam. xxii. 18. who at this time was his armour-bearer, had them in his possession, and before he killed himself, gave them to his son, this young Amalekite, and ordered him to carry them to David, but, to his cost, found that David's reception was quite different to what he expected. For being shortly to ascend the throne himself, he was willing to have it believed, that to slay the Lord's anointed, upon any account whatever, was in itself an execrable crime, and therefore, to clear himself from the imputation of being any ways accessory to so foul a fact, as his enemies would have been apt to imagine, had he given countenance to this pretended king-killer, he ordered him immediately to be put to death, and therein at least, acted the part of a good politician, if not of a righteous judge.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries, on 2 Sam. i.

^a 2 Sam. i. 16. The malediction expressed in this passage occurs in the same sense in other passages of Scripture, particularly Josh. ii. 19, 1 Kings ii. 37. It appears to have been customary so to speak, both with the Jews and Greeks, as repeated instances of it are found in the best writers of the last mentioned people. It was usual with the Romans to wash their hands in token of innocence and purity from blood. Thus the Roman governor washed his hands, and said respecting Christ, 'I am innocent of the blood of this just person,' (Mat. xxvii. 24.)—Ed.

^b Though David, after Saul's demise, had a right to the kingdom by virtue of God's designation; yet as God had nowhere declared, at what time he was to make use of this right, he would not enter into possession, nor take the administration of public affairs upon him, without having first consulted him.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c Hebron was situate in the midst of the tribe of Judah; and as it was a very ancient city, the metropolis of the whole tribe, and the possession of those priestly families who espoused David's interest, it was a very commodious city for him to make the place of his residence at this juncture, as being not insensible, that the determination of the metropolis in his favour would be of great weight to influence the whole tribe. And accordingly we find, that he was soon invested with the sovereignty thereof. 'For the men of Judah,' saith the text, 'came, and there they anointed David king over the house of Judah,' 2 Sam. ii. 4.—The History of the Life of King David, vol. 2.

^d This was a place in the tribe of Gad, which had its name from the appearance of an host of angels to Jacob, as he came with his family and all his substance to Padan-aram, (Gen. xxxii. 1.) and the reasons for Abner's retreating thither, in the beginning of the new king's reign, were, that he might secure the people on that side of the Jordan, and especially the gallant inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, who were great lovers of Saul, and attached to his family; that he might prevent the Philistines the other side of Jordan, and by his interest and great authority, prevailed with all the other tribes to recognize him.

David, however, at the request of the princes of his own tribe, was anointed king of Judah. For two years there were no hostilities on either side; but not long after this, a war commenced between the two rival princes, in which there were several engagements, but none so remarkable, as that which was occasioned by Abner's sending Joab who was the general of David's forces, a challenge ^e to fight twelve men, with an equal number of his, in single combat. The men met, and to a man killed one another upon the spot; whereupon a fierce battle ensued, in which Abner and his men were defeated, and put to flight. In the pursuit, Asahel, a younger brother of Joab's, being very nimble and swift of foot, made after Abner. When he came up with him, Abner, who knew him, desired him to desist, and not pretend to attack him, because he was loath to kill him; but the young man, ambitious of taking a general prisoner, pressed so hard upon him, that, ^f with a back-stroke of his spear, Abner gave him a wound, whereof he immediately died.

The victorious army, when they came to the place where Asahel's body lay slain, stood still, and ceased their pursuit; so that Abner had an opportunity to rally his scattered forces, and making a stand upon an advanced ground, where he could not well be attacked, sounded a parley, and reminded Joab, that they were all brethren, of the same nation, of the same religion, so that if they persisted in hostilities, both armies would have reason to rue it. Whereupon they parted, Abner who had lost three hundred and sixty men in the engagement, to Mahanaim, on the other side of Jordan, and Joab, who, except his brother Asahel, had lost no more than nineteen, to Hebron.

During the course of this civil war, which lasted for some years, David's forces, in most rencounters, had the advantage, and his interest in the nation increased, as that of Ishbosheth sensibly declined. Abner indeed, as being both a brave and experienced warrior, and a man of a great power and influence in all the tribes, more especially in that of Benjamin, was his main support; but with him he unhappily differed, upon account of Rizpah, one of Saul's concubines, whom Abner had debauched. To have any commerce with the relicts of princes of what denomination soever they were, was, in from falling upon the king, whom he had under his protection, in the infancy of this reign; and chiefly, that he might be at a great distance from David, have the new king more absolutely under his command, and a better opportunity of raising recruits among a people, not only brave and courageous, but very well affected to the cause which he had espoused.—Calmel's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^e The expression in the text is, 'let the young men now arise, and play before us.' By which Abner seems to have meant, not that they should fall upon, and destroy one another, but merely that they should practise a little their military exercises, or play at sharps, as gladiators anciently at Rome, and now among us, are wont to do, not with any purpose to kill one another, but only to divert the spectators.—Calmel's Commentary.

^f The expression in the text is, 'that with the hinder part of the spear, he smote him under the fifth rib;' which Virgil, speaking of a mortal wound, has not unhappily imitated: "Immediately he seized his spear and hurled it at the very life's citadel, where the ribs guard the heart."—Æneid, l. 2.

these days, looked upon as an indignity offered to the royal family, and an ^a affectation of the kingdom. For this reason Ishbosheth remonstrated the matter to Abner; but Abner, who was a hot man, and impatient of reproof, was so incensed at what he said, that he upbraided him with ingratitude, and threatened not only to ^b withdraw his own allegiance from him, but, as far as in him lay, to carry all Israel over to David's interest. And as he threatened, so he did. From that very moment he entered into a private correspondence with David, and not long after, had a public interview with him. At this interview David entertained Abner and his attendants which were in all but twenty persons, very splendidly; and, in return, Abner assured him, that he would use his utmost endeavours to prevail with the other tribes to come over to his side. But no sooner was he gone, than Joab, returning from an expedition against the Philistines, wherein he had been successful and taken abundance of spoil, and being soon informed that Abner had been there, and how kindly the king had received him, not only expostulated the matter with the king in high terms, as having entertained a man that came only as a spy upon him, but sent likewise a messenger after Abner, desiring him to return, because the king had something more to communicate to him; and so, having waylaid him, under pretence of saluting him, he stabbed him to the heart, ^c out of jealousy partly, and partly in revenge of the blood of his brother Asahel.

David was extremely displeas'd at this cruel and inhospitable action; but his affairs were in so unsettled a

^a What notion the world, at this time, had of marrying any royal relief, is evident from the case of Adonijah, whom Solomon put to death for desiring but to ask for Abishag, one of David's concubines, though he had employed Bath-sheba, the king's mother, to be his intercessor, and was himself his brother, (1 Kings ii. 17.) It may be said perhaps, that Adonijah was at this time aspiring at the throne, which Solomon perceiving, took occasion from this his request, to fall out with him, and prevent it. But however this be, a general rule it was, not among the Jews only, but among other nations, that no private person should presume to marry the king's widow; for this made him appear as a rival and competitor for the crown.—Calmet's Commentary.

^b Abner is an instance of what a strange alteration the study of revenge will work in a man. It was but just lately that we found him going about the country to confirm the Israelites in their attachment to the house of Saul, and opposition to David; but now, upon a slight disgust, he is not only for deserting himself, but for carrying all the strength of his interest over to the opposite party. For, "such is the genius of many great ministers," says one, "that upon slight occasions, they are irritated, and do rather rule over kings, than are ruled by them."—Patrick's Commentary.

^c Abner was a man longer versed in military affairs than himself, who, in the time of Saul's distraction, had been regent of the nation, and, since the time that he had set up Ishbosheth to be king, prime minister. And therefore Joab had reason to suspect, that in case he once got into David's favour, as the service he was able to do him, gave him a title to it, it would not be long before he would gain a superior ascendancy: and therefore he took this wicked method to prevent him. For to use the reflection which Josephus makes upon this occasion. "What will men not dare to do, who are covetous, ambitious, and will be inferior to none? They press forward to the end, without ever considering the means, and will commit a thousand crimes in pursuit of what they desire. Nor are they less bold in maintaining, than they were in acquiring their places and preferments by evil practices: insomuch that, rather than suffer the disgrace of losing what they have unjustly gotten, they will plunge themselves still deeper and deeper in wickedness, to retain it."—Jewish Antiq. b. 7. c. 1.

state, and Joab, at that time, had so much credit with the army, that he could not call him to an account for what he had done. And therefore contented himself with declaring publicly ^d his detestation of it, and with making a magnificent funeral for Abner, wherein he himself followed the corpse as chief mourner.

David indeed had reason to lament the death of Abner, which, in all probability, had defeated the measures that were concerted for the union of the two kingdoms, had not the sudden and untimely death of Ishbosheth paved the way for it afresh. Ishbosheth, upon the loss of Abner, began to despair of his affairs, grew negligent of himself, and fell under the contempt of his subjects; so that Rechab and Baanah, ^e two Benjaminites, that were of his household, came upon him, as he was asleep in the heat of the day, and having cut off his head, ^f carried it as a present to David at Hebron; but instead of the reward which they expected, he ^g rebuked them

^d And good reason he had to express his detestation of so foul a fact. For besides that Abner was himself a man of great power and authority, and at this time, the head of the contrary party, it carried an air of suspicion, that David might have some concern in the murder; especially since Joab, his first minister, and general of his forces, was the wicked instrument of it. Abner had been reconciled to David indeed; but this made the matter still worse, and added the breach of faith and hospitality to the sin of murder, which was enough to alienate the minds of the Israelites from him for ever. And therefore Josephus gives us this account of David's behaviour upon so critical an occasion, not only to testify his abhorrence of so base a practice, but to purge himself likewise, upon the strictest niceties of faith and honour, that he had been true to Abner. "The moment he heard of Abner's death, he stretched out his right hand towards heaven in an appeal and protestation, that he was neither privy, nor consenting to the fact, and cursed most bitterly the assassin, whoever he was, his family, and accomplices. He appointed, by proclamation, a public mourning for him, with all the solemnities of tearing garments, and putting on sackcloth, &c. Himself, with his great ministers, and officers, assisted at the funeral, and gave sufficient demonstration, by wringing their hands, beating their breasts, and other expressions of sorrow, both of the veneration they had for Abner's memory, and the sense they had of so inestimable a loss; so that, in the conclusion, all the people were perfectly satisfied that David was far either from approving or consenting to so execrable a deed."—Jewish Antiq. b. 7. c. 1; Le Clerc's Commentary.

^e This is added, to show us, that these two regicides were not only officers in the king's army, but of the same tribe with Saul, and therefore had more ties than one upon them, to be honest and faithful to his family. For there is reason to believe, that Saul, who lived in the borders of Benjamin, conferred more favours upon that tribe than any other, and might therefore justly expect, both to him and his, a greater esteem and fidelity from those of his own tribe, than from others. This patronymic is therefore very properly prefixed to the names of Rechab and Baanah, to show what vile ungrateful villains they were, and how justly they deserved the severe and exemplary punishment which David inflicted on them.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^f It may seem a little strange, that these two ruffians were not discouraged by David's punishing the Amalekite for killing Saul, and by the detestation he had publicly shown of Joab's baseness in murdering Abner; but the former of these cases, they might think, was not parallel to theirs; because Saul was anointed king by God's immediate direction, whereas Ishbosheth, having never had such sacred unction, was no more than a usurper; and as for the latter, they might think, that David's conduct in relation to Abner's death, proceeded from art and policy, rather than any serious dislike of the thing itself; and in this opinion, they might the rather be confirmed, when they saw Joab, instead of being punished, continuing in the very same post and power that he had before.—Poole's Annotations.

^g The manner in which Josephus makes David express himself upon this occasion, is to this effect:—"Wicked wretches severely, and ordered their hands and feet to be cut off, and themselves hung up in a public place, for the terror of all regicides; but the head of Ishbosheth was honourably interred in Abner's tomb.

A. M. 1949. A. C. 1055; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4341. A. C. 1070. 2 SAM. I.—XXX.

When Ishbosheth was dead, all the tribes of Israel sent their deputies to David, acknowledging his title, and promising him their allegiance, upon condition that he would reign righteously ^a over them; so that now he was anointed king over all the tribes, after that he had reigned at Hebron, over that of Judah only, for the space of seven years and six months.

Being thus invested with full regal power, and having ^b a multitude of brave and gallant officers to attend him, he made his first expedition against Jerusalem, to dispossess the Jebusites of the fort of Zion, which commanded the city, and was thought so impregnable, that when he summoned the besieged to surrender, they, in that you are! prepare yourselves immediately to receive the just reward of your villany. Do not you know that I required the murder of Saul, when he, who had taken away that sacred life, had the confidence to bring me his golden crown, for an ostentation of the service he had done me in it? And yet it was at the instance of Saul that he did it, and to prevent the indignity of his being taken alive by his enemies. And am not I the same man now that I was then? or do you think that I am turned so abandoned a wretch since, as to countenance the most profligate of men and actions, or to account myself under any obligation to you, for dipping your hands, upon my account, as you would have it thought, in the blood of your lord; for cutting the throat of a person, and in his bed too, so just, that he never did any man wrong, and so generous a patron and benefactor to your ungrateful selves, that all the advantages you can pretend to in this world, are but what you stand indebted for to his bounty and goodness? You shall therefore now be sure to pay, both for your breach of faith to your master, and the scandal you have cast upon me. For what greater wound can any man give me in my reputation, than to expose me for a person that can take pleasure in the tidings, or give countenance to the committing of so barbarous an assassination." (Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 2.) Which speech of David's has a good deal of the spirit of Alexander the Great in it, whose exacting of punishment of Bessus for his murder of Darius, drew from the historian this reflection: "For he thought that Darius had not been so much the foe as the friend of him by whom he was slain."—Justin, b. 12. c. 6.

^a This was David's part of the covenant, which the elders of Israel suggested to him in a very elegant metaphor, which here occurs the first time, though afterwards it is frequently used in sacred writ, especially in the prophets, as well as some profane authors. The expression is "Thou shalt feed my people Israel;" which was the rather made use of, to put David in mind that he was created a king, not so much for the advancement of his own honour and interest, as for the good and benefit of the community, which he was to rule with all tenderness, and watch over with all diligence. The very manner of the expression implies, that kings ought to have the same care for their people, as the shepherd has over his flock; and that, as the shepherd is not the owner of the sheep he keeps, so should no king look upon his subjects as his own peculium, but as a flock committed to him by the only true Lord of all mankind, and to whom he must give an account of his administration. "For this is the greatest grace of a king, that he certainly believes himself to be made a king by God, for the sake of the people; and let him often call to mind, that the people were not created, or ordained, by God for the king," says Conradus Pellicanus upon these words.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^b In this account of David's worthies, which are mentioned both in the second book of Samuel, and the first of Chronicles, there is a great difference of names; and the reason is, because the catalogue in Chronicles was made in the beginning of David's reign, that in Samuel, at the latter end; and so the former mentions those men who had helped David to his settlement in the kingdom, whereas the latter takes notice of those who had stuck to him all the time of his reign, and died in his service.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 5. c. 5.

derision, replied, that the meanest of them all, ^c their blind and lame, were able to defend it against all he could do. This incensed David to such a degree, that he caused proclamation to be made through the camp, that whoever first took the fort, should be made captain-general of all his forces; whereupon Joab, who was a bold, pushing man, undertook to storm it, and carried it sword in hand. After this, David, for the reception of his guards and domestics, enlarged the buildings of the place, and made it his royal palace; while Joab repaired and beautified the old city Jebus, or Jerusalem, for the more commodious habitation of his subjects.

^d Hiram, who had lately made himself king of Tyre and Sidon, hearing how prosperous David was in all his affairs, sent an embassy to congratulate his accession to the throne, and withal a present of cedar trees, with carpenters and other artificers to assist him in his buildings. But the Philistine princes had other notions of David's growing greatness, which they took for a sure presage of their own downfall; and therefore to put a stop to it as soon as possible, they raised one great army, which, as they approached to Jerusalem, he defeated; and the next year, when they came ^e with a much larger, God manifestly interposed in his favour. For instead of advancing directly upon them, he ordered him to take a

^c The blind and the lame, says Luther upon this place, were the idols of the Jebusites, which, to irritate David, they set upon their walls, as their patrons and protectors; and these they call blind and lame sarcastically, and with respect to David's opinion; as if they had said, "These gods of ours, whom ye Israelites reproach as blind and lame, and so unable to direct or defend us, will secure us against you, and to your cost, make you find that they are neither blind nor lame, but have eyes to watch for us, and hands to fight against you, so that you must conquer and subdue them, before you take this place." But this interpretation seems to be a little too metaphorical and forced, for which reason we have rather chosen the construction which Josephus (b. 7. c. 2.) puts upon this passage, namely, that they imagined their fortress to be so impregnable, that by way of contempt, they told David that their very blind and lame would be able to defend it against him and all his forces; and this is a sense so extremely plain and obvious, that the renowned Bochart wonders why any man of learning should seek for any other. The only exception to it is, that these blind and lame (which were rather objects of compassion) are said to have been extremely hated by David. But we may observe, that David here retorts the sarcasm upon them; "the lame and blind," that is, those who are said to defend the place, and who, as they pretended, were to be only the lame and the blind. And these were hateful to David, because they had wickedly and insolently defied the armies of the living God.—Poole's Annotations; Patrick's and Le Clerc's Commentaries.

^d Abibalus was his primitive name, but before he entered into a league of amity with David, he changed it to Hiram, that so it might be the standing name of him and his successors, as Pharaoh, and after that Ptolemy in Egypt, Abimelech among the Philistines, and Caesar among the Roman emperors. The name in their language signifies, "he lives that is exalted;" or, "let him live who is exalted," that is, "let the king live for ever;" and his sending to David only under this name, is the true reason why no other name is mentioned in Scripture.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 5. c. 4.

^e It cannot well be supposed, that the Philistines, out of their small territories, could produce such vast numbers of men as they brought against the Israelites; and therefore the remark, which Josephus makes, helps to explain this matter, namely "That Syria and Phœnicia, as well as several other warlike nations, were engaged in the confederacy;" but this cannot be meant of Hiram, who was in a league of the strictest amity with David, but of such Phœnicians only as would not submit to him, and therefore joined with the Philistines, first to subdue his ally, and then to subdue him, before his government could be settled.—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 5. c. 4.

compass round by a wood of mulberry trees, which would cover and conceal his march, and when he heard a sound, or rushing in the trees, which would affrighten the Philistines, then to fall upon them; which he accordingly did, and gave them so total a defeat, that for many years after, they never pretended to give Israel any more disturbance.

This time of rest, and public security, David thought a proper season, wherein to bring home the ark of God, which for almost fifty years had continued in the house of Abinadab, into a place which he had prepared for it in his own city. To this purpose, attended with the a principal men of the nation, and the chief officers of his court, together with a strong guard for the convoy of the ark, in case any enemy should attempt to surprise them, he came to Kirjath-jearim: but, either through inadvertency, or neglect of the 1 divine law, which obliged them to carry it upon men's shoulders, they in imitation of the Philistines, put it in a cart, and when the cart had like to have been overturned, Uzzah, who was one of its drivers, taking hold of the ark to prevent its falling, was immediately struck dead upon the spot; so that David, terrified at this judgment, durst not at that time carry it into Jerusalem, but left it near the city, in the house of Obed-Edom, a Levite, whom God blessed with a large increase of all his substance, for the little time that it continued with him. In the space of three months, the king, recollecting that none were to carry the ark but the Levites, though they themselves were expressly forbidden 2 to touch it, he adventured to remove it from Obed-Edom's, which he did in great form and solemnity. The Levites, who were to bear the ark on their shoulders, he caused to be sanctified; himself, clothed in a linen ephod, and b dancing before it, brought it into a convenient place which he had prepared for it; offered a great quantity of c sacrifices upon a It is supposed by some, that this bringing back of the ark was appointed to be one of the great festivals; and the reason why David might summon so many of his principal ministers and officers to accompany him in the expedition, might be, to possess the young people, who perhaps had heard little or nothing of the ark, by reason of its having been absent so long, with a mighty veneration for it when they saw the king, and so many of the chief nobility waiting on it, with such a variety of music, and such public declarations of joy.—Miller's History of the Church.

1 Num. iv. 15.

b Strabo tells us, that it was customary among the Greeks, as well as other nations, to use music and dancing in the processions before their gods, (b. 10.) Callimachus mentions the chori, and dances of the youth at the altar of Apollo: Plato observes that among the Egyptians, all kinds of music, songs and dances were consecrated to their gods; (De legibus, b. 3.) And even Lucian (De Saltatione) expressly says that among the ancients, no ceremonial of religion, no expiation, no atonement was accounted rightly accomplished without dancing. So that David was far from being singular in his behaviour upon this occasion: nor was his behaviour, in this particular, any disparagement to his regal dignity. His dancing, that is, his moving in certain serious and solemn measures, suited to music of the same character and tendency, was an exercise highly conducive to the purposes of piety, and his mixing with the public festivities of his people, was a condescension, as Tacitus relates of Augustus the Roman emperor, not unbecoming the greatest monarch. Policy taught Augustus to put himself upon a level with his subjects in the public rejoicings; piety taught David, that all men are upon a level in the solemnities of religion. So that David was not singular in his behaviour upon this occasion.—Patrick's Commentary, and The History of the Life of King David, vol. 2.

c The words in the text are, 'And it was so, that when they

this occasion; and, with the rest of the company that attended this solemnity, feasted and rejoiced.

d His wife Michal, who was Saul's daughter, and proud perhaps on account of her pedigree, e upbraided him upon this occasion with his humility, as a diminution of his regal dignity; but he, in reply to the sarcastic manner wherein she spake it, only told her, "That what he had done was in honour of that God, who had chosen him to govern Israel rather than any of her family; and that such condescensions as these would never bring him under any just contempt."

that bare the ark of the Lord had gone six paces, he sacrificed oxen and fatlings,' (2 Sam. vi. 13.) From which words some would infer, that David, having measured the ground between Obed-Edom's house, and the place he had built for the reception of the ark, had altars raised at the distance of every six paces, wherein he caused sacrifices to be offered, as the ark passed by. But it is easy to imagine, what a world of confusion this would create in the procession; and therefore the more rational construction is, that after those who carried the ark had advanced six paces, without any such token of divine wrath as Uzza had undergone, then did they offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving to God, which might consist of several living creatures, all sacrificed and offered up at once. But, even supposing, that, at set distances, there were sacrifices all along the way that they went; yet we are to know, that it was no unusual thing for heathens to confer on their gods, nay, even upon their emperors, the same honours that we find David here bestowing upon the ark of the God of Israel. For in this manner, as Suetonius tells us, was Otho received, "when during all the journey on his right and left, victims were slain by the inhabitants of towns." And the like he relates of Caligula: "When he left Misenum, he proceeded through a dense body of persons meeting him, and surrounded by altars, and victims, and burning torches."—Cabinet's Commentary.

d After that David was by Saul banished from court, and forced to seek for shelter in foreign countries, Saul, to cast the more contempt upon him, gave his wife away to one Phalti, or Phaltiel, son of Laish of Gallim; but David, when he came to the crown of Judah, had her restored to him again; for which purposes he sent messengers to Ishbosheth, who then reigned over the eleven tribes at Mahanaim, to demand her, and who, according to that demand, took her from Phaltiel, and sent her back to David. The Hebrews pretend that Phaltiel never came near Michal, who, in strictness, could not be his wife, because she had never been divorced by David; but others believe, that she had five sons by Phaltiel, which were given up to the Gibeonites to be executed, (2 Sam. xxi. 8, 9.) But, in this place there seems to be an error crept into the text, which should be read Merob instead of Michal.—Cabinet's Dictionary, under the word Michal.

e The words of Michal, wherein she upbraids David, are these: 'How glorious was the king of Israel to-day, who uncovered himself to-day, in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself?' (2 Sam. vi. 20.) At first reading, they seem to intimate, that David, in his dancing, had exposed his naked body, and acted some way or other immodestly. But these words, we are to consider, were spoken in a fit of passion, and when Michal was minded to aggravate matters: for it is not to be doubted, but that David kept himself within the bounds of modesty, how joyous soever he might be. It was a command which God gave the Israelites, that they should rejoice in their feasts, (Deut. xii. 7.) but then, their joy was not to be lascivious or petulant, but pious and moderate. In the case before us, David was in the more immediate presence of God, and about a very sacred business; and therefore it is incongruous to think, that he would commit any thing immodest. And, that he could not expose his nakedness, as his wife would insinuate, is evident from his having not only an ephod on, but being clothed with a robe of fine linen, besides his usual under garments, (1 Chron. xv. 27.) and therefore, though his putting off his regal robes might give some occasion to Michal's expression of his 'uncovering himself,' yet it must be owned, that this opprobrious term proceeded from nothing but the overflowing spleen of a proud passionate woman.—Cabinet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

By this time the palace, which Hiram king of Tyre had furnished David with men and materials to build, was finished; and, as he was reflecting upon the meanness of God's habitation in comparison of his own, it came into his mind to build a noble fabric for his religious worship, which design he communicated to ^a Nathan. Nathan at first approved of it; but the night following, he was commanded to forbid it, with this assurance, that God accepted of his sincere intentions; promised that his son should succeed him, and build him a temple; and that his posterity should reign ^b for many generations.

David was a man of war, and therefore, since God had refused him the privilege of building him a temple, and had reserved that work for his son Solomon, whose name denotes peaceable, to execute, he thought himself bound to subdue all his enemies on every side, that, when his son came to undertake that great affair, he might meet with as little molestation as possible.

In the beginning of his reign, the Philistines had twice invaded him, and therefore he began with them. Their royal city of Gath, which was called Motheg-Ammah, or the bridge of Ammah, because it stood upon a hill of that name, and was a bridle to curb the tribe of Judah, and keep them in obedience, he took and made it a barrier against themselves. The Moabites he utterly subdued; and, having dismantled all their strong places, he ^c slew the greater part of them, reserving such only as were requisite to till the ground. From hence he

^a At what time this prophet began to appear in Israel, we are nowhere informed. This is the first time that the scripture makes mention of him. He was a man of great temper, prudence, and fine address, who knew to mitigate the rigour of his reproofs with a great deal of sweetness and wisdom, which qualified him so well for the conversation of kings, and other great persons. He was always equally esteemed and beloved by David, and, in his conduct towards him, maintained a just medium between an intemperate austerity and a servile flattery.—Calmel's Commentary.

^b The words in the text are, 'I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever?' which, in their primary sense, do relate to the terrestrial kingdom of David's family, and the long duration of it, enough to justify the expression 'for ever,' taken in a less strict signification. But if we take it in a more sublime and absolute sense, it can belong to none but that Son of David, to whom God the Father gave an eternal kingdom, properly so called, over all things both in heaven and earth, which though it was not so well known in the times when this prophecy was uttered, was, by the event afterwards, made plain and evident.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^c There is no small obscurity in the words of the text, which are these: 'He smote Moab, and measured them with a line, casting them down to the ground; even in two lines measured he to put to death, and with one line to keep alive.' Which words seem to allude to a custom among the kings of the east, when they were thoroughly incensed against any nation, namely, to make the captives all come together in one place, and prostrate themselves upon the ground; that, being divided into two parts, as it were with a line, their conqueror might appoint which part he pleased either for death or life, which was sometimes determined by casting of lots. Some are of opinion, that David made three lots or parts of these Moabites, two of which he ordered to be slain, and one part only to be kept alive. The reason of this severity against this miserable people, the rabbins assure us, was, because they had slain his parents and brethren, whom he had committed to the custody of the king of Moab during his exile. But of the reality of this motive there is no manner of appearance; and since this execution which David inflicted may relate either to the whole nation, or the army only, to clear David from the imputation of too much cruelty we should rather conceive it of the third, or half part at most, of the army. — Le Clerc's and Calmel's Commentaries.

marched his army to secure his territories, which bordered upon the Euphrates. The Syrians of Zobah, under the command of ^d Hadadezer, came with a strong force, and gave him battle: but he soon routed them, and, besides a great number of foot prisoners, took a thousand chariots, and seven thousand horsemen that attended them; but, reserving to himself no more horses than were necessary for an hundred chariots, the rest he hamstringed, to make them unserviceable for war. ^e The Syrians of Damascus, hearing of Hadadezer's ill success, came to his assistance. But David put them to the rout likewise, and having slain two and twenty thousand of them, he became master of their country; put garrisons into their fortified cities, and made them tributary; and (what was another victory in this expedition) in his return from Syria, he engaged a great body of Edomites ^f in the valley of salt, slew eighteen thousand of them, and brought them under the like subjection.

Thus loaded with honour and spoils David returned from this campaign; but all the rich materials that he had compiled together, namely, gold, silver, and brass, he dedicated to the Lord, or laid them up for the future use of the temple. And, what was no small addition to his store, Toi, the king of Hamath, hearing of his victories, sent his own son to congratulate him thereupon, and, in a large present of vessels of gold, and vessels of silver, &c., to acknowledge his kindness in breaking the power of his most inveterate enemies.

All the while that David was thus engaged in foreign wars, he took care to have justice administered to his subjects at home, and a certain number of very great

^d In the fragment of Nicolaus Damascus, which Josephus has preserved, this prince is simply called Adad, which was the common name of the kings of Syria, who, according to the manner of other eastern princes, took their titles from the celestial bodies, and, in their language, Adad signifies the sun. The fragment, recorded by Josephus is to this effect. "A long time after, one Adad, a valiant man, and a native of the place, had the command of Damascus and Syria, Phoenicia only excepted. There happened to be a war between the same Adad and David the king of the Jews, and several encounters between them; but, in the end Adad was overcome at Euphrates, behaving himself with the resolution of a brave prince and a great captain." The same author, speaking further of his posterity, says, "That the government was handed down from father to son to the tenth generation, and that the successor still received the father's name with the empire, as the Ptolemies did among the Egyptians."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 6.

^e Aram Damasek, which we translate Syria of Damascus, was that part of Syria which lay between Libanus and Antilibanus, whose chief city was Damascus, situate in a valley, called by several names in Scripture, and watered by five rivers, the two principal of which, namely, Abana and Parphar, (mentioned in 2 Kings v. 12.) descended from mount Hermon; whereof the latter washed the walls of Damascus, and the other ran through it, and divided the city into two parts.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f The valley of salt here is thought by many to be the place adjoining to the Dead sea. But, as the country of the Edomites, whom David subdued in his return from his expedition into Syria, must necessarily lie towards the east of Canaan, we must look for some other valley of salt in the confines of that country. Now, about a league southward from the city of Palmyra, or Tadmor, in the road to Edom, we find a large plain abounding with salt pits, whence a great part of Syria is furnished with that commodity; and therefore it is very probable, that the battle between David's generals and the Edomites was fought in this plain: which is about two days' journey from Bozrah, the capital city of the eastern Edom, whence the people might march out to meet David's forces, and oppose them in their return home.—Calmel's Commentary.

men employed in the highest offices of trust. Joab, as we said before, was captain-general; Jehoshaphat,^a chancellor of the kingdom; Abiathar, was high priest; Seraiah, secretary of state; Benaiah,^b captain of his guard; and his own sons, the prime ministers of his household, such as lord chamberlain, lord treasurer, lord steward, as we call them; and to these he added one more, Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, to whom he restored all his grandfather Saul's estate; and though he was a cripple,^c and lame of both his feet, yet, for the love he had for his father, he entertained him with great kindness, and ordered him to sit with his own sons at the royal table every day.

David, not long after this, hearing that his d old friend

a The word in our translation is recorder, which in the marginal note, is remembrancer, or writer of chronicles; an employment of no mean estimation in the eastern world, where it was customary with kings to keep daily registers of all the transactions of their reigns; and a trust, which, however discharged to purpose, must be let into the true springs and secrets of action, and consequently must be received into the inmost confidence. For whether the office of a lord chancellor was consistent with the constitution of the Jewish state, a modern author seems to doubt.—History of the Life of King David, vol. 2.

b These guards are called in the text 'the Cherethites and the Pelethites'; but who they were, is variously conjectured. That they were soldiers, is evident, from their being mentioned as present at the proclamation of king Solomon, against Adonijah, which could not conveniently have been done without some armed force, to protect the persons who proclaimed him: and that they were not common soldiers, but the constant guards of David's person, is manifest from the title of Σαματοφύλακας, keepers of the body, which Josephus gives them. Some are of opinion, that they were men of a gigantic stature; but we find no ground for that, though they were doubtless proper and robust men, as we speak, and of known fidelity to their prince, (2 Sam. xv. 18. and xx. 7.) Others again, think that they were Philistines; but it is hardly supposable, that David would have any of these hated uncircumcised people to be his body guard, neither can we believe, that the Israelitish soldiers would have taken it patiently, to see foreigners of that nation put in such places of honour and trust. Cherethite, however, is certainly but another name for Philistine, as appears from Zephaniah ii. 5.; and therefore the question is, how came any of David's subjects to be called after that name? And the answer to this is obvious,—They were so called, because they went at first with him into Philistia, and continued there with him, all the time that he was under the protection of Achish. These were the persons who accompanied him from the beginning, in his utmost distress, and clung to him in all calamities; and therefore it is no wonder, if men of such approved fidelity were made choice of for his body guards; nor is it any uncommon thing in history, for legions, or bands of soldiers, to take their names, not from the place of their nativity, but their residence, and very frequently from the name of their captain or commander. Since therefore, in 1 Chron. xii. 3. we find mention made of one Pelet, the son of Azmaveth, who resorted to David while he was at Ziklag, but still under the protection of Achish, it is but supposing him to be their captain, and then we come to the reason why they were called Pelethites, unless we suppose them rather denominated from Peleth son of Jonathan, who was of the king's own tribe.—Patrick's Commentary; Pool's Annot.; and The History of the Life of King David.

c Mephibosheth was very young when his father Jonathan was killed at the battle of Gilboa, which put his nurse into so great a consternation, that she let the child fall, as she was making haste to escape with him, and from that time he was lame of both feet for ever after.—2 Sam. iv. 4.

d What the particular benefits which David had received from Nahash were, we are no where told in Scripture; but some of the Jews say, that he fled to him, when he durst stay no longer with Achish king of the Philistines, and that he received him very kindly; others, that he entertained his relations when the king of Moab, to whom he had committed them, slew some of them: but the most likely opinion is, that as he was a bitter enemy to Saul, who had given him a great overthrow, he, for that very Nahash was dead, sent his compliments of condolence to his son and successor Hanun; but the great men that were about the young king, made him believe, that the sole intent of David's sending this embassy was to spy out the weakness of the city, and in what place it might most advantageously be assaulted: so that the too credulous prince ordered the ambassadors to be treated in the most ignominious manner, and with e their beards half-shaved, and their clothes cut short, even to the middle of their buttocks, to be sent about their business.

The ambassadors being ashamed to return home, were ordered to continue at Jericho, until their beards grew again; but as for the indignity put upon them, David gave them assurance that he would resent it in a proper manner. Accordingly he sent an army under the command of Joab, to call these inhospitable Ammonites to an account. The Ammonites were apprised of his design, and therefore provided against the worst, by procuring 33,000 mercenaries of the Syrians, who lay encamped at some distance in the fields, whilst their own forces covered the city.

Upon this situation of the enemy, Joab divided his army into two bodies, one of which he gave to his brother Abishai, to keep the Ammonites in play, while himself with the other, which consisted of his choice men, attacked the Syrians. Their agreement was, to relieve each other, in case there was occasion: but Joab, at the first onset, charged the Syrians so home, that as they were but mercenaries, and thought not the cause their own, they soon gave way, which made the Ammonites, who depended much upon their courage, endeavour to secure themselves by retreating into their city; for the season of the year being too far advanced, made it impracticable for Joab to besiege it.

Hadadezer had assisted the Ammonites, with some forces the last campaign; and being apprehensive that David would fall foul upon him, he resolved to be be-reason, became a friend to David, when he perceived how Saul persecuted him, and thereupon might send him relief and assistance, and perhaps offer him protection in his kingdom.—Patrick's Commentary.

e This was one of the greatest indignities that the malice of man could invent, in those countries where all people thought their hair so great an ornament, that some would rather have submitted to die than part with it. What a foul disgrace and heavy punishment this was accounted in ancient times, we may learn from Nicolaus Damascenus, as mentioned by Stobæus, (tit. 42.) who says, that among the Indians, the king commanded the greatest offenders to be shaven, as the heaviest punishment that he could inflict upon them; and to the like purpose Plutarch (in Agesil.) tells us, that whenever a soldier, among the Lacedæmonians, was convicted of cowardice, he was obliged to go with one part of his upper lip shaved, and the other not. Nay, even at this day, no greater indignity can be offered to a man of Persia, than to cause his beard to be shaved; and therefore Tavernier, in his travels, relates the story, that when the sophi caused an ambassador of Aureng-zeh's to be used in this manner, telling him that he was not worthy to wear a beard, the emperor, even in the manner that David here did, most highly resented the affront that was done to him in the person of his ambassador. And as shaving David's ambassadors, was deservedly accounted a grievous affront, so the cutting off half the beard, which made them look still more ridiculous, was a great addition to it, where beards were held in great veneration; and where long habits down to the heels were worn, especially by persons of distinction, without any breeches or drawers, the cutting their garments, even to the middle, thereby to expose their nakedness, was such a brutal and shameful insult, as would badly become a man of David's martial spirit, and just sentiments of honour, to have tamely passed by.—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries.

forehand with him. To this purpose levying a vast army, not only in Syria, but in Mesopotamia likewise, he sent it, under the command of Shobach his general, over the river Euphrates, as far as Helam, a town in the borders of the half tribe of Manasseh. This David had soon intelligence of, and therefore uniting all his forces, he marched with the utmost expedition, and coming upon the enemy sooner than was expected, slew seven thousand men, who attended seven hundred chariots; which so disheartened the rest, that he soon despatched forty thousand more, together with their general, who fell in the action, and died upon the spot. Upon this success, several petty kings who had assisted Hadadezer in this expedition, fearing some worse consequence, made a peace with David, and became tributary to him; and even Hadadezer himself, being thus forsaken by his confederates, gave him assurance that he would no longer espouse the cause of the Ammonites, but leave them to shift for themselves. Whereupon David sent Joab against them with a powerful army, who laid the country waste, destroyed all that came in his way, and to make short of the matter, laid siege to their royal city of Rabbah.

While Joab was carrying on the siege of Rabbah, David continued in Jerusalem, and walking one evening ^a on the top of his palace to take the fresh air, he chanced to ^b espy a beautiful woman bathing herself in her garden. The unguarded king, as soon as he saw her, was smitten; and inquiring who she was, was informed that she was Bathsheba, the daughter of Amniel, and wife of Uriah ^c the Hittite, an officer in his army, who was then with Joab at the siege of Rabbah. David sent for her, lay with her, and dismissed her. But, in a short time, finding herself with child, she apprized him of it, and desired him withal to consult her honour and

^a The manner of building, in all eastern countries, was to have their houses flat-roofed, with a terrace and parapet wall, for the convenience of walking in the cool air; and as David's palace was built on one of the highest places of Mount Zion, he might easily look down upon the lower parts of the town, and take a view of all the gardens that were within due distance.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^b Thus Jupiter is said to have seen Proserpina washing herself, and exposing her whole body to his view, which inflamed his lust after her. But whether it was in her garden, or courtyard, overlooked by the palace, or in some apartment in her house, whose windows opened that way, that this woman bathed herself, it is not so certain. Tradition points out the place of a fountain still called after her name, which would make it probable that she bathed in a garden, did not Josephus expressly declare that it was in her own house, as indeed the natural modesty and decency of her sex, as well as the circumstance of the time, for then it was evening, make his account more probable; nor can it be doubted, but that the declining rays of the sun, shooting into the inmost recesses of her chamber, and throwing a great lustre around her, might discover her very clearly to very distant eyes, without the least suspicion on her part, of any possibility of being seen, and consequently with all the reserve of modesty proper to her sex.—The History of the Life of King David, vol. 3.

^c Uriah, though an Hittite by nation, was proselyted to the Jewish religion, and so marrying with a Jewish woman, lived in Jerusalem; or as he was one of the king's liegeward, which for reasons above mentioned, seem to have been all natives, and of the tribe of Judah, this additional name might perhaps be given him, for some gallant action achieved against the Hittites, in the same manner as a Roman, in after ages, came to be called Africanus, Germanicus, Parthicus, &c., upon account of the victories obtained over the Africans, Germans, or Parthians.—Cabnet's Commentary.

safety in devising some means to conceal it. Hereupon he sent a despatch to Joab for Uriah to come to him, as if he had something particular to inquire of him; but his whole intent was to give him an opportunity of lying with his wife, that so the child, when it was born, might be reputed his. Uriah came; and after the king had asked him some few questions concerning the condition of the army, and the advances of the siege, he ordered him to go home, ^d and refresh himself after his journey, and sent a handsome collation after him for his entertainment. But so it was, that instead of going near his wife, he chose to sleep in the guard room.

David was informed of this the next morning; and was therefore resolved to make use of another expedient. He invited him to sup at his own table, and prevailed with him to drink to such a pitch, that he did not doubt but that the heat of the liquor would have inflamed his appetite, and made him go home to his wife; but still he lay in the guard room, and in excuse to the king, said, that he thought it was his duty so to do, while the rest of the soldiers were encamped. So that finding himself still disappointed, the king ordered him at last back to the army, and ^e sent him with letters to Joab, wherein he commanded him to manage matters so, that Uriah might be killed by the Ammonites, which accordingly came to pass: for in an assault upon the town, Uriah,

^d The words in the text are, 'go down to thy house, and wash thy feet,' (2 Sam. xi. 8.) for in these countries, where it was not the custom to wear shoes, but sandals only, and, in some places to go barefoot, washing the feet was a great refreshment after a journey, and a common compliment that the master of the house usually made to any stranger at his first entrance. But this custom of washing the feet, was not only after a journey, to cleanse them from dirt and dust, but very much used likewise, before people sat down to meat; and therefore David's meaning in the expression is, that Uriah should go down and feast with his wife, for which reason he sent a collation to his house, and after so long an absence, indulge himself in her company. For David's intention hitherto was, neither to murder Uriah, nor marry his wife, but only to screen her honour and his own crime.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^e It may be thought perhaps, that Uriah suspected something of his wife's adultery, and therefore, resolving that it should be discovered, would not be persuaded to go down to his house. But if he did, he certainly acted the part of a trusty servant, when he would not open the king's letter to know what was in it, though, upon supposition that he suspected his criminal commerce with his wife, he had reason to expect no good. This puts one naturally in mind of the story of Bellerophon's carrying letters from Proetus to his father-in-law Jobates, king of Lycia, with an order to kill him; from whom it came into a proverb, to carry Bellerophon's letter or a death warrant against one's self, according to that passage in Plautus: 'Aha! thy son hath now made me a Bellerophon, I myself have brought the warrant for my bondage.'—Bachid. For the fable of Uriah and Bellerophon are so very much alike, that the fable of the latter seems to be founded upon the story of the former. Bellerophon, who, as some scholiasts think, should be read Boulephoron, a council carrier, was a stranger at the court of Proetus, as Uriah being a Hittite, was at the court of David. He declined the embraces of Sthenoboa, as Uriah did the bed of Bathsheba; and was for that reason, sent to Jobates, general of Proetus's army, with letters, which contained a direction to put him to death, as Uriah was sent to Joab, David's general. By Jobates he was sent, with a small guard, upon an attack, in which it was intended, he should be slain, as Uriah was by Joab to that in which he fell. The main of the history is the same in both: the similitude of Jobates and Joab's name is very remarkable; and the variation in the whole only lies in some such ornamental embellishments, as might well be expected in a poetical composition.—Cabnet's Commentary. and The History of the Life of King David.

being deserted by the other soldiers, who had private orders to retire when the onset began, ^a fell immediately by the enemy's sword.

As soon as Uriah was dead, Joab sent an express thereof to the king, who returned him orders to carry on the siege with more vigour, until he had made himself master of it; and then to raze it even to the ground, and to put all the inhabitants to the sword, without sparing so much as one man. Upon this order Joab advanced his approaches, and renewed his assaults every day, until he had got possession of ^b the water works which supplied the town; and then sent a courier to acquaint the king, that the city was reduced to the utmost extremity; was in no condition to hold out much longer, and therefore he desired him to come in person, that he might have the honour of taking it. The king, according to his general's desire, went with a strong reinforcement, took the place by storm, gave the plunder of it to his soldiers, but reserved to himself what belonged to the king, among which was the crown of inestimable value. Having thus wasted the city and divided the spoil, he put the men who had held it out against him, to the most exquisite torments; and other places that would not immediately surrender, he treated with the same severity.

Upon the death of Uriah, his wife ^c Bathsheba pretended to mourn for him; but it was not long before David sent for her, ^d and declared her his wife: and in ^a The fate and fall of the gallant Uriah is thus related by Josephus:—"Joab put Uriah upon a desperate forlorn, and to cover his design, gave him several brave men to back him, with a promise to support him with the whole army, in case there was any possibility of entering the town; and at the same time recommended it earnestly to him, to maintain the reputation he had already acquired with the king and the army, by acquitting himself gallantly upon this occasion. Uriah with great cheerfulness undertook the post, while Joab gave his companions private orders to withdraw, and leave him, as soon as they found themselves in danger. The Hebrews pressed hard upon the wall, and put the Ammonites under a dreadful apprehension, that they would force the town; whereupon the besieged threw open their gates, and made a desperate sally, which was as good as a signal to those that were with Uriah, to abandon him; which accordingly they did, and left him to be cut to pieces. He did all the execution that was possible to be done by one single man against numbers, and after several wounds received, fell like a man of honour, with his face to the enemy."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 7.

^b Some learned men are of opinion, that this royal city of Rabbah was likewise called the 'city of waters,' either because it stood upon a river, or was encompassed with water both for its defence and delight. But Junius renders it, that "he cut off the waters which supplied the town;" which translation not only Josephus seems to favour by telling us, that Joab seized on all the aqueducts which led into the city; but Polybius (b. 5.) likewise, speaking of the siege of this same place by Antiochus, relates the story, how a certain deserter discovered to that prince a subterraneous passage through which the besieged came to draw water, which Antiochus stopped up, and by reason of their thirst compelled them to surrender.—Poole's Annotations, and Cabnet's Commentary.

^c How long widows were to mourn for their husbands, there is no express precept in the law; but the usual time for common mourners was no more than seven days; and we cannot suppose that Bathsheba was much longer, considering the reason we have to apply to her the words of Lucan: "Unwilling she shed the trickling tears, and from a heart of joy beaved forth groans."

^d According to the Jewish doctors it was utterly unlawful for any to marry another man's wife in case he had defiled her before. The canonical law declares such marriages null and void, as are contracted between an adulterous man, and a woman that was partner with him in the crime; and though the law of Moses this state he continued without any molestation, or apprehension of having done wrong, for the space of several months, till at length God sent ^e Nathan the prophet to rouse him out of his adulterous lethargy, and, by ^f an does not expressly forbid them, yet we may not thence infer that they were permitted among the Jews. For these reasons some have thought that this marriage of David and Bathsheba was null and invalid; but others, upon better grounds, have supposed that though there were many criminal circumstances attending it, yet these did not vacate its effect, and in short, though it ought not to have been done, yet being done, the marriage was good, and the children, which were afterwards born, were legitimate.—Cabnet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^e We learn little more of this great man in the sacred writings, but that he was David's prophet, intimate counsellor, and historiographer. Josephus says of him, that he was a polite and a prudent man, one who knew how to temper the severity of wisdom with sweetness of manners. And Grotius compares him to Manius Lepidus, of whom Tacitus says that he had a talent of turning away Tiberius's mind from those cruel purposes, to which the vile flattery of others inclined him, and was, at the same time, in equal favour and authority with him. Nathan certainly knew the art of reproving kings with authority, and yet without giving offence. So far from that, he grew in his prince's favour and estimation, as long as he lived; insomuch, that David, as tradition tells us, called one son after his name, and committed another, even his beloved Solomon, to his care and tuition.—The History of the Life of King David, vol. 3.

^f There is a passage of Seneca, (Epist. 59.) where he treats of the style fit for philosophic writing, which suits so well with this parable of Nathan's, that I choose to give it in his own words, as a fit preamble to the short comment which follows it:—"I find," says he, "images, which if any one forbids us to use, and deems that they ought to be allowed to poets only, yet it is my opinion, that none of the ancients ever read them who was not captivated with the beautiful diction. Those who spoke in a simple manner, and with the view of proving something, made great use of parables, which I think necessary, not for the same reason that poets use them, but that they might be of assistance to our weakness, and further both teacher and listener to the point in hand." For parables, like histories, wherein we have no concern, are heard with more attention, and are so contrived, as to give no offence, even though they provoke the man to whom they are addressed, to condemn himself. 'There were two men in one city, the one rich, and the other poor; and the rich man had exceeding many flocks and herds;' as David had many wives and concubines, with whom he might have been well satisfied, without violating another man's bed: 'but the poor man had nothing save one little ewe lamb, which he had bought and nourished up.' Bathsheba, very likely, was the only wife that Uriah had, with whom he was highly pleased and delighted, and she very probably with him, till David's temptations, had perverted her mind. 'And it grew up together with him and with his children; it did eat of his own meat, and drank of his own cup, and lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter.' Nathan, in his resemblance, cannot be said to have surpassed the truth, considering how fond many persons were anciently, not only of lambs, but of several other creatures, which they suffered to eat with them at their tables, and lie with them in their beds; and that even at this day it is a custom in Arabia, which is contiguous to Judea, to have one of the finest lambs in the flock brought up in the house, and fed with the children. 'And there came a traveller to the rich man;' this denotes David's straggling appetite, which he suffered to wander from his own home, and to covet another man's wife: and of this appetite the Jewish doctors have this observation, that "in the beginning it is but a traveller, but in time it becomes a guest, and in conclusion is the master of the house." 'And he spared to take of his own flock, and his own herds,' wherewith he might have satisfied his appetite, 'but took the poor man's lamb, and dressed it for the wayfaring man that was come to him.' Most commentators here take notice, that Nathan did not go so far in the parable, as to say any thing of the rich man's killing the poor man. This certainly would have made the resemblance more complete, but it is therefore omitted, that David might not so readily apprehend Nathan's meaning, and so be induced unawares to pronounce a sentence of condemnation upon himself; whereupon the prophet elegant parable, to represent the baseness and wickedness of what he had done, and to make him pronounce sentence against his guilty self.

David accordingly condemns himself, and confesses his guilt, and humbly begs pardon for what he had done: Whereupon Nathan was sent again to inform him, that ^a God had pardoned his transgression, namely, the eternal punishment due to his transgression God had remitted, but the ^b temporal should be inflicted on him. That had a fair opportunity to show him, that if the rich man, who took away the poor man's lamb, deserved death, according to his own judgment, how much more did he deserve it, who had not only taken another man's wife, but caused him to be slain likewise by the enemies of Israel.—Patrick's Commentary.

^a It may very well be asked, how God so readily came to forgive David, when he acknowledged his transgression, and yet did not forgive Saul, though he made the like confession, 'I have sinned.' But the answer is obvious, that, be the form of expression what it will, unless it proceeds from the sincerity of the heart, the great Searcher of hearts will not regard it. The true reason, therefore, why Saul could not obtain a revocation of his sentence of rejection, was, because his repentance was not sincere; it did not proceed from an humble and contrite spirit. At the same time that he acknowledged his sin, he desired Samuel 'to honour him before the people,' and persisted in his disobedience ever after. Whereas David, on the contrary, humbled himself, wept and lamented for his sin, and of his penitence has left us a perpetual and eternal monument in Psalm li. 'Have mercy upon me, O God, after thy great goodness; according to the multitude of thy mercies, do away mine offences; wash me thoroughly from my wickedness, and cleanse me from my sin,' &c.

^b In the threats, which God orders Nathan to denounce against David, the expressions are, 'I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and I will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of the sun; for thou didst it secretly; but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the sun;' (2 Sam. xii. 11—12.) Where the words, 'I will raise up, I will take, I will do,' do not denote any positive actions of God, as if he prompted wicked men to do the same things, wherewith he threatens David, inasmuch that, without such prompting, they would not have done them, but by it were necessitated to do them. Such a construction as this is injurious to the divine attributes, and makes God the author of evil. But the true meaning is, that God, at that time, saw the perverse disposition of one of his sons, and the crafty williness of one of his counselors, which, without restraining them, would not fail to create David no small uneasiness. And therefore, because David had violated his law, and, to gratify his lust, had committed both adultery and murder, God would not interpose, but suffered the tempers of these two wicked persons to follow their own course, and have their natural swing; whereupon the one, being ambitious of a crown, endeavours to depose his father, and the other, willing to make the breach irreparable, advised the most detested thing he could think of. This indeed was the very thing that God had foretold, but, without any imputation upon his attributes, we may say, that God can so dispose and guide a train of circumstances, that the wickedness of any action shall happen in this manner rather than another, though he do not infuse into any man the will to do wickedly. "To the torrent of iniquity, if I may so speak," for I give you the commentator's own words, because there is something very accurate in them, "he adds no strength, but prevents its outbreking to one side rather to another, and all the circumstances (which have no vice in themselves) he so directs and regulates that they may attain to some certain issue. But there are innumerable circumstances of such a nature, having no real evil in themselves, but in which however the events are varied according to the will of God, and the Almighty hath many methods by which he overrules all things without any diminution of his glory, and all in such a manner as to leave to men the liberty either of breaking or obeying his commandments." So that from such scripture phrases as these, we may not infer, that God either does, or can do evil, but only, that he permits that evil to be done, which he foreknew would be done, but might have prevented had he pleased; or, in other therefore the son, for by this time Bathsheba was brought to bed of a son, begotten in this adulterous congress, should not live; that several of his family should come to an untimely death; that some one of his sons should rise up in rebellion against him; and his own wives be defiled publicly, and in the sight of all the world, because he had given such scandal to his own people, and ^c such occasion to the enemies of God to blaspheme.

Nor was it long before part of this sentence began to be executed upon him. For the child, which he had by Bathsheba, was taken sick and died. While it was sick, ^d David fasted and prayed, if possibly he might appease the divine wrath, and intercede for its life; but when it was dead, he acknowledged the justice of God, and, cheerfully submitting to his will, made his ardent supplications to him, that the remainder of his afflictions might be mixed with mercy. This in some measure was done; for, in a proper space of time, he had another son ^e terms, that he suffers men, naturally wicked, to follow the bent of their tempers, without any interposition of his providence to restrain them.—Le Clerc's Commentary.

^c David's crime, which at first was secret, was in time discovered, and the report of it carried to the neighbouring nations. The Syrians, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Edomites, the Philistines, people whom he had subdued, and who, out of pure malice, had always a jealous eye upon his conduct, would not fail upon this occasion to murmur, and say, "How could God thus favour an adulterer and murderer? Where is his justice and his providence? Is this the God who is said to be so equitable in his dealings with men, and so severe an avenger of iniquity, and yet makes choice of such a monster as this to govern his people! This is the David, the man after God's own heart, whom he preferred before Saul, on whom he hath poured down innumerable blessings, and for whom he hath many rich promises in reserve; and yet did Saul ever commit such horrid enormities as this man has done, and still continues to be the favourite of God?" Such reflections we may reasonably imagine would David's transgressions have occasioned among strangers and enemies, who might thence be induced to despise a religion they were acquainted with, and which he, who should have been its main support, so little regarded.—Cabnet's Commentary.

^d David's acts of humiliation for his sins are thus described by Sylvian, On the Government of God. "He put off his purple, threw away his royal ornaments, laid down his diadem, wholly stripped himself of his kingship, and appeared as a penitent, in a squalid, rueful garb, fasting, lying on the ground, confessing, mourning, repenting, deprecating, &c., and yet, with all his humiliation and compunction, he could not obtain a revocation of this punishment." But why should the death of this child, who, had he lived, would have been a perpetual monument of guilt, and a brand of infamy upon his parents, be accounted by David so great a punishment? The true way to account for this, is to ascribe it to David's excess of passion for Bathsheba, which so strongly attached him to every offspring of hers, and made him forget every thing in this child, but that motive of endearment. Besides this, there is something in human nature, which prompts us to rate things after a manner seemingly unaccountable; and to estimate them, not according to their real worth, but according to the expense or trouble, or even the distress they cost us. Nor should it be forgot, that this excessive mourning did not proceed simply from the fear of the loss of the child, but from a deep sense of his sin, and of the divine displeasure manifested in the child's sickness, and particularly from a just apprehension of the injury which he had done the infant by his sin, and which he thought himself bound in justice, by prayer and intercession, as much as he was able, to repair.—Patrick's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^e It is very observable, that in the whole compass of this story, there is not a word said either of Bathsheba's guilt or punishment; but this might be, because, as to the matter of her husband's death, she was innocent: to the adultery which she committed, she was enticed by the offers of a powerful king: and in the calamities which befell him, she, no doubt, had her share, and felt her punishment.—Patrick's Commentary.

by Bathsheba, who was named ^a Solomon, in confidence of the promise which God had made, that his reign should be crowned with peace: but this did not hinder the divine justice from being true to its threats, as well as its promises.

David had several sons, but only one daughter, that we read of, whose name was Tamar, sister to Absalom, by Maacha, the daughter of Tahmai king of Geshur, ^b a princess of excellent beauty, and with whom Amnon, his eldest son by another queen, fell desperately in love, and pined away with a ^c hopeless desire of obtaining her, till at length, by the advice and contrivance of Jonadab, his intimate friend, and ^d cousin-german, he found means to decoy her into his apartment, where, ^e

^a The word Solomon is properly derived from Scholam, which signifies peace, intimating that his reign should be peaceable; but, by God's appointment, Nathan gave him another name, viz. Jedidiah, that is, the Beloved of God. The Scripture, however, never calls him by this name, but only by that of Solomon, for what reason we cannot tell, unless we may suppose, that the people being long harassed in war during his father's reign, might be pleased with this name, and use it rather than the other, to intimate their hopes and longing desire of peace. And for this reason (among others) it may be inferred, that Solomon was born after the conclusion of the Ammonitish war, though the sacred history takes occasion, from the death of Bathsheba's first-born, to relate that event first. Not long after this, David had another son by Bathsheba, (2 Sam. v. 14, and 1 Chron. iii. 5.) whom he called Nathan, after the name of the prophet; and of these two Christ was born, though in different lines: for Joseph, his supposed father, came from Solomon, as Matthew (chap. i. ver. 6, 7, relates it;) and Mary, his real mother, came from Nathan, as it is in Saint Luke, chap. iii. ver. 34.—Le Clerc's Commentary; and Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 5. c. 4.

^b The borders of the Geshurites and Maachathites (as we read Josh. xiii. 11, 13.) were given by Moses to the Israelites that seated themselves on the east of Jordan; nevertheless 'the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites and Maachathites, but they dwell among the Israelites unto this day:' from whence it is evident, that the cities of Geshur and Maacha, the two capitals of two small kingdoms, lay within the borders of the land of Israel: and though it does not appear how they were situated in respect of each other, yet it is certain that they both lay on the south side of Mount Libanus, in the north part of the half tribe of Manassch, and on the east side of the river Jordan.—Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. 3.

^c Virgins of the blood royal were kept seclude in apartments, separate from the commerce of men, into which not only strangers, but even their own fathers, were not permitted to enter. Amnon, however, at some time or other, had seen the beautiful Tamar, or otherwise he could not have conceived so strong a passion for her. Upon some certain ceremonial occasions, indeed, it was customary for the young women to walk out, and show themselves; but, considering their close confinement at other times, it was hardly possible for Amnon to find an opportunity of declaring his passion, much more of gratifying it; and therefore, out of pure despair, he pined himself into a consumption.—Calmel's Commentary.

^e There is something so moving, and the arguments are so strong in Tamar's speech to Amnon, that one would almost wonder why it did not prevail with him to desist. 'Nay, my brother, do not force me.' Here she reminds him of his relation to her, for which she hoped he would have such a reverence as not to meddle with her, though she herself were willing, much less to offer violence to her, which it was abominable to do even to a stranger, much more to one of the same blood. 'For no such thing ought to be done in Israel.' Whatever other nations did, who had not the knowledge of God's laws, she begs of him to consider, that they both belonged to a nation which was God's peculiar people, had been instructed better, and therefore should act otherwise. 'Do not thou this folly.' She prays him, besides the scandal it would give, to reflect with himself on the heinousness of the crime, and how highly offensive it would be to the notwithstanding all her entreaties and expostulations with him, he first ravished her, and when his brutish passion was satisfied, in a sullen humour ^f bid her begone; and when she remonstrated the ill usage, had her turned out by main force.

^g In this mournful and distracted condition, Tamar repairs to her brother Absalom, and tells him the whole transaction of her rape: but her brother, though naturally a man of a high spirit, advised her to be silent in point of prudence, because her ravisher was heir-apparent to the crown; and himself so ^h artfully concealed divine Majesty. 'And I, whither shall I cause my shame to go?' She beseeches him, 'besides the sin against God,' to consider the disgrace it would be to her, who, after such a foul act, must be ashamed to look any one in the face. 'And as for thee, thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel.' Lastly, she puts him in mind of his own reputation, which so vile an action would tarnish for ever, and make him be looked upon as a man void of all sense, religion, honour, and humanity. 'Now therefore, I pray thee, speak to the king: for he will not withhold me from thee.' It is a common opinion among the Jewish doctors, that in the war which king David had with the king of Geshur, he took Maacha his daughter captive, and, as they fancy their law allows, (Deut. xxi. 11.) lay with her for once only, and then brought this daughter; but that, upon her becoming a proselyte to the Jewish religion, he married her, and afterwards had Absalom, Tamar, therefore, being born while her mother was a Gentile, they suppose that she was not David's legal child, and that Amnon consequently might marry her: but all this is mere talk, without any shadow of proof. The most probable opinion is, that she was neither ignorant of the law (Lev. xviii. 11.) which prohibited such incestuous marriages, nor thought her father's power so great, as that he might dispense with the law upon this occasion, but merely that she said any thing which she thought would please him, to stop his solicitations, and rude attempts, and to escape for the present out of his hands.—Patrick's Commentary; and Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 8.

^f Interpreters seem to be at a great loss to find out the reason, why Amnon's love to his sister should so soon be converted into such an hatred, as to make him act so rudely, so brutally towards her; but it is no uncommon thing for men of violent and irregular passions, to pass from one extreme to another. The shame, which accompanies every base action, the remorse and repentance, and many bad consequences, that immediately pursue it, make a recoil in every man's temper; and therefore it is no wonder, that a libidinous young man, who would not spare so much as his own sister, should after fruition, and when the ardour of his lust was satisfied, be seized with a contrary passion, and hate the object he loved so much before, when he came coolly to compare the pleasure and the sin together, the shortness of the one, and the heinousness of the other. He hated his sister, when he should have hated himself; and as this outrageous treatment of her made it impossible for his guilt to be concealed, so God seems to have abandoned him to the tumult of his intemperate mind, on purpose to make this punishment of David's adultery more flagrant, and the prophet's prediction of 'raising up evil to him out of his own house,' (2 Sam. xii. 11.) more conspicuous.—Calmel's and Le Clerc's Commentaries; and The History of the Life of King David.

^g The manner of Tamar's signifying her vexation for the injury and disgrace which her brother had put upon her, is expressed by her putting ashes upon her head, (2 Sam. xiii. 19.) And that this was an ancient custom, whereby to denote one's grief and concern for any great loss or calamity, is evident from that passage of the prophet concerning the people of Tyre: 'They shall cry bitterly, cast dirt upon their heads, and wallow themselves in the ashes,' (Ezek. xxvi. 30.) from Achilles's behaviour upon the death of Patroclus, as we have it in Homer:—'With both his hands he grasped the burning sand, pouring on his head and defiling his fair face.' (Iliad 18.) And from what Mezentius did upon the death of his Lausus, according to Virgil:—'With filthy dust he pollutes his hair, and to the heaven high stretches out both his hands.'—Æneid, 10.

^h By this means Amnon was lulled asleep into a belief that Absalom would not trouble him for what he had done, because he his own resentment that every one believed he had taken no notice of it. But about two years after, under the pretence of a sheep-shearing entertainment, which in those countries used to be attended with great mirth and jollity, he invited his friends and relations, and with the king's consent, though himself declined going, all the princes of the blood, and more especially his brother Amnon, to his country seat at Hazor; where while they were engaged in feasting and drinking, his servants, by his direction, and through the promise of an impunity, fell upon Amnon, as Absalom gave the signal, and immediately despatched him. This put the rest of the princes into such a consternation, that they made the best of their way from the house, as expecting the like fate, and the king, when he heard the first news of the thing, supposing that Absalom had killed all the rest of his brothers, was thrown into the utmost grief and despair, till, by the information of Jonadab, who seems to have been privy to the design, and the safe arrival of the other princes, he was certified that Amnon only was dead; but his death alone was matter of sorrow and lamentation enough.

Absalom, who knew very well how highly his father would resent this treacherous and barbarous murder, ^a fled to his mother's relations, and was entertained by his grandfather, Tahai, at Geshur, for three years. But, length of time having worn out David's grief, and Joab perceiving that he had a secret desire to see Absalom again, if he could but find out a handsome excuse for such a purpose, procured a good artful woman ^b from Tekoah, who ^c in a speech, which he had contrived for did not threaten, nor so much as expostulate with him, or take any notice of what had passed, though, in reason he ought to have been more afraid that he was meditating a terrible revenge: according to the lesson which the mouse gave her young one, when she perceived her alighted at the noise of the crowing cock, but regardless of the sly approaches of the cat, namely, "That there was no danger to be feared from the fluttering cock, but from the silent cat present death."—Petrick's Commentary.

^a In the case of wilful murder, the law is, 'That the avenger of blood shall slay the murderer; when he meeteth him he shall slay him,' (Num. xxxv. 21.) from whence it seems to follow, that it was not in any man's power to protect the wilful murderer, because the avenger of blood, that is, the nearest relation of the person murdered, might, with impunity, wherever he met him, kill him. As Absalom therefore had committed a designed murder, his own life was every moment in danger; and as there were no cities of refuge in his own country, that, in this case, would yield him protection, he was forced to fly out of the kingdom to his mother's father.—Petrick's Commentary.

^b Tekoah was a city in the tribe of Judah, which lay south of Jerusalem, and about twelve miles distant from it. And herein does Joab's cunning appear not a little, that he made choice of a woman rather than a man, because women can more easily express their passions, and sooner gain pity in their miseries; a widow, which was a condition of life proper to move compassion; a grave woman, as Josephus calls her, which made her better fitted for addressing the king; and a woman not known at Jerusalem, but living at some distance in the country, that the case which was to represent, might not too readily be inquired into.—Poole's Annotations.

^c The art and contrivance of this widow of Tekoah's speech is very remarkable. 'When the woman of Tekoah spake to the king, she fell on her face to the ground, and did obeisance, and said, Help, O king! And the king said to her, What aileth thee? And she said, I am indeed a widow woman, and my husband is dead, and thy handmaid had two sons, and the two strove together in the field, and there was none to part them, but the one smote the other and slew him; and behold the whole family is risen against thy handmaid, and they say, deliver him that smote his brother, that we may kill him, for the life of his her, was to convince the king, that in some cases the life of a murderer might be saved. The woman Joab introduced; and when she had told her tale, so as to induce the king to a compliance with her feigned petition, she gave him at length to know, that the case she had been stating was Absalom's: and that if, in a private man, the king was disposed to be merciful, there was much more reason for his pardoning his own son, whose absence the people lamented, and for whom they had so general an affection.

The king, being apprized that Joab had put the woman upon this artifice, ordered him to recall Absalom, but ^d confined him to live in his own house, and, as yet, would not seem so far reconciled to him, as to admit him into his presence. But, at the end of two years, Absalom prevailed with Joab to intercede further for a full pardon, and to introduce him to the king, who, upon his humbling himself and begging pardon, took him up from the ground, where he lay prostrate, and gave him a kiss, as a token of his forgiveness and royal favour.

Absalom was certainly one of the most comely persons in all Israel, without the least blemish from top to toe, and with a head of hair, which in those days was thought a great beauty, prodigiously long and thick, so that his person drew every one's eye to him, as soon as he was restored to favour at court. But as Amnon, his eldest brother, was slain, and Chiteah, his second, by this time dead, he began to look upon himself as presumptive heir to the crown, and thereupon to affect a state and equipage greater than usual. He provided himself with chariots and horses, and had a guard of fifty men to attend his person: but, notwithstanding this, he would be ^e so obsequious and humble, as to stoop to the meanest brother whom he slew, and we will destroy the heir also: and so they shall quench my coal that is left,' that is, deprive me of the little comfort of my life which remains, and is, as it were, a coal buried in the ashes, 'and leave to my husband neither name nor remainder upon the earth,' (2 Sam. xiv. 4, &c.) Now the scope of all this speech was to frame a case as like to David's as she could devise, that, by prevailing with him to determine it in her favour, he might be convinced, how much more reasonable it was to preserve Absalom. But, how plausible soever the likeness might be, there was a wide difference between her case and his: for her son, as she pretended, was slain in a scuffle with his brother; whereas Amnon was taken off by a premeditated murder: he was slain in the field, where there were no witnesses, whether the fact was wilfully done or no; whereas, all the king's sons, saw Amnon barbarously murdered by his brother: and, lastly, he was her only son, by whom alone she could hope to have her husband's name perpetuated; whereas David's family was in no danger of being extinct, even although he had given up Absalom to justice. But there was a great deal of policy in not making the similitude too close and visible, lest the king should perceive the drift of the woman's petition, before she had obtained a grant of pardon for her son, and came to make the application to the king; and though, upon her making the application, the king might have argued the disparity of the two cases, yet he thought proper to waive this, and admit her reasoning to be good, because he was as desirous to have Absalom recalled as were any of his subjects.—Petrick's Commentary.

^d This small severity to Absalom, small in comparison of the heinousness of his crime, David might think necessary, not only to put upon him a sincere humiliation and repentance for what he had done, when he found that the king, indulgent as he was, had not fully pardoned him, but to convince the people likewise, how detestable his crime was in the king's esteem, and how averse he would be to pass by the like in another person, who could not endure the sight of a son, whose hand was defiled with a brother's blood.—Petrick's Commentary.

^e It is an observation of Plato, that when any one intends to people that had any thing to say to him; would offer his service to solicit every one's cause that had any business at court; and, upon proper occasions, not fail to instil into the people's minds a bad opinion of the present administration, as if the public affairs were neglected, but that, if he were at the helm, things should be conducted at an other-guise rate.

^a By these arts and insinuations, which were advantageously seconded by the comeliness of his person, as we said, and the familiarity of his address, he gained to himself the affections of the people, and insensibly alienated them from David. ^b When therefore he imagined that matters were ripe for his purpose, he desired leave of his father to go to Hebron, pretending that he had vowed a vow, in his exile, that whenever it should please God to bring him back to Jerusalem, he would offer in that place a solemn sacrifice of thanksgiving.

make himself a tyrant in a popular state, he no sooner enters on the government, but "he smiles upon, and kindly salutes, all sorts of people, wherever he meets them;" avowing that he hates tyranny, promising great things both in private and public, "and making as if he would be mild, and gentle, and fatherly to all;" even as Tacitus relates of Otho, "that he used to kiss, and shake hands with any one, court and adore the mob, and do every little servile thing, to get possession of the government."—Plato de Republica, b. 8; and Tacitus's History, b. 1.

^a It is an observation of Aristotle, in his Politics, (b. 5. c. 4.) that all changes and revolutions in government are made by one of these two ways, "either by force and violence, or else by deceit and craft." Nor ever was there a man better formed by nature to manage matters in this latter way, than was Absalom, who was a person of courage and gallantry, of civility and courtesy, young, and wonderfully beautiful, descended from kings, both by father's and mother's side, and prodigal enough of large and magnificent promises, if ever he came to be king; a character not unlike that of Turnus in Virgil: "The well formed shape influences one, royal ancestry another, and chivalry another."—Æneid, b. 7.

^b This is said in the text to have been 'after forty years,' (2 Sam. xv. 7.) but where to date the beginning of the forty years has occasioned much disagreement among commentators. Some compute them from the time that the Israelites demanded a king of Samuel; others, from the first time that David was anointed king; others, from the first commencement of his reign over Judah; and others again, from the time that he took possession of the whole kingdom. The two latter of these opinions are insupportable, because David reigned but forty years in all, and was now so hale and hearty, as to be able to walk on foot; whereas in the latter end of his life he was very infirm and bed-ridden. The learned Usher indeed makes these forty years to commence from the time of David's first unction; and therefore he was threescore years old when this rebellion broke out, and lived ten years after it. But with all due deference to so great authority, both this and the other opinion, that computes from the time that a demand of a king was made, are forced and unnatural; have no affinity to the text, nor do they suggest any reason why the sacred historian should begin his account of this unnatural rebellion with an 'and it came to pass, that after forty years;' whereas, if we consider the account of what went before, how Absalom, by all the arts of popularity, a splendid equipage, condescensive behaviour, large promises, and flattering speeches, had alienated the hearts of the people from his father, we cannot but be tempted to think that there is an error crept into the text: that instead of arba'im, forty, as our copies have it, the word should be arba, four only, that is, four years after that Absalom was re-established in Jerusalem, and had used all his alluring arts to gain the nation's affections, the first step that he took, was to go to Hebron. This makes the sense easy and entire, and is confirmed by the authority of the Syriac and Arabic versions, the judgment of several able critics, and the testimony of Josephus himself, whose words are, that "four years after his father was reconciled to him, this conspiracy broke out."—Cabnet's Commentary, Howell's History in the notes; and Josephus' Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 8.

The king, little suspecting his hidden design, and being desirous that all religious services should be punctually performed, gave him free leave to go, and wished him a good journey. Hebron was the place of his own nativity, and where the royal seat had been, in the beginning of David's reign; and therefore he thought it the properest for his wicked enterprise. And no sooner was he settled there, but he sent his emissaries about to sound the inclinations of the several tribes, and to exhort those whom they should gain over to his party, to be ready to take up arms ^c as soon as they should hear that he was proclaimed king.

This occasioned a general insurrection. Absalom was the nation's darling; and, upon this summons, ^d people flocked to him from every part: so that David, who had intelligence of all this, thought it not safe for him to continue any longer in Jerusalem, ^e but leaving the ^c The expression in the text is, 'as soon as you hear the sound of the trumpet,' (2 Sam. xv. 10.) which looks as if Absalom had planted trumpeters at proper distances to take the sound from one another, and disperse it over all the kingdom, that so they, who were lovers of his cause, might instantly resort to his assistance and support; to which they were encouraged, no doubt, by the suggestions of his emissaries, who might persuade the people, that all this was done by the king's consent and approbation, who, being aged and infirm himself, was willing to resign his kingdom to his eldest and most noble son, who was descended from a king by both parents.—Le Clerc's Commentary, and Poole's Annotations.

^d It would really make one wonder, how any people could so easily abandon a prince, so brave, so happy, and successful as David had been; how they could forget his excellent qualities, or be unmindful of the services he had done the nation; but for this there may be some reasons assigned. In every nation there are always some turbulent and discontented spirits, who are uneasy with the present state of things, and promise themselves some benefit from a change. Saul's party was not as yet entirely extinct, and Joab, who was David's prime minister, behaved with an insufferable pride and insolence. His crimes, which were very black, and which the king durst not punish, redounded upon him; and the king himself had given his enemies umbrage enough against him, in living with Bathsheba, after he had murdered her husband. But, what gave the fairest pretence of all, was the obstruction of justice in the civil administration: for had there not been something of this, Absalom could have had no grounds for making such loud complaints. These were some of the causes of so general a revolt in the people. And yet, after all, there might be something in what Abarbanel imagines, namely, that neither Absalom, nor the elders of Israel, nor the rest of the people who were misled by them, had any intention to divest David of his crown and dignity, much less to take away his life; but only to substitute Absalom, as coadjutor to him, for the execution of the royal authority during his lifetime, and to be his successor after his death. For, as it would have been monstrously wicked in Absalom to have designed the destruction of so kind a father, so it is hard to conceive, how he could have gained to his party such a multitude of abettors in so villainous an enterprise. This however we may observe, that David looked upon their proceedings, (2 Sam. xv. 14. and xvi. 11.) as an attempt upon his life; and that, whatever their first intentions were, they came at last to a resolution to have him killed, to make way for their own better security. Which may be a sufficient warning to all men, never to begin anything that is wrong, for fear that it should lead them to the commission of that, which they at first abhorred, when they find they cannot be safe in one wickedness without perpetrating a greater.—Cabnet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^e Though the fort of Zion was very strong and impregnable, yet there are several reasons, which might induce David to quit Jerusalem. He had not laid in provisions for a long siege, nor was Jerusalem, in every part of it, defensible; and if Absalom had once taken it, as it was the capital, he would soon have been master of the whole kingdom. There was some reason to suspect likewise, that the inhabitants were faulty, and so much addicted place, with a design to retire beyond Jordan, he was attended by his guards, his best troops, and principal friends, ^a Zadok and Abiathar the priests, understanding that the king was departed from Jerusalem, brought the ark of the covenant to accompany him in his distress; but ^b he desired them to carry it back, and to continue in Jerusalem, because they might be of use to gain him intelligence of the enemy's motions and designs, and their character was too sacred, to fear any violence from the usurper. Hushai, ^c the Archite, his faithful friend and counsellor, came likewise to attend him, and, with all expressions of sorrow, to see his royal master in such distress, offered to share his fortune: but David enjoined him to return, and told him, that he would be more serviceable to him in the city, by pretending to adhere to Absalom, and by defeating the counsels of Abithophel, who, as he understood for certainty, was ^d engaged in his son's measures, and whose great abilities, which the king was not unacquainted with, gave him no small uneasiness.

David had scarce passed over Mount Olivet, which lies to the eastward of Jerusalem, when Ziba, whom he had made steward to Mephibosheth, his friend Jonathan's son, came, and presented him with a ^e considerable quantity of wine, and other provisions; but, upon the king's inquiring for his master, who he thought above all men, in point of gratitude, should have kept firm to his interest, the perfidious wretch accused him of staying behind in Jerusalem, in hopes that himself might be made king; and the too credulous king, in this general distraction of his affairs, believing the accusation to be true, made a hasty grant of all Mephibosheth's estate to this base servant and treacherous sycophant.

As David drew near to Bahurim, a city in the tribe of Benjamin, ^f one Shimei, a descendant from the family of Saul, and who dwelt in that place, came out, and threw stones at him, and, in the hearing of the whole company, loaded him with the bitterest reproaches and execrations, so that Abishai desired leave of the king to go and despatch the insolent rebel: but by no means would the king permit him, but bore all with an admirable patience, ^g and resignation to the will of God, as being conscious of his own guilt in the case of Uriah, and of the divine justice in thus afflicting him.

While David continued at Bahurim, Absalom and his party entering Jerusalem, were received with the general acclamations of the people, and Hushai, not forgetful of the king's instructions, went to compliment him, and offered him his service. Absalom knew that he was his father's intimate friend and counsellor, and therefore bantered him at first, upon his pretending to desert his to the contrary party, that had he stood a siege, and been reduced to straits, they might possibly deliver him up to Absalom. Nor was the preservation of the city itself, which David had beautified, and adorned with a fine and stately palace, and where God had appointed to put his name and worship, the least part of his concern; and therefore he thought it more conducive to his interest in all respects, rather than he cooped up in a place which he desired to preserve from being the seat of war, to march abroad into the country, where he might probably raise a considerable army, both for his own defence, and the suppression of the rebels.

^a 2 Sam. xv. 30. 'And David went up by the ascent of mount Olivet, and wept as he went up, and had his head covered; and he went barefoot: and all the people that was with him covered every man his head, and they went up, weeping as they went up.' This was an indication of great distress: for in ancient times the shoes of great and wealthy persons were made of very rich materials. When any great calamity befell them, either public or private, they not only stripped themselves of these ornaments, but of their very shoes, and walked barefoot. In this manner prisoners taken in war, were forced to walk, both for punishment and disgrace.—Burder's Oriental Customs, vol. 1. p. 231.

^b This he might do for several reasons; for either he might think it not decent to have the ark wander about with him he knew not whither, and to expose it to all the hazards and inconveniences which he himself was like to undergo; or he might suppose that this would be a means to expose the priests to the violence of Absalom's rage, as he had before exposed them to Saul's fury upon another occasion, if God, in his judgment, should permit him to prevail; or this might look as a distrust of the divine goodness, and that he placed more confidence in the token of God's presence, than he did in God himself, who had preserved him in the long persecution of Saul, when he had no ark with him. But what seems the chief reason at that time, for his sending back the ark, was,—That the priests and Levites, of whose fidelity he was sufficiently satisfied, by giving him intelligence of the enemies' motions, might do him more service in Jerusalem, than they could do in his camp.—Poole's Annot.

^c This man might be of the ancient race of the Archites, descendants from Canaan, of whom Moses speaks, (Gen. x. 17.) but since the name of these ancient people is differently written, I should rather think that this additional name was given him from the place of his nativity, namely, Archi, a town situated on the frontiers of Benjamin and Ephraim, to the west of Bethel.—Joshua xvi. 2.

^d The Jews are of opinion, that Abithophel was incensed against David, and therefore ready to go over to the adverse party, because he had abused Bathsheba, whom they take to have been his grand-daughter, because she was the daughter of Eliam, (2 Sam. xi. 3.) and Abithophel had a son of that name, (2 Sam. xxiii. 31.) for this reason they imagine, that he advised Absalom to lie with his father's concubines, that he might be repaid in kind; though the Scripture assigns another, namely, that he and his father might thereby become irreconcilable enemies.—Poole's Annotations.

^e And yet the text tells us, it was but one bottle: but what we render bottle, was, in those times, a bag, or vessel made of leather, which might contain a great deal of wine; because we cannot suppose, but that the liquor was proportionate to the rest of the present.—Patrick's Commentary.

^f Whether this man had been a personal sufferer in the fall of Saul's family, or what else had exasperated him against David, it nowhere appears; but it seems as if he had conceived some very heinous offence against him, when neither the presence of a king, nor the terror of his guards, could restrain him from throwing stones, and bitter speeches, at him: and it looks as if the king were fallen into the utmost contempt, when one private man could think of venting his malice at him in so gross a manner with impunity.—Howell's History in the notes.

^g The words of David upon this occasion are, 'So let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, curse David: let him alone, let him curse, for the Lord hath bidden him;' not that God commanded it by his word, for that severely forbids cursing, (Exod. xxii. 28.) nor moved him to it by his Spirit; for neither was that possible, because God tempteth no man (Jas. i. 13.) But the meaning is, that the secret providence of God did overrule and determine him so to do, that is, God did not put any wickedness into Shimei's heart, for he had of himself an heart full of malignity and venom against David, but only left him to his own wickedness: took away that common prudence, which would have restrained him from so dangerous an action; directed his malice, that it should be exercised against David, rather than any other man: and brought him into so distressed a condition, that he might seem a proper object of his scorn and contempt, which is enough to justify the expression, 'The Lord hath bidden him,' in the same manner that we read of his 'commanding the ravens,' (1 Kings xvii. 4.) and sometimes inanimate creatures, (Ps. cxlvii. 15, 18.) The short is, David looked upon Shimei as an instrument in God's hands, and therefore took all his abuses patiently, out of a consciousness of his sinfulness, and a reverence to that Deity who had brought him so low, as to deserve the insults of this vile Benjaminite.—Poole's Annot.

old master; but Hushai^a excused himself in such a manner, and answered all his questions with that subtlety, that he passed upon the prince for a worthy friend, and accordingly was received into his privy council.

A council was presently called, wherein Ahithophel, who was president, and stood highest in Absalom's esteem, spake first; and the two chief things which he advised him to do, were, first to place a tent on the top of the palace, (for by this time he had taken possession of his father's palace,) and to lie publicly with his father's concubines, that all the soldiers might see, and conclude that, after such an indignity, there could be no hopes of a reconciliation, and thereby be incited to fight more desperately to secure him in the possession of the throne. This advice was suitable perhaps to the young man's vicious inclinations, and therefore he delayed not to put it in execution: but, as for the second thing which Ahithophel proposed, viz. "To take twelve thousand choice men, and pursue after David that^b very night, and to fall upon his guards, which were fatigued with their march, and unable to make resistance, and so surprise the king, and kill him," he desired to consult Hushai herein; who, seeming not to slight Ahithophel's proposal, advised rather to delay the attempt, until he had got all the forces, of the kingdom together. "For, as David and his men were known to be brave, and, at that time, both exasperated,^c and desperate, in case they should worst the party, sent against them, this would be a means to discourage others, and be thought a very inauspicious beginning: whereas if they staid till a

^a The manner in which Josephus makes Hushai answer Absalom, is artful enough, though hardly becoming an honest man. "There is no contending," says he, "with the will of God, and the consent of the people; and so long as you have them on your side, you may be secure of my fidelity. It is from God that you have received your kingdom; and if you can think me worthy of a place in the number of those you will vouchsafe to own, you shall find me as true to yourself as ever I was to your father. No man is to account the present state of things uneasy, so long as the government continues in the same line, and a son of the same family succeeds to the throne.—Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 8.

^b It is a wise observation in Tacitus, "In civil discords nothing is more appropriate than haste, for in them there is more need for action than deliberation." Ahithophel therefore thought it highly necessary to make despatch upon this occasion; because he knew, that if he should give the people, that had revolted from their allegiance, leisure to think of what they were doing against their lawful prince, he would give that prince time to raise some regular troops, and those that were about him space to recover from their first fright; Absalom's party would dwindle into nothing, and David's grow stronger and stronger:—"He would grant repentance to the wicked, agreement to the good—for crimes strengthen by impetuosity, and good counsel by delay." (Tacitus, Hist. b. 1.) And therefore he advised marching immediately against him, without giving him a moment's time to recover himself.—Calmet's Commentary.

^c There is something very plausible, and elegant too, in the advice which Hushai gives Absalom, not immediately to pursue and fall upon David: 'Thou knowest thy father and his men, that they be mighty men, and they be chafed in their minds, as a bear robbed of her whelps in the field.' (2 Sam. xvii. 7.) Every one knows, that a bear is a very fierce creature; but she-bears, as Aristotle tells us, are more fierce than the male, particularly when they have young ones, but, most of all when these young ones are taken from them. For this reason the Scriptures make frequent use of this similitude: 'I will be unto them as a lion,' says God, in relation to the people of Israel, 'and as a leopard by the way; I will meet them as a bear, that is bereaved of her whelps, and will rent the caul of their hearts,' (Hosea xii. 7, 8. See Prov. xvii. 12, &c.) So that the purport of Hushai's advice numerous army, were come together, ^d they might be assured of victory." Absalom, and the rest of the council approved of this last advice, and Hushai immediately despatched two messengers to David, acquainting him with what had passed in council, and advising him instantly to pass the Jordan, lest Absalom should change his mind, and come and fall upon him on a sudden.

The messengers, as they were making the best of their way, happened to meet some of Absalom's party, but had the good fortune to conceal themselves in a well, until their pursuers were returned; and then proceeding on their journey, came and delivered their despatches to the king, who decamped by break of day, passed the Jordan, and came to Mahanaim, a city of Gilead, where he was kindly received. As soon as Ahithophel heard that David was out of danger, either taking it amiss that his counsel was slighted, or perceiving by Absalom's weak conduct that things were not likely to succeed, and he consequently ^e liable to be exposed to David's hottest indignation, for the counsel he had already given; partly out of pride, and partly out of fear of worse torments, he went to his own house, where he first made his will, and then hanged himself.

David had not been long at Mahanaim, before Absalom, having got together a numerous army, which was commanded by Amasa, the son of Ithra, a relation of Absalom's by marriage, left Jerusalem and passed the Jordan, in pursuit of his father. The king hearing of the approach of his rebel son, and foreseeing that a battle was unavoidable, divided his army into three bodies. The first to be commanded by Joab, the second by his brother Abishai, and the third by ^f Ittai the Gittite, is founded on this maxim, "That we should not drive an enemy to despair, nor attack those who are resolved to sell their lives at as dear a rate as possible."—Calmet's Commentary.

^d The benefits which Hushai suggests, from Absalom's having a large army, are thus expressed in an hyperbolical way, suitable to the genius of that insolent young man, to whom he gave his advice; and therefore more likely to prevail with him; 'Moreover if he be gotten into a city, then shall all Israel bring ropes to that city, and we will draw it into the river, until there be not one small stone found there,' (2 Sam. xvii. 13.) Where his meaning is, that if David should quit the open field, and betake himself to the strongest of their cities, encompassed with high walls and deep ditches, such a numerous army, as he proposed, would be sufficient to begirt it round, and by ropes put about the walls, draw them down, and all the houses of the city, into the ditch that ran about it: not that any such practices were ever used in war, and therefore the words must be looked upon as merely thirasonical, and calculated to please Absalom; unless we will say with some, that the word in the original may denote such machines as are worked by ropes, and were at that time in use to batter down walls.—Calmet's and Patrick's Commentaries.

^e Josephus thus relates the matter:—"When Ahithophel was come home to Galmon, he called his family together, and told them the advice which he had given Absalom, but that he would not follow it; and that in a short time that refusal would be his ruin: for David would certainly baffle him, and soon recover his kingdom. "Now it is more honourable for me," says he, "to die asserting my liberty like a man, than to wait sneaking till David comes in again, and to be slain at last for the services I have done the son against the father."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 9.

^f In 2 Sam. xv. 18, we read, that 'all the Gittites, six hundred men, which came after him,' namely, David, 'from Gath, passed on before the king;' but who these Gittites were, it is hard to determine; because we have no mention made of them in any other part of Scripture. Some imagine that they were natives of Gath, who, taken with the fame of David's piety, and happy success, and himself intended to go in person with them. But by the importunity of the people about him, he was prevailed with not to hazard his person in battle; and perhaps was more easily dissuaded from it, because the battle was to be against a son, for whom he still retained so tender an affection, that he gave the three generals a strict charge, in the hearing of the soldiers, that for his sake, they should use Absalom kindly, in case he should fall into their hands.

A. M. 2949. A. C. 1055; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4341. A. C. 1670. 2 SAM. i.—xix.

The two armies met in the ^a wood of Ephraim, which belonged to the tribe of Manasseh, where Absalom's army, though much superior in number, was defeated, and put to flight: for the loyalists, upon this occasion, behaved so gallantly, that they killed ^b twenty thousand of the rebels upon the spot, and would doubtless have carried the slaughter farther, had not Absalom, the chief cause of all this mischief, been taken and slain.

His hair, as we said before, was of a prodigious length and largeness; and as he was now in flight from the enemy, and riding with great speed under the trees, it happened to ^c entangle itself on one of the boughs in came along with Ittai, whom the Jews suppose to have been the son of Achish, king of Gath, and being proselyted to the Jewish religion, became a part of David's guard, and attended him in his wars. But others rather think, that they were men of Jewish extract, but had this additional name, from their flying unto David, probably under the conduct of Ittai, while he was at Gath, and accompanying him ever after, not only in the time of Saul's persecution of him, but even after his accession to the united kingdoms of Judah and Israel.—Patrick's Commentary.

^a This wood was so called, as some imagine, because the Ephraimites were wont to drive their cattle over Jordan to feed them in it; but others with more probability, suppose, that it had its name from the great slaughter (related in Jud. xii.) which Jephthah had formerly made of the Ephraimites in that place.—Howell's History, in the notes.

^b The expression in the text is, 'The wood devoured more people that day, than the sword devoured,' (2 Sam. xviii. 8.) which some think was occasioned by their falling into pits, pressing one another to death in strait places, creeping into lurking holes, and there being starved to death, or otherwise devoured by wild beasts, which met them in their flight: but the most easy and simple meaning of the passage is, that there were more slain in the wood than in the field of battle. The field of battle, (as Josephus tells us, Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 9.) was a plain, with a wood contiguous to it: and therefore, when Absalom's army was put to the rout, and betook themselves to the wood for refuge, their pursuers made a greater slaughter of them there, than they otherwise would have done, because they could not run away so fast in the wood, as they might have done in the open field.—Patrick's Commentary.

^c The words in the text, indeed, make no mention of Absalom's hair in this place. They only inform us, that 'Absalom rode upon a mule, and the mule went under the thick boughs of a great oak, and his head caught hold of the oak, and he was taken up between the heaven and the earth, and the mule, that was under him, went away,' (2 Sam. xviii. 9.) From whence some infer, that the meaning of the historian is, not that Absalom hung by his hair, but that his neck was so wedged between the boughs, by the swift motion of the mule, that he was not able to disengage himself. For it is hardly to be questioned, say they, but that when he went to battle, he had an helmet on; and an helmet, which covered his head, would have hindered his hair from being entangled in the boughs: but it is only supposing, either that his helmet was such, as left a great deal of his hair visible and uncovered, or that, if it was large enough to enclose the whole, he might, upon this occasion, throw it off, as well as his other heavy armour, to make himself lighter, and expedite his flight; and then there will be no incongruity in the common and received opinion, to which the authority of Josephus adds some confirmation, namely, "That as Absalom was making his escape, upon the whiffing of the air, a snagged bough of a tree took hold of his hair, and the mule, running forward from under him, left him dangling in the air."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 9.

such a manner, that it lifted him off his saddle, and his mule, running from under him, left him there hanging in the air, and unable to disengage himself.

In this condition a private soldier found him, and told it unto Joab, who blamed him for not having killed him: and when the man in excuse urged the command which he heard the king give the generals, to be very tender and careful of his son's life, Joab, looking upon all this as nothing, or as a command fitter for a parent than a king, went to the place where he was ^d hanging, and having first given him his death's wound himself, ordered the people, which were by, to despatch him; and so went and sounded a retreat, to prevent any farther effusion of blood, and to give Absalom's party an opportunity of escaping to their respective homes.

Thus died the wicked and rebellious Absalom, and instead of an honourable interment, fit for a king's son, his body was taken down, and thrown into a pit, and covered with an ^e heap of stones.

CHAP. II.—Difficulties obviated, and Objections answered.

DAVID, no doubt, was a very fond father to his children, and a tender husband to his wives: of these, it must be owned, he had too many, eighteen in number, if we will reckon his concubines into that relation, which, in those days did not much differ from the other, except in some rites and solemnities of marriage. But as polygamy

^d Commentators have observed the justice of God, in bringing Absalom to a condign punishment, and such a kind of death, as was ordained by the law for offences, like unto his. For whereas, in the first place, he was hanged as it were, this was declared by the law to be an accursed death, (Deut. xxi. 23.) and was afterwards, in some measure, stoned; this was the particular kind of death that the law prescribed for a stubborn and rebellious son.—Deut. xxi. 21.

^e In the description of the Holy Land, some geographers tell us, that this heap of stones remained even to their days, and that all travellers, as they passed by it, were wont to throw a stone to add to the heap, in detestation of his rebellion against his father. For though it became a custom among the Greeks, to raise an heap of stones in the place where any great person was interred, as a monument of honour and respect; yet it is plain, that none of David's army intended any honour to Absalom's memory in accumulating stones upon him: nor can we think, that David himself, though too fond of this rebel son, made any alteration afterwards in the form of his burial, for fear of enraging the people against him. Some, however, are of a quite contrary opinion, namely, that David, who lamented him with such excess, removed him from this pit, in order to have him laid in the sepulchre belonging to the kings; or perhaps somewhere about the place where the monument of Absalom goes under his name, and even to this day, is shown to travellers, was dug in a rock. It is a little chamber wrought with a chisel, out of one piece of rock, which stands at some distance from the rest of the mountain, and is a square of eight paces from out to out. The inside of this chamber is all plain, but the outside is adorned with some pilasters of the same kind of stone. The upper part, or covering, is made in the form of a conic pyramid, pretty high and large, with a kind of flowerpot on its top. The pyramid is composed of several stones, but the monument itself is square, and all cut out of one block. In the time of Josephus, the monument, which was said to be Absalom's, was nothing more than one marble pillar, widely different from what, at present, goes under his name; and which therefore must be accounted a more modern building.—Le Clerc's and Patrick's Commentaries; Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 9; and Calmet's Dictionary, under the word Absalom.

was then tolerated among the Jews,¹ and the prohibition of a king's multiplying wives to himself does nowhere limit the number of them, David might conceive, that this polygamy was no transgression of the law, and thence be induced more readily to comply with it, in order to enlarge his family, and attach the principal nobility, of his own nation, as well as some foreign potentates, more closely to his interest.² For it was always looked upon as a piece of political wisdom in princes, to endeavour to have many children, that by matching them into several powerful families, they might have more supporters of their authority, and more assistance, in case of any invasion of it.

This however is no part of David's commendation, how much soever it might tend to his security; but that a father should be fond of a son, and in some instances carry that fondness to excess; that he should be blind to his lesser faults, and always inclinable, upon proper tokens of repentance to forgive the greater; that he should love to see every thing look gay and handsome about him, be liberal to his decent expenses, and ready to overlook some little extravagancies; that he should be uneasy in his absence, joyous to see him, and when he is in any imminent danger, very solicitous for his preservation, which are all the articles brought against David in relation to his son Absalom. These are faults, if faults they be, which every good-natured parent, who feels the tender propensities of human nature towards those of his own flesh, will easily be induced to forgive: and well were it for David, if we could make the like apology for that great enormity of his, in the matter of Uriah; but^a instead of attempting any extenuation of it, we shall rather take notice of the several aggravations which moralists have discovered in it, and of the reasons for which the Spirit of God thought proper to record it in holy writ.

To this purpose, some have observed, 1st, That³ as David tarried at Jerusalem at the time when kings went forth to battle, he there indulged himself in ease and luxury, which are the bane and rust of the mind, and so insensibly fell into those loose desires which drew him into such vile perpetrations; so that the first cause of his sin was idleness. 2d, They observe it as an aggravation of his crime,⁴ that he certainly knew that Bathsheba was another man's wife, and yet deliberately and advisedly committed the sin; nay, that she was the wife of one who was a proselyte to the Jewish religion, and therefore added scandal to his wickedness, or, as the text expresses it,⁵ gave great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme.⁶ 3d, They observe that there was perfidy added to this guilt, and a sinful contrivance,⁶ in causing Uriah to be sent for home; in receiving him with great tokens of his favour, and entertaining him with good cheer, that he might be the more desirous to enjoy the company of his wife, and so have the child, which was got in adultery, reputed his own. 4th, They observe,⁷ from Uriah's answer, that had not David's heart been seared, he could not but have felt a strong remorse, upon thinking how he had abused so brave a man, and how he indulged himself in sinful pleasures, while this man, and the rest of his army, gloriously endured all manner of hardships, for the service of their country. 5th, They observe,⁸ from his design upon Uriah's life, when he could not otherwise conceal his lewdness, how naturally one sin paves the way to another, and how, in a small compass of time, the fascination of sensual appetites is enough to change the very nature of mankind; since even he, who formerly spared Saul, unjustly seeking his life, is now put upon contriving the death of a very faithful servant, in a very base and unworthy manner. 6th, They observe it, as a farther aggravation of his crime of murder, that he not only exposed an innocent and faithful servant to be killed, but that, together with him,⁹ several more brave men, set in the front of the battle, where the service was hottest, must necessarily have fallen in the attack; so blind was he to the public good, and so prodigal of his subjects' lives, if he might but cover his guilt, and gratify his lust. 7th, They observe¹⁰ from his answer to the messengers sent by Joab to acquaint him with Uriah's death, namely, 'the sword devoureth one as well as another,' the vile hypocrisy and obdurateness of his heart, imputing that to the chance of war, or rather to the direction of divine providence, which his conscience could not but tell him was of his own contrivance. 8th, and lastly, they observe,¹¹ from his marriage with Bathsheba, even before her husband was cold in his grave, how the eagerness of his indulged appetite had now extinguished, what in some sinners is last of all parted with, and for which he himself had lately imbrued his hands in blood, all sense of shame, and regard to reputation or decency.

These are some of the aggravations observable in David's crime, which besides his lust and cruelty, is loaded with too just an imputation of perfidy, of ingratitude, of hypocrisy, of deliberation, of obstinacy, and of shamelessness in sin. And for these purposes were they recorded in Scripture, that they might teach us the frailty of human nature, and how liable the best of men are, in some instances of their lives, to be overtaken with very gross faults: that they might show us the natural gradation of one sin to another, and that, when once we have suffered our appetites to break loose from the restraints of duty, in a short time it will not be in our power to set bounds to them, however much we may be inclined to do so: that they might caution us against sloth and idleness, against indulging any inordinate passion, or gazing upon any objects that may endanger our innocence: that they might remind us all how much we stand in need continually of the divine assistance, and therefore how much we are concerned to pray with all prayer and supplication, and to watch, as well as pray, that we fall into no temptation. And, lastly, that they might inculcate that excellent precept which the apostle has laid down in these words: ¹ 'Brethren, if any man be overtaken in a fault, ye that are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted.'

^a But contrary to this, the Jewish writers have endeavoured to justify David in this whole transaction; and to this purpose have invented laws and customs, that are nowhere to be found, either in the books of Moses, or in the compass of their history. They pretend that David was married to Bathsheba before her husband was dead, because it was a custom, as they say, for soldiers, whenever they went to the wars, to give their wives a bill of divorcement, and consequently a full license to marry whom they pleased. But it is vain to attempt to excuse this black and crying sin in David, for which God so severely punished him, and for which he himself was always ready to acknowledge the divine justice in so doing.—Calmel's Commentary on 2 Sam. xi. 27.

One pernicious consequence of David's transgression very likely was, that it made him timorous in inflicting punishments upon others; but the reason which Josephus assigns for his not chastising Amnon for his incestuous rape, namely, 'because he was his eldest son, and he loved him, and would not displease him,' is a groundless calumny, and mere fiction; for, ² since the sacred history has thought fit to be silent in this matter, no one can tell what his father either said or did to him: the true reason, therefore, as we suppose, why his father did not proceed with severity against him, was, because the case, as it then stood, was intricate and perplexed, and such as the law had made no provision for. The law concerning rapes is worded thus:—³ 'If a damsel, that is a virgin be betrothed unto a husband, and a man find her in the city, and lie with her; then ye shall bring them both out of the gate of the city, and ye shall stone them with stones that they die: the damsel, because she cried not, being in the city; and the man, because he humbled his neighbour's wife.' And again, 'If a man find a damsel that is a virgin, which is not betrothed, and lay hold on her, and lie with her, and they be found, then the man that lay with her, shall give unto the damsel's father fifty shekels of silver, and she shall be his wife, because he hath humbled her; he may not put her away all his days.' These are the two principal laws concerning this matter, but neither come up to the case now before us. For had David punished Amnon's crime with death, as the former law requires, Tamar in like manner must have suffered too, even though she was innocent, because she cried not out; ⁴ and though she was not a betrothed damsel, as the case is put in the latter law, yet David could not compel Amnon to marry her, because such a marriage would have been incestuous; and therefore we may suppose, that though David might reprimand his son very severely, for having wrought folly in Israel; yet he could not bring him before a public judicature, because the law did not properly extend to his case, or if he had made it extend, the innocent must have suffered with the guilty; and ⁵ a rule of equity, I think it is, rather to let the guilty escape, than that the innocent and injured should be destroyed.

The sacred historian has taken care to clear David from any base connivance at Absalom's wickedness in murdering his brother Amnon, by telling us, that as soon as he had done it, ⁶ 'he fled, and went to Tahmai,' his grandfather, by his mother's side, who was then king of Geshur. Geshur was a city in Syria, which lay on the other side of Jordan; and Absalom, who meditated the murder of his brother, and could not but foresee that it would be an act of high displeasure to his father, invited the princes of the blood to his country seat, which was ⁷ near the city Ephraim, not far from the river Jordan, that he might have a better opportunity, not only for putting in execution his wicked design, but of making his escape likewise; so that David, had he been ever so much minded, could not possibly have apprehended him, before he had got to a safe retreat: and where, it is easy to imagine, he would tell his tale so well, as to gain his grandfather's protection, if not approbation of the fact, which, with a small share of eloquence, might be so set off, as to appear a necessary vindication of the honour of their family, which had been so grossly violated.

The law of God indeed is very express:—⁸ 'Whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; ⁹ neither shall he take any satisfaction for the life of a murderer, who is guilty of death, but he shall surely be put to death.' Whereby it appears, that the supreme magistrate was obliged to execute justice upon all wilful murderers, without any reservation; nor had David any power to dispense with God's laws, or to spare those whom he had commanded him to destroy. But then it must be considered, that the affront which Amnon put upon Absalom, was very great and heinous; that Absalom, at this time, was out of the reach of David's justice, and so would have continued, had he not obtained a promise of impunity; that, by living an exile in a heathenish country, David had reason to apprehend, that his son was in danger of being infected with their wicked and idolatrous practices, and was therefore the rather inclined to recall him; and that the clamours and importunities of the people, which Joab procured this woman of Tekoah to represent to the king in a very free and artful manner, did almost compel him to do it: for, what he said in the case of Joab's murder of Abner, namely, that he could not revenge it, because ¹⁰ 'the sons of Zeruiah, were too hard for him;' the like, very probably, might have been said in this case, where the people's hearts were so strongly, and so universally, set upon Absalom; and that the rather, because his long banishment moved their pity, and his absence made them more impatient for his return. The eyes of all, in short, were upon him, as the next heir, as a wise and gallant, and amiable prince, unhappy only in this instance of killing Amnon, for which he had a sufficient provocation; and therefore, to satisfy the cries of the people, as well as to provide for the security of his kingdom, which seemed to depend on the establishment of the succession in Absalom, David was obliged to forgive him, and recall him. And when he was recalled, and reinstated in the king's favour, it is no wonder that a young prince, of his gay temper, should multiply his attendants, and set up a rich equipage, to attract the eyes and admiration of mankind; or that his father, whose riches so well enabled him to bear the expense of this magnificence, and whose heart rejoiced, perhaps, to see his son the favourite of the people, did not restrain him in it; because a man of an open spirit himself loves to see his children make a figure in life, which, in all eastern countries, was a thing customary, and might here more especially be expected in the eldest and heir presumptive to the crown.

intended him for his successor in the kingdom; that he had all along made a promise to Bathsheba, his favourite queen, which promise, though¹ recorded later in the history, might at first come to Absalom's ear, that her son Solomon should succeed in the regal dignity; and that Absalom, both from a consciousness of his own demerits, and of the superiority of wisdom and piety that appeared in Solomon, perceiving that his father intended to postpone him, and instate the other, entered into this rebellion, in order to assert his birthright to the crown. But the fault in David was not any exclusion of right, but too blind an indulgence to his son, even while he was in arms against him, ready to kill, and resolved to depose him. 'Spare ye the young man,' says he, and this he might desire, partly from a consciousness of his own sin in the case of Uriah, which was the meritorious and procuring cause of the rebellion, in which his son was unhappily engaged; partly from a consideration of his youth, which is commonly foolish and giddy, and subject to evil counsels, and therefore deserves pity; and partly from a sense of piety in himself, as being unwilling that he should be cut off in a sinful rebellion, without any space or means of repentance.

These might be some of the reasons that made David give his army so strict a charge not to kill his son, in case they should take him. But Joab had quite different sentiments of the matter. He perceived, that there could be no safety to the king, nor peace to the kingdom, no security to himself, or other loyal subjects, as long as Absalom lived; that, notwithstanding this unnatural rebellion, the king was still inclinable to forgive him, and that there would always be some unquiet people, that would be moving fresh disturbances, in order to set him on the throne. Looking upon this charge, therefore, as an order more proper for a parent than a prince, he adventured to disobey it. For he thought with himself,² that the king ought not to be observed in an affair, wherein he showed more regard to his private passion, than to the public good; that fathers should always sacrifice their paternal tenderness to the interest of the government; and that as Absalom had forfeited his life to the laws upon several accounts, it was but justice now to take this opportunity of despatching him, as an enemy to his king and country: but whether, in this act of disobedience to the royal command, Joab is perfectly to be vindicated, we shall not pretend to determine. It is certain that he was a person of a bold temper, high passions, and fiery resentments; that valued himself upon the services he had done the king, and seemed not to be much afraid of his authority.

The complaint which David makes to some of his courtiers, upon this general's murdering the famous Abner, declares the true reason why he could not, at that time, put the laws in execution against him:³ 'Know ye not,' says he, 'that there is a prince, and a great man fallen this day in Israel? And I am this day weak, though anointed king; and these men, the sons of Zeruiah, be too hard for me. The Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness.' Joab was David's sister's son, or nephew,⁴ who had stuck close to him in all his adversity, an excellent soldier himself, and a man of great power and authority among the army; so that had David immediately called him to justice for this vile act against Abner, such was his interest among the soldiery, that he soon would have caused a mutiny or revolt, and found a means to shock or unhinge the government that was not as yet sufficiently established. It was a point of prudence therefore in David, to delay the punishment of so powerful and so perilous a man, until a more convenient season, and only, for the present, to express his detestation of the deed, by commending the deceased, condemning the murder, and commanding the murderer by way of penance, to attend the funeral in sackcloth, and other signs of mourning.

So far is David from winking at Abner's murder, that we find him burying him with great solemnity, and making mournful lamentation over his grave; praising his valour, and other great qualities, publicly, and cursing the author of his untimely death.⁵ 'I, and my kingdom,' says he, 'are guiltless before the Lord for ever from the blood of Abner the son of Ner. Let it rest on the head of Joab, and on all his father's house, and let there not fail from the house of Joab one that hath an issue, or that is a leper, or that leaneth on a staff, or that falleth on the sword, or that lacketh bread.'

But what apology shall we make for his treating the Ammonites so inhumanly, and putting them to such exquisite torments, only for a small indignity, which a young king, at the instigation of some evil counsellors, put upon his ambassadors, since there seems to be no proportion between the affront and the revenge, between the one's having their beards and clothes cut a little shorter, and the other's being put under saws and harrows, or thrown into hot burning furnaces? Had David indeed been the inventor of such frightful punishments, we might have justly reckoned him a man of the same cruel and brutal spirit, as was Caligula, who, in after ages, as⁶ Suetonius tells us, was wont to take a great delight in inflicting them. But the truth is, that these were the punishments which the Ammonites inflicted upon the Jews, whenever they took them prisoners; and therefore David, when he conquered their country, and reduced their capital city, used them with the like cruelty: not every one of them indiscriminately, but such only as appeared in arms against him, and had either advised, or approved the advice of putting such a disgrace upon his messengers.

The Ammonites, it is certain, were early initiated into all the cruelties of the people of Canaan. When they invested Jabesh-Gilead, and the besieged made an offer to surrender, the easiest condition that they would grant them, was, that they might⁷ 'thrust out all their right eyes, and lay it for a reproach upon Israel for ever;' which one instance, as I take it, is in the room of ten thousand proofs, to demonstrate, that these Ammonites were monsters of barbarity; and that therefore king David was no more culpable for retaliating upon them the same cruelties that they used to inflict on others, than the people of Agrigentum were, for burning Phalaris in his own bull, or Theseus the hero, for stretching Procrustes beyond the dimensions of his own bed. For even the heathen casuists have determined, that no law can be more just and equitable, than that which decreed artists of cruelty to perish by their own arts.

The particular punishment of passing through the brickkilns, an ingenious ¹ author seems fairly to account for, by making this conjecture. "It is very well known," says he, "that the Jews were slaves in Egypt, and particularly employed in brickmaking. Now it is natural for all people at enmity, to reproach one another with the meanness and baseness of their original. As therefore the Ammonites were a cruel and insolent enemy, and nothing could be more natural for men of their temper, when they had got any Jews in their power, than to cry out, send the slaves to the brickkilns, and so torture them to death; so nothing could be more natural than for the Jews, when they got an advantage over them, to return them the same treatment." However this be, it is certain that the siege of Rabbah began before David had any criminal commerce with Bathsheba, and if the town was not taken till after Solomon's birth, as the sequel of his history seems to imply, the siege must have lasted for about two years; in which time, upon the supposition that David continued in an obdurate state of sin and impentence, ^a and was therefore deprived of that mild and merciful spirit for which he had formerly been so remarkable; there is no wonder, if, being now become cruel and hardhearted, as well as exasperated with the length of the siege, he treated the Ammonites in the same outrageous manner that they were accustomed to treat his subjects, not only to retaliate the thing upon them, but to deter all future ages likewise from violating the right of nations, by treating the persons of public ambassadors with contempt.^b

That the rights of ambassadors are guarded by all laws, both divine and human, and that therefore a violation of these rights is not only unjust, but impious, is the general sentiment of all the most able ² writers upon the laws and constitutions of civil government. So tender were the Romans in this particular, ³ that they appointed twenty feciales, as they called those officers, to inspect

^b This vindication of David for his conduct towards the Ammonites, had his treatment of them been such as represented in the ordinary translation followed by our author, would be by no means satisfactory. Fortunately the heavy charge urged against David from this part of sacred history, needs no such vindication. Dr A. Clarke, on 2 Sam. xii. 31, says:—"I believe this interpretation was chiefly taken from the parallel place, 1 Chr. xx. 3. where it is said, he cut them with saws and with axes, &c. Instead of וַיִּצַק vaiyasar, he saved, we have here (in Samuel) וַיִּצַק vaiyasem, he put them; and these two words differ from each other only in a part of a single letter ר resh, for ם mem. And it is worthy of remark that in 1 Chr. xx. 3, six or seven MSS. collated by Dr Kennicott, have וַיִּצַק vaiyasem, he put them. Nor is there found any various reading in all the MSS. yet collated for the text in this chapter, that favours the common reading in Chronicles. The meaning therefore is, he made the people slaves, and employed them in sawing, making iron harrons, or mining, (for the word means both) and in hewing of wood, and making of brick. Sawing asunder, hacking, chopping, and hewing human beings, have any place in this text, any more than they had in David's conduct towards the Ammonites. See also Boothroyd on the passage, and the supplement on the objections to the credibility of the Old Testament, p. 393 of this edition.—ED.

their good usage, and preserve their immunities; to make them immediate reparation, when any injury was done them; and, in case of a personal affront or indignity, to deliver up the offender, even though he were a noble or a patrician by birth, into the hands of the nation from whence the ambassador came, to be treated by them as they thought fit. And therefore, we need less wonder, that king David, who, in all his actions, was a nice observer of every punctilio in public honour, should resent in so high a manner an indignity, the greatest that could be offered, put upon his ministers, and from them reflecting upon his own majesty, merely for sending a kind compliment of condolence to a foolish prince, as he proved, upon the death of a very worthy father.

A man so zealous for his own honour, as well as for the rights of nations, in his public capacity, can hardly be presumed to be an abettor of perfidy in his more private. We must therefore suppose, that, notwithstanding his war with Ishbosheth, wherein there might happen some skirmishes, he still kept his promise with his father Saul, not to destroy any of his family; and therefore in the whole compass of the war (in which, though it lasted seven years, we nowhere read of one battle fought) he acted in the defensive, not offensive, part, and kept an army by him, not to destroy Saul's posterity, but merely to maintain himself in the possession of that regal dignity wherewith Samuel, by God's order and appointment, had invested him.

Ishbosheth knew very well, that Samuel had anointed David, and that God had appointed him to be his father's successor in the whole kingdom of Israel. And therefore his opposing him in a hostile manner, was provocation enough, one would think, had not David remembered ⁴ his oath made to Saul, and thereupon overlooked this ill treatment of his son, and pronounced him a ⁵ 'righteous person.' The removal of an adversary, and dangerous competitor for a crown, might be thought a meritorious piece of service by some ambitious princes; but David was of another sentiment. His soul and his notions were the same as what inspired the great Alexander, when he took vengeance on Bassus for having killed his enemy Darius; ⁶ for he did not consider Darius so much in the capacity of an enemy, as Bassus in that of a friend to the person whom he had basely murdered. And it is not improbable, that his reflection upon the sad fate of Saul's unhappy family, and the solemn promise he had given for their preservation, as well as the design ⁷ of clearing himself from the least suspicion of having any hand in this barbarous regicide, prevailed with David to inflict upon the authors of it, the exemplary punishment of hanging them upon gibbets, to be a spectacle of abhorrence; of cutting off their right hands, ⁸ wherewith they might have committed this execrable deed, and of cutting off their feet, wherewith they had made their escape from justice.

Abner indeed acted very basely, very treacherously, in deserting Ishbosheth, the king whom he had set up, upon a very slight provocation; but David had no concern in all this. The kingdom belonged to him by divine donation; Abner knew this before he proclaimed Ishbosheth; and therefore all the mischiefs of the civil war are chargeable upon him: nor can David be blamed for receiving his own right, even though it was tendered to him by the hand of a bad man. The truth is, David did not delude Abner from his master, but Abner made the first overture of his service to him; and as this was no unfavourable opportunity of uniting the two contending kingdoms, which providence seemed to have thrown in his way, David had been perfidious, not only to his own interest, but to the establishment of the general peace of the nation, had he not fallen in with it. ¹ He, no doubt, was privy to the cause of Abner's disgust: but, without approving either of his crime or his treason, he might lawfully make use of the traitor; nay, and confer on him some tokens of his favour too, in consideration of the benefits he had received from him, and of some commendable qualities, either natural or political, that he had observed in him. The instrument is not to be regarded in all actions, and even a bad man, when he does good services, may merit a reward, and be received with some approbation.

No man indeed should engage another in a base or wicked action: ² because, whether he commits the thing himself, or employs another to do it, the crime is the same; but it is not so, says ³ Grotius, if a person freely offers himself, without any solicitation or persuasion to it. In this case, it is not unlawful to use him as an instrument, in order to execute what is confessedly lawful for us to do: and, as it is not contrary to the law of arms to receive a deserter, who quits the enemy's party and embraces ours, so we cannot conceive how David could become culpable in taking the advantage of Abner's quarrel with Ishbosheth, when, without any application of his, he voluntarily sent to him, and offered him his service, and when the good providence of God seems to have employed the passion and angry resentment of that haughty general, in order to bring about his wise designs, and by the union of the two kingdoms, prevent the effusion of much blood.

But what shall we say in excuse for his perfidy, when we find him putting his friend Hushai upon acting such a part as but badly became a man of honour; upon going, and offering his service to his son Absalom, on purpose to betray him, or give him bad counsel? The words of David are these:—⁴ 'If thou return to the city, and say unto Absalom, I will be thy servant, O king: as I have been thy father's servant hitherto, so will I now also be thy servant; then mayest thou for me defeat the counsels of Ahithophel.' But David, by these words, say some interpreters, did not advise Hushai to betray Absalom, or, for his sake, to violate the laws of friendship, but purely to go and join himself to Absalom, who, by this time, had assumed the title of king, and could not properly be addressed without calling him so, in order to destroy the counsels of Ahithophel, just as a general sends his spies into the enemy's camp, to know what passes there: or as a king keeps, in foreign courts, his envoys, to gain intelligence of the designs that may be formed against him, and to defeat the resolutions that may be taken to his prejudice. But whether these comparisons may come up to the case before us or no, it was certain, at this juncture, Absalom's business was to be upon his guard. The unjust war which he had declared against his father, gave his father a right to treat him as an open enemy, and to employ either force or artifice against him; nor can this conduct of his be blamed, unless we should say, that when kings are engaged in war, they are forbidden to disguise their true designs, even though it be a thing notorious, that upon this disguise the practice of stratagems in war, which were never yet accounted unlawful, is entirely founded.

The truth is, ⁵ Absalom, as a traitor, a murderer, a rebel, and, as far as in him lay, a parricide, had forfeited all the rights of society, but more especially as a rebel: for a rebel, who sets himself to overturn the established government, order, and peace of any community, does, by that hostile attempt, actually divest himself of all social rights in that community. And consequently David could be no more guilty of perfidy, in forming a design to supplant Absalom, nor Hushai guilty of villany in undertaking to put it in execution, than that man can be said to be guilty of sin, who deceives a madman, and turns him away from murdering his best friends.

The short of the matter is, Hushai's instructions were to negotiate David's interest among the rebels as well as he could. This he could not do without seeming to act in a contrary character; and in order to effect this, there was a necessity for his concealing himself; and conceal himself he could not, without some degree of dissimulation; and therefore the end which he proposed in what he did, namely, the prevention of that long train of mischiefs which always attends a civil war, was sufficient to justify the means which he took to accomplish it. For, though it is to be wished with ⁶ Cicero, that all lying and dissimulation were utterly banished from human life; yet, as others have maintained, that a beneficial falsehood is better than a destructive truth, a case may be so circumstantiated, as to make dissimulation, which as ⁷ Lord Bacon says, "is nothing else but a necessary dependant upon silence, highly necessary; and a lie, which otherwise would be blamable in a slave, will deserve commendation (says ⁸ Quintilian) when a wise man makes use of it, to save his country by deceiving his enemy." Now, as Hushai's whole design was to deceive an open and declared enemy, who can doubt, but that he was at full liberty, by his address and subtilty, to disconcert the measures of those, whom all agree, that had he been so minded, he had license to attack with open violence? ⁹ To overcome an enemy indeed by valour, rather than art, sounds more gallant, and by some has been thought a more "reputable way of conquest, but since the laws of nature and arms have made no difference, and those of humanity and mercy seem to incline to that side wherein there is likely to be the least blood shed, Hushai may be said to have acted the worthy patriot, as well as the faithful subject, in breaking the force of an unnatural rebellion, and in putting it into his royal master's mouth to say, 'the Lord is known to execute judgment; the ungodly are trapped in the work of their own hands. They are sunk down in the pit that they made; in the same net, which they hid privily, are their own feet taken.'

Thus, though we are not obliged to vindicate David in every passage of his life, and think some of the crying sins he was guilty of utterly inexcusable; yet if we except these, we cannot but think, that although he was a very tender and indulgent parent, yet he was no encourager of vice in his own family, or a tame conniver at it in others, had he not been restrained by reasons of state, sometimes, from punishing it; that he was true to his promises, just in his distributions, and prudent, though not crafty, in his military transactions; "of a singular presence of mind, (as ² Josephus speaks of him,) to make the best of what was before him; and of as sharp a foresight for improving all advantages, and obviating all difficulties, that were like to happen;" tender to all persons in distress, kind to his friends, forgiving to his enemies; and when at any time he was forced to use severity, it was only in retaliation of what other people had done to him.

Happy were it for us, if we could account for the operations of God with the same facility that we can for the actions of his saints; but his counsels are a great deep, and his judgments, just though they be, are sometimes obscure, and past finding out. For what shall we say to the fate of Uzzah? Or what tolerable cause can we assign for his sudden and untimely end. It was now near seventy years since the Israelites had carried the ark from place to place, and so long a disuse had made them forget the manner of doing it. In conformity to what they had heard of the Philistines, they put it into a new cart or wagon; but this was against the express direction of the law, ³ which ordered it to be borne upon men's shoulders. It is commonly supposed, that Uzzah was a Levite, though there is no proof of it from Scripture; but supposing he was, he had no right to attend upon the ark; that province, by the same law, ⁴ was restrained to those Levites only who were of the house of Kohath: nay, put the case he had been a Kohathite by birth, yet he had violated another command which prohibited even these Levites, though they carried it by staves upon their shoulders, ⁵ upon pain of death, to touch it with their hands: so that here was a threefold transgression of the divine will in this method of proceeding. The ark, as some say, by Uzzah's direction, was placed in a cart; Uzzah, without any proper designation, adventures to attend it; when he thought it in danger of falling, officiously he put forth his hand, and laid hold on it, all violations of the divine commands, and this, as is supposed, not so much out of reverence to the sacred symbol of God's presence, as out of diligence of his providence, as unable to preserve it from overturning.

The truth is, this ark had so long continued in obscurity, that the people, in a manner, had lost all sense of a divine power residing in it, and therefore approached it with irreverence. This is implied in David's exhortation to Zadok and Abiathar, after this misfortune upon Uzzah. "Ye are the chief of the fathers of the Levites; sanctify yourselves therefore, both ye, and your brethren, that you may bring up the ark of the Lord God of Israel, unto the place that I have prepared for it; for because ye did it not at the first, the Lord our God made a breach upon us, for that we sought him not after the due order." What wonder, then, if God being minded to testify his immediate presence with the ark, to retrieve the ancient honour of that sacred vessel, and to curb all licentious profanations of it for the future, should single out one that was the most culpable of many, one, who in three instances was then violating his commands, to be a monument of his displeasure against either a wilful ignorance or a rude contempt of his precepts, be they ever so seemingly small; that by such an example of terror, he might inspire both priests and people with a sacred dread of his majesty, and a profound veneration for his mysteries?

God indeed is left to his own pleasure, what signs he shall think fit to give to his people, upon any occasion for their good; but the more arbitrary and uncommon any sign is, the more it seems to have proceeded from God. Though therefore the sound of people's going upon the tops of trees, be a thing not so congruous to our conceptions, yet it will not therefore follow, that it was not the real sign which God gave David, because the stranger the phenomenon was, the greater assurance it conveyed of the divine interposition in his favour. Nor can the practicableness of the thing be disputed, since it was confessedly an host of angels (who could move on the tops of trees, as well as plain ground) that made this noise of an army's marching.

There is no reason, however, to acquiesce in this construction only. ⁷ The word beroché, which we render tops, in several places in Scripture, signifies the beginning of things likewise; and in this acceptation, the sense of the sign which God gave David will be this,—“When thou hearest a sound, as it were of many men marching at the entrance of the place where the mulberry trees are planted, then do thou make ready to fall upon thine enemy; for this noise, which is occasioned by the ministry of my angels, goes before thee, both to conduct thee in thy way, and to inject terror into thine adversaries.”

But how plausible soever this interpretation may seem, there is some reason to suspect, that the other word bochim, which our translation calls mulberry trees, is in reality the proper name of a place. ⁸ The prophet Isaiah has a plain allusion to this piece of history, and seems to confirm what we here suggest. "The Lord," says he, "shall rise up as in mount Perazim; he shall be wroth as in the valley of Gibeon; that is, he shall destroy his enemies, as he did the Philistines at Baal-Perezim, under David, and the Canaanites at Gibeon, under Joshua: what hinders then, but that Beroche Bochim may signify the mountains of Bochim? And so the sense of the words will be,—“When thou hearest a noise, as of many people marching upon the hills, or high places of Bochim, then thou hast nothing to do, but to fall immediately upon the enemy.” Either of these interpretations clears the text from any seeming absurdity; and I shall only observe farther, that from the passage of the above cited prophet, as well as some expressions in the 18th psalm, such as, ¹ ‘He sent out his arrows, and scattered them; he cast forth lightnings, and destroyed them,’ it seems very likely that a mighty storm of thunder and lightning, of hailstones, and coals of fire, as the psalmist calls it, was assistant to David in the acquisition of this victory.

In the account of David’s conquest of the Ammonites, the weight of their king’s crown seems not a little monstrous. The weight of a talent, which, upon the lowest computation, amounts to no less than 123 pounds, is allowed to be too much for one neck to sustain; but then we should consider, that besides the crown that was usually worn it was customary, in some nations, for kings to have a vast large ones, even to a size equal to this, either hung, or supported over the throne, where, at their coronation, or upon other solemn occasions, they were wont to sit.

The Jewish doctors indeed have a very odd conceit, namely, that David, when he took this crown from the king of Ammon, hung it up on high by a certain loadstone that he had, as if the power of the magnet were to attract gold as well as iron. But let that be as it will, it is but to suppose, that the crown here under debate, was of this larger kind, and that, by some means or other, it was supported over the king’s head while he was sitting on his throne, and then there will be an apparent reason for taking the crown from off, or, as the Hebrew words will bear it, ‘from over the king’s head, and placing it, in like manner, over David’s head, even to indicate the translation of his kingdom to David.

² It is a common thing, however, in Hebrew, as well as other learned languages, to have the same word signify both the weight and value of any thing. And that the price or worth of the crown is here the meaning of the phrase we have the more reason to think, because mention is made of an addition of precious stones, which are never estimated by the weight of gold. ³ Josephus tells a The ancients make mention of several such large crowns as these, which were made for sight more than any thing else. Juvenal, exposing the pride and vanity of some of the chief magistrates at Rome, describes the pomp and splendour of their appearance in these words: “What if he had seen the pretor stand erect in his lofty chariot, and towering above the surrounding dust of the circus, magnificently dressed in an imperial coat, wearing pendant from his shoulders the purple epaulettes of his dardal-wrought gown, and on his head a golden crown so vast, that scarce can a human neck support it.” (Sat. 10.) Athenæus (b. 5. c. 8.) describes a crown made of gold, that was four and twenty feet in circumference, and mentions others, that were two, some four, and some five feet deep; as Pliny (b. 33. c. 3.) in like manner, takes notice of some that were of no less than eight pounds’ weight.—Cabinet’s Commentary in locum.

³ Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 7.

us of one stone of great value in the middle of the crown, which he calls a sardonix; and as we may suppose that there were other jewels of several kinds placed at their proper distances, these, in proportion as they heightened the value, must lessen the weight of the crown, and verify what the same historian tells us of it, namely, “that David wore it constantly on his head afterwards, for an ornament.”

There is another difficulty still behind, which relates to the weight of Absalom’s hair, that in the words of the text is thus expressed:—⁴ ‘And when he polled his head, for it was at every year’s end that he polled it; and because the hair was heavy on him, therefore he polled it, he weighed the hair of his head at two hundred shekels after the king’s weight.’ In the explication of which words, the sentiments of the learned have been so many and various, that, we shall content ourselves with commenting upon some of the chief of them.

Those who are of opinion that the words related only to the cuttings of Absalom’s hair, make the two hundred shekels the price, and not the weight of them; and to this purpose they suppose, that though Absalom himself might not sell his hair, yet some persons about him might do it, in complaisance to the ladies of Jerusalem, who might not think themselves in the fashion, unless they wore a favourite lock of the prince’s. But besides the absurdity of the king’s son suffering any of his domestics to sell his hair, the very words of the text are a confutation of this notion, where they tell us, that ‘he weighed the hair of his head;’ whereas, had it been sold, the buyer must have weighed the money, even ⁵ as Abraham did when he purchased the field of Ephron.

Others again pretend, that there is a manifest mistake crept into the text, which has been occasioned by an ignorant transcriber’s inserting one numerical letter for another, the resch instead of the daleth, that is, two hundred instead of four: but, besides the uncertainty, whether the former Hebrews made use of their letters instead of figures, whereof there is not the least sign or token in any ancient copies, wherein, I pray, would the great wonder be, if what was cut off from Absalom’s head, to thin and shorten his hair, when it grew too weighty and troublesome to him, amounted to no more than four shekels, which is much about two ounces? And yet the whole design of this narration seems to portend something more than usual, in this prodigious increase of Absalom’s hair.

The text, however, does not speak of the cuttings of the hair, but of the head of hair itself, when it talks of the weight of two hundred shekels; and therefore those who take it in this larger sense, are not forgetful to remind us, that in those days, hair was accounted a very great ornament, and the longer it was, the more it was esteemed; that Absalom, to be sure, would not fail to nourish his with the utmost care, and to let it grow long enough, because it contributed so much to the gracefulness of his person; that in after ages, as perhaps they did then, men were wont to use much art with their hair, and dress it every day with fragrant ointments, in order to make it grow thick and strong; that the noble guards which attended Solomon, as Josephus ⁶ informs us, had their long hair flowing about their shoulders, which they powdered with small particles of gold, to make it sparkle, and glisten against the sun; and that therefore it is not improbable, that Absalom, who himself was a gay young man, and wanted none of these helps or improvements, might, in process of time, bring his hair up to the weight that the Scripture records, which, according to the gold shekel, that was but half as much as the silver, came to no more, as the learned Bochart endeavours to prove, than three pounds and two ounces.

But since the Scripture says nothing of any such additions, as ointments, or gold dust, to enhance the weight of the hair; others, who think this too much for a man that polled his hair once every year, if not oftener, have observed, from the words which we render at 'every year's end,' that in the original they imply no particular designation of time; and thence infer, that Absalom did not weigh his hair so often as once every year, but at this particular time only, when he returned to Jerusalem. "He in his exile," say they, "which lasted about three years, pretending great sorrow for his sin, seems to have taken upon him the vow of a Nazarite, until his return; one part of which was, that he should not suffer his hair to be cut for such a determinate time: but upon his recall home, being now discharged from his vow, he ordered his hair to be cut all clean off, because it was grown very cumbersome to him; which being of so long a growth, amounted to the weight that the sacred history relates of it." But this notion of Absalom's Nazaritism has no foundation in Scripture,¹ except that lying pretence to his father, when under the cloak of religion, he was minded to conceal his intended rebellion; and therefore all the superstructure built upon it must necessarily fall.

Others, perceiving that none of these inventions would answer the purpose, have endeavoured to solve the difficulty, by attending to the latter words in the text, 'two hundred shekels, after the king's weight:' and, to this purpose,² they lay it down as a principle, that, during the reigns of the kings of Judah, there was no variation in the Hebrew weights, nor were there any that were called the king's: that the difference between the king's and the common weight did not commence, till after some continuance of the Babylonish captivity; that, towards the end of this captivity, whoever he was that revised these books of Samuel, made mention of such weights as were not properly Hebrew, but such as (after sixty or seventy years' captivity) the Jews only knew, and these were the Babylonish; and that therefore, when he comes to mention the weight of Absalom's hair, and tells us, that it was two hundred shekels, he adds, by way of explanation, that it was after the king's weight, that is, after the weight of the king of Babylon, whose shekel was but the third part of a Hebrew shekel,³ as the best writers upon weights and measures are generally agreed. So that, according to this hypothesis, Absalom's hair, which weighed two hundred Babylonish shekels, came but in our weight, to about thirty-three ounces; a quantity which those who deal in that commodity have not unfrequently met with upon several women's heads; and therefore what brings this long contested story, at least, within the bounds of a fair probability.

Thus have we attempted to solve most of the remarkable difficulties, that either affect the character of David, or other parts of Scripture account, during this period of its history; and may now begin to wave the testimony of heathen authors, in confirmation of what we may think strange and unaccountable in the sacred records; because facts of that kind will not so frequently occur; and the Jewish nation begins now, in the reign of king David, to make so considerable a figure, as to have their affairs either mentioned or alluded to, by the most remarkable historians, both Greek and Latin.

CHAP. III.—Of the Sacred Chronology, and Profane History during this Period.

BEFORE we enter upon the foreign history of this period, it may not be improper to take notice of some chronological difficulties, that are to be found in the Scripture account of it. The space of time, from the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt, to the laying the foundation of the temple at Jerusalem, is so exactly stated, that it will admit of no dispute: 'For⁴ it came to pass,' says the text, 'in the four hundred and fourscore year, after the children of Israel were come up out of the land of Egypt, in the month Zif, which is the second month, that Solomon began to build the house of the Lord:' but then the manner of computing this number of years has been various.

a The chronology of the period here treated of, namely, from the death of Joshua to the building of the temple, has been much corrupted in the common Hebrew text; in fact the various parts are totally irreconcilable, as the efforts of our author to this end in the foregoing portion of this chapter clearly shows. The great alterations made in the chronology at a late period by the Jews, and their reasons for so doing, have already been stated, note pages 65, 66, on the period from the creation to the deluge. And for the shortening of this period they had the very same motive; it was indeed a part of the same scheme for raising prejudices in the minds of their countrymen against the Messiahship of Jesus of Nazareth. Dr Hales, vol. 1. pp. 221, 222, second edition, gives from one of the Jewish rabbis, David Ganz, a table of the period from the exode to the building of the temple, in which they have contrived to crowd the various events within the space of 480 years; but, he adds, the Jewish chronologers were hard set to make out this detail, as Ganz honestly confesses:—For, 1. "By a curious invention, they included the first four servitudes in the years of the judges, who put an end to them, contrary to the express declarations of Scripture, which represent the administrations of the judges, not as synchronizing with the servitudes, but as succeeding them, (Judges ii. 18.) 2. They were forced to allow the fifth servitude to have been distinct from the administration of Jephthah, because it was too long to be included therein; but they curtailed a year from the Scripture account of that servitude, making it, instead of eighteen, only seventeen years; and they curtailed another year from Ibban's administration, making it only six, instead of seven years. 3. They sunk entirely the sixth servitude, to the Philistines, of forty years, because it was too long to be contained in Samsou's administration; and, to crown all, 4. They reduced Saul's reign of forty years, (Acts xiii. 21.) to two years only! The dishonesty of the whole contrivance could be equalled only by its absurdity; furnishing internal evidence that the period of four hundred and eighty years, foisted into the Hebrew text of 1 Kings, is itself a forgery." We have given, at page 396, Dr

the difference, from the departure out of Egypt, to the first beginning of the temple, to be 597 years; but this account is 117 more than what we find in Scripture. ¹ Josephus expressly tells us, that when Solomon began that mighty work, it was 592 years from the coming of the Israelites out of Egypt; but then it is presumed, that he (as well as the other Jews) reckons the years of the oppressors apart; whereas they ought to be included in the years of the judges, who delivered the people from that bondage; for, it is but looking into the Scripture account, and we shall see that, ² before Othniel, Israel was oppressed eight years; before Ehud, eighteen; before Deborah, twenty; before Gideon, seven; before Jephthah, eighteen; and before Samson, forty; now, adding all these together, we shall find that they amounted to 111 years: which, if joined to the years of the judges will make the particular years of this period far exceed the general; but, by being included in the time assigned for the government of the judges, they make that particular and general account of the years agree very rightly.

There is another difference between this account in the first book of Kings, and what the apostle affirms in the Acts of the Apostles, namely, that, ³ 'after the time that Joshua divided the land to them by lot, God gave them judges for about the space of four hundred and fifty years, until Samuel the prophet.⁷ But now, if there be 450 years from the division of the land of Canaan, which happened in the seventh year of Joshua's government, to the time of the government, or even of the death of Samuel, there must be many more than 480 years in the whole interval from the departure out of Egypt to the building of the temple.

The reigns of Saul, David, and Solomon, were forty years each, (Acts xiii. 21; 2 Sam. v. 1; 1 Kings xi. 42.) which determines the length of the period. But the dates of detail are not noticed in Scripture. They may, however, be collected from incidental circumstances, and from the series of events, to a considerable degree of exactness, not differing, perhaps, above a year more or less from the truth.—Hales' Analysis, v. 2. pp. 508, 509, second edition.—E.

To solve this difficulty, some have imagined, that the words μετὰ ταῦτα, after that, which are found in the twentieth verse, should be placed at the beginning of the seventeenth, and then the sense will be, that, from God's choosing our fathers, to the time of the judges, were 450 years; for, from Isaac's birth, say they, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, are 405 years; they wandered in the wilderness 40 years; and the land was divided by lot seven years after that; so that all these put together, make 452 years, which the Apostle expresses by the round sum of 450. But this apparently is not the sense of the apostle, who, in his discourse to the people, goes on gradually and methodically thus: 'God chose our fathers; he brought them out of Egypt; he led them in the wilderness forty years; he divided the land; and then he gave them judges,' &c. ⁸ Others therefore have fallen into a different way of computation, by making the years of the judges and oppressors distinct; for, the years of the judges, say they, until Samuel's time, are 339; the years of the tyrants are 111; which, put together, make exactly 450: and this kind of reckoning the apostle might mention, though he did not entirely approve of it; and therefore we find him introducing it with an ὡς, that is, after a manner, or, as some will have it, who compute the years of the oppressors as distinct from the years of the judges, though in reality they ought to be included in one another.

There is still a farther difficulty, which arises from comparing the scripture chronology, with the genealogies in the book of Ruth. From the entrance into the land of Canaan to the building of the temple, were 440 years: now, if out of this, we subtract for David's life, 70 years, and for that part of Solomon's reign which was before the foundation of the temple, four years, the remainder will be 366; and yet for these 366 years, we have four generations only, for Salmon begat Boaz of Rahab; Boaz begat Obed of Ruth; Obed begat Jesse; and Jesse begat David, which at a time ⁹ when the age of man was reduced to the compass of seventy or eighty years, is a thing almost impossible. But, as it is not certain, that the lives of all men were shortened at the time when the Israelites murmured in the wilderness, forasmuch as the reason for cutting them off so soon (even to prevent their entering into the land of promise) was peculiar to that generation, and might not affect others; so the lives of others might be extended much longer, until the days of David, and especially in that family, which God had honoured so highly as to appoint, that in it his blessed Son should be born.

⁶ According to this account, we may suppose that Salmon might be about twenty years old when he entered into Canaan, and Rahab, whom he married to be about the same age; and that Rahab might bear Boaz in the sixty-second year of her age, which in those days was no extraordinary thing; and then it is but supposing farther, that Boaz was 102 years old before he begat Obed; Obed 111 before he begat Jesse; and Jesse of the same age before he begat David; and the whole difficulty is removed: only it may be thought a little strange, that men, above 100 years old, should be capable of begetting children, until it be considered, that Moses and Aaron, and Joshua and Caleb, were all vigorous men at this age; that, long after this, Jehoiada, the high priest, was 130 years old when he died; and that, almost in our own remembrance, our countryman, Thomas Parr, lived to 152, and had a son when he was 105 years old.

This may suffice for settling the chronology; and now to proceed to the history of this period. Our last connexion of the sacred and profane history we concluded with the life and adventures of Sesostris, ^a who reigned in Egypt, and made a very distinguished figure in several parts of the world, while the Israelites were sojourning in the wilderness; but from the time that they entered into Canaan, ^b they seem to have had no intercourse with the Egyptians, nor do their several histories at all interfere.

All history, indeed, in this period of time, is so defaced and corrupted with fables, that it is a hard matter to discern any lineaments of truth in it; and yet it may not be amiss to take notice of some of its remarkable events.

About the thirty-ninth year of Ehud's government in Israel, in the time of Deucalion son of Prometheus, there happened such a deluge in Thessaly, ^c as gave ¹ the poets an occasion to say that all mankind were therein destroyed, and that Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, re-peopled the world, by throwing stones behind them, which were instantly changed into men and women.

Much about this time lived Phaeton, a prince of the Ligurians, and a great astrologer, that applied himself chiefly to the study of the course of the sun; and because, in his days, the country of Italy, near the river Po, was so incommoded with extraordinary heats, that the earth became dry, and barren for several years, ² it hence became a renowned fable among the poets, that by his misguidance of the horses of the sun, who is said to have been his father, he set the earth on fire.

About the fourteenth year of Tolah's judging Israel, Ganymede, the son of Tros, king of Phrygia, being beloved by Jupiter, as the poets fable, was by him carried up to heaven in the shape of an eagle, and much against Juno's will made cupbearer to the gods.

About the sixth year of Jair's government, Perseus appeared in the world, and of him the fabulous writers have many strange stories; as, that he was begot by Jupiter on Danae in a golden shower; that when he came to be of age he conquered the Gorgons, with their queen Medusa, whose hair was interwoven with snakes; that he subdued the inhabitants of Mount Atlas, and first delivered Andromeda, by killing the sea monster sent to devour her, and then married her; that afterwards he fought against the kings of Mauritania and Ethiopia, and, returning to Greece, overcame his uncle Prætus, and Polydectes king of the island Seriphus. ^d

Few things are more famous in the songs of the poets than the expedition of those valiant Greeks that accompanied Jason to Colchos; ^e and the foundation of the story is conceived to be this:—That the Argonauts sailed to some part of Scythia, to carry off a share of the riches of that country, where the inhabitants gained a great deal of gold out of the rivers that ran from Mount Caucasus, by using sheep skins with the wool on, in order to take up that precious metal, from whence it was called the golden fleece. But the poets, out of their fruitful brains, have made large additions to the story, namely, that Jason fell in love with Hypsipyle at Lemnos; and that at Colchos he married Medea, the king's daughter, who, being a famous witch, taught him how to kill the dragon that kept the rich fleece; how to conquer the bulls, that vomited fire; and how to sow the serpent's teeth, out of which there arose an army of men; with many more fictions of the like nature.

But, of all the occurrences in this period, that which has been most celebrated by the poets is the siege of Troy; and the probable occasion is supposed to be this:

Not long before this remarkable event happened, the seas were very much infested with pirates, who, landing on the shores, seized upon all the women and cattle they could meet with; and so carrying them off, either sold them in some distant country, or kept them for their own use. Hereupon Tyndarus, the father of Helena, considering the beauty of his daughter, caused all her lovers, who were some of the principal men of Greece, to bind themselves by a solemn oath, that, if at any time she should be taken from her husband, they

^b We have formerly taken notice, (b. 3. c. 5. in the notes,) of the series of the Egyptian kings, written by Erastosthenes, and preserved by Syncellus; and here to proceed with that catalogue. In the year of the world 2523, reigned in Egypt Echesius Caras one year. In the year 2524, began Nitoeris, and reigned six years. In the year 2530, began Myrtaus, and reigned twenty years. In the year 2552, began Thyosimares, the same that Herodotus calls Myris, or Myrios, and reigned twelve years. In the year 2564, began Thyryllus, and reigned eight years. In the year 2572, began Semiphuceares, and reigned eighteen years. In the year 2590, began Chuter Taurus, and reigned seven years. In the year 2597, began Cheres Philosopher, and reigned twelve years. In the year 2609, began Chomo Ephtha, and reigned eleven years. In the year 2620, began Anchurius Ochus, and reigned sixty years. In the year 2680, began Pentathyrus, and reigned sixteen years. In the year 2696, began Stamenes, and reigned twenty-three years. In the year 2719, began Sistosichemes, and reigned fifty-five years. In the year 2774, began Maris, and reigned forty-three years. In the year 2817, began Siphous Hermes. In the year 2826, began Phurron, or Nilus. In the year 2843, began Amurrhorus, and reigned sixty-three years, or to the year of the world 2906.—See Millar's Church History, c. 1. period 4.

^d With respect to the era of Phaeton and Ganymede there is no evidence whatever; no good evidence indeed that such personages ever existed. Perseus is supposed to have been the most ancient of all the Grecian heroes, and founder of the city of Mycenæ, of which he was the first king. According to most chronologists, he flourished in the year 1348 B. C. and was contemporary with the Hebrew judge Gideon. Sir Isaac Newton, however, brings him down to the year 1028 B. C.—Ep. Glieg.

would join all their forces together to recover her. And so, being left to choose whom she would have for her husband, she made choice of Menelaus king of Mycenæ, and brother to Agamemnon. Paris, one of the youngest sons of Priamus, king of Troy, upon the report of her beauty, came into Greece to see her, and was kindly entertained by Menelaus; but he soon took an opportunity to debauch his wife, and having robbed the husband of a great deal of treasure, found means to make his escape both with her and it.

Menelaus, as soon as his wife was gone, complained of the injury that had been done him, to all the Grecian princes, and required the performance of their oath; which they readily consented to, and made his brother Agamemnon general of the forces, that were to be employed in this expedition. The Greeks, however, being unwilling to enter into a war, if matters could be accommodated by a treaty, sent Ulysses and some others, as ambassadors to Troy, to demand Helena, and all the things of value that were taken with her. What answer the Trojans made to this demand, we are nowhere informed; but sure it is, that the ambassadors returned back so very much offended with their ill treatment, that, in a short time, they fitted out a vast armament.

But there was an unhappy accident, which mightily retarded the siege of the city, and that was a difference which fell out between Agamemnon and Achilles. Agamemnon, as general, had the preoption of what part of the booty he pleased, and had then taken to himself a captive woman, the daughter of Chryses, the priest of Apollo, as Achilles, and the other commanding officers, had made choice of others; but, being obliged to give up the priest's daughter, in atonement for the pestilence that was fallen upon the army, he sent and took Achilles's captive from him, which so exasperated this gallant warrior, that, to revenge himself effectually, he took up a resolution, neither to fight himself, nor suffer any forces under him to engage; and this gave the enemy so great an advantage, that Hector, at the head of his forces, broke through the Grecian trenches one day, and set fire to the ships.

In the midst of this extremity, Patroclus, the bosom-friend of Achilles, not being able to stand neuter any longer, begged of Achilles to let him have the use of his armour, and the command of his troops, in order to repulse the Trojans; which he bravely attempted, but, in the engagement fell by the hands of Hector, who took from him the arms of Achilles, and carried them off.

This conjuncture Agamemnon made use of to be reconciled to Achilles; and to this purpose, sent him back his captive maid, with many very valuable presents, and made an excuse for his former behaviour as well as he could. Achilles, in order to be revenged for the loss of his friend, laid aside all resentment, and joined the Greeks in the next battle, wherein he vanquished the Trojans; and, sing'ing out Hector, never left pursuing him, wherever he went, until he had killed him. ^a With

^a Homer indeed gives us this account of the taking of Troy; but Virgil has informed us, that it was done by a large wooden horse, in which were enclosed several of the chief commanders of the Greeks; that the rest setting sail to the island of Tenedos, left Sinon to persuade the Trojans, that this horse was built upon a religious account, and was necessary for them to take into the city; that, by his craft and instigation, they pulled down part of Hector fell the city, which was soon reduced to ashes, and its inhabitants forced to undergo a military execution.

But, how severe soever the Greeks might be to their conquered enemies, several historians have observed, that in their return home, they suffered almost as much misery as they had brought upon the Trojans. For this is the account which Thucydides gives of them. "By reason of their long absence, they found many alterations when they returned, so that some of them were driven by their neighbours from their ancient seats; many were expelled their countries by faction; others slain, soon after their arrival; and others deposed from their kingdoms by such as had staid at home." Nestor and Pyrrhus got safe home indeed, but were slain by Orestes. Idomeneus and Philoctetes, upon their return, were soon driven away to seek for new habitations. Agamemnon was, upon his first arrival, slain by his wife, and her adulterer Ægisthus, who had usurped his kingdom. Menelaus, having long wandered upon the sea, was forced into Egypt, before he could return to Sparta. Ulysses, after ten years' peregrination, and the loss of his whole company, came home in a poor condition, and had much difficulty to recover the mastership of his own house. Ajax, the son of Oileus, was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; and Diomedes to king Daunus. Some of the Locrians were driven into Africa, others into Italy, others into Sicily, and settled themselves in such numbers in these parts, that Greek became the current language of this island, and most of the east part of Italy obtained the name of Magna Græcia.

Thus the wise Ruler of the world was pleased to make one wicked nation the instrument of punishing another. But, whatever they severally suffered, the succeeding generations obtained this advantage by it, that the dispersion of the Greeks occasioned a fuller peopling of distant countries, by an accession of these new inhabitants: and the taking of Troy became, in some years, the settled epocha, whereby all that were acquainted with the story of it, might agree in their account of time. ^b CHAP. I.—From the death of Absalom to the Building of the Temple.

THE HISTORY.

As soon as David was informed of his son's death, all the wall for that purpose; and so the Greeks, returning on a sudden, and entering the breach, opened the horse, and seized upon the gates, and burned the city. But another author, who perhaps might know the truth as well as Virgil, gives us a different account of this matter, namely, that Æneas, Antenor, and Polydamus, having taken some disgust at king Priamus, agreed with the Grecians to betray the city to them, upon condition, that they might retire with their men wherever they thought fit, provided they did not settle in Phrygia. To this purpose it was concerted, that the Grecians should set sail the day before to the island Tenedos, as if they were quite gone, but return in the dark of the night, when the Trojans thought themselves secure, and so he let in at the Scæan gate, over which was a large image of an horse, which gave the first rise and occasion to all this story.

^b Troy was taken in the year B. C. 1183, and consequently just at the termination of Samson's administration. See Hales, vol. i. p. 216, and vol. ii. p. 257.—Ed.

the joy of the victory was turned into sorrow. The king himself withdrew to a ^a private apartment, where he vented his grief in such a ^b mournful exclamation, as ^a The place to which David withdrew, in order to vent his grief, was, as Josephus tells us, (b. 7. c. 10.) to the top of one of the highest towers in the city; but the sacred history calls it 'the chamber over the gate,' (2 Sam. xviii. 33.) For the gate was a spacious place, and much of the same form with the forum among the Romans, not only the market for all commodities, but the place where all great assemblies of the people were likewise held. There were several buildings, where the chief magistrates sat to administer justice, (Ruth iv. 1, 2,) and where the other affairs of the state were transacted; so that it is not improbable, that this chamber over the gate, where David went to weep, might be some withdrawing room in the place where the privy counsel was wont to meet. (Calmet's Commentary.) The death of this favourite but unprincipled son, was a grievous blow to the heart of his royal father—and the intense anxiety with which he waited for intelligence of the fate of the day's engagement, and especially of Absalom, may be judged of from the position he occupied when the messengers arrived. To understand his situation, it is necessary to remind the reader that he was then in the provincial town of Mahanaim, in the tower that overhung the gates of which a sentinel was posted, as usual in cases of emergency, to hail the approach of any emissary from the seat of war. By this scout, communications of every thing important he discovered were ever and anon made to the impatient monarch, who sat in an adjoining chamber—one of those which served as halls of justice—and which, in ancient times, were always situated on the gates of the city. It was in this apartment, the nearest in the city to the scene of action, and commanding, from its elevated position, an extensive view of the country, that David watched, in the most painful suspense, the tidings of the civil contest that involved the fate of his crown. It was in this chamber at the gate, that, according to the practice of remotest antiquity on the most solemn occasions, he continued to indulge his pathetic lamentations over the death of his profligate son. It was out of a window in the same place of public resort, that when roused by the remonstrances of Joab, he returned his thanks to the army for their gallant defence of his life and his kingdom. And it was in the same apartments that he appeared afterwards before the people of the city, distributing justice to all who came with cases for his decision. That it was the practice of the ancient kings of Israel, as well as of other Oriental monarchs, to decide cases while sitting openly at the gate, appears from many passages of the sacred history; and, in many parts of the East, we are informed that the same practice prevails to this day. Mr Campbell describes an interesting scene of this nature at which he happened to be present. "White in Kurreechare," says he, "a city twelve or thirteen hundred miles up from the Cape of Good Hope, he was told that a cause was going to be brought before the king. Being anxious to witness it, I was led in haste to the gate, where I saw the king sit down at the right side of it, with his secretary on his right hand, and the prosecutor, or complainant, on his left, who stated his case across to the secretary. During his narrating his case, the king was looking about, as if not attending to what was said, but I saw from his eyes that he was attending to what, for form's sake, was addressed to the secretary. When the party had finished what he had to say, the secretary repeated the whole to the king, as if he had been entirely ignorant of the matter, after which he pronounced his judgment. This picturesque description gives us a lively idea of the scenes in which the chiefs and kings of sacred history are frequently represented as placed among their dependents or their people; and accounts for the universal joy that pervaded the whole city of Mahanaim, when it was known that their afflicted monarch had resumed his daily custom of meeting with, and taking an interest in the affairs of the people at the gate of the city.

Jamieson's Eastern Manners.—Ed.

^b Nothing certainly can be more moving and pathetic, than the words which David utters upon this sad occasion; but whether it was David's deliberate wish, that he had died in Absalom's stead, or only the effect of his excessive love and grief for him, is not so easy a matter to determine. St Austin seems to be on the affirmative side, and gives this reason for it:—That Absalom died impenitent, but might have lived to become a better man; whereas, if David had died, he had reason this: ¹ 'O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom, would God I had died for thee! O Absalom, my son, my son!' And as for the army, instead of returning in triumph, they stole silently into the city, as if they had done amiss, and had lost, instead of gaining, the battle.

This Joab perceiving, and being sensible that such excessive grief, at this juncture of affairs, would be of great prejudice to the king, went boldly in to him, ^c and expostulated the matter with him in terms that might perhaps be necessary on that occasion, but did not so well become a subject's mouth. However they had this good effect upon the king, that they roused him from his melancholy, and made him appear in public, to the great satisfaction of all his loyal subjects, ^d but as he thought himself very insolently used by Joab, upon several occasions, from that time he made it his resolution to take the first opportunity of ^e dismissing him from being his general.

Those of his subjects, who had appeared in arms against him, being now made sensible of the folly of their

to hope well of his salvation: but this supposition, as I take it, is not so well founded, since there is much more probability that if Absalom had survived his father, he would have grown more profligate than ever, triumphed in his good success; insulted and persecuted all his father's friends; and proved a wicked and abominable tyrant. But whether David's wish was deliberate or no, it is certain, that his grief might be increased from this reflection, that himself, by his own sin in the case of Uriah, had been the unhappy instrument and occasion of his son's death; though some learned men have observed, that the oriental people were accustomed to express their passions with more vehemence than we, in these parts of the world are wont to do; and that the repetition of the same word, 'My son Absalom, O Absalom, my son, my son,' is a style proper for mournful lamentation. "To the stars we will extol thy Daphnis, Daphnis to the stars we will praise, for Daphnis also loved us." (Virg. Eccl. v.) "I am grieved for Adonis, Adonis the fair is dead, Adonis the beautiful is gone." (Bion. Id. 1.)—Patrick's and Calmet's Commentaries.

^c Josephus concludes the speech which he supposes Joab to have made to David upon this occasion, in words to this effect:—"Pray, Sir, does not your conscience, as well as your honour reprove you for this intemperate tenderness for the memory of so implacable an enemy? He was your son, it is true, but a most ungracious one; and you cannot be just to God's providence, without acknowledging the blessing of his being taken away. Let me entreat you therefore to show yourself cheerful to your people, and let them know, that it is to their loyalty and bravery that you are indebted for the honour of the day; for if you go on, as you have begun, your kingdom, and your army will most infallibly be put into other hands, and you will then find something else to cry for."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 10.

^d 2 Samuel xix. 8. "And the king arose and sat in the gate." The custom noticed in this passage appears to have been very ancient, and is found in other writings than the sacred books. Homer thus represents Nestor:—

The old man early rose, walk'd forth, and sat
On polish'd stone before his palace gate,
With unguents smooth the lucid marble shone,
Where ancient Nelus sat, a rustic throne;
But he descending to the infernal shade,
Sage Nestor fill'd it, and the sceptre sway'd.

Odys. i. 518.—Ed.

^e For he had sufficient reason to think of depressing a man, who was grown so insufferably insolent and imperious. He had slain Abner most perfidiously in cool blood; had killed Absalom against the king's express command; in his late bold reproof had insulted over his sorrow, and, if we may believe Josephus, threatened to depose him, and give his kingdom to another. To such a state of arrogance will ministers sometimes arrive, when they find that their service is become necessary to their prince. —Patrick's Commentary.

A. M. 2081. A. C. 1023; OR, ACCORDING TO HALES, A. M. 4375. A. C. 1036. 2 SAM. xix.—1 KINGS viii.

rebellion, became the forwardest for his restoration; but, what grieved him much, his own tribe, the tribe of Judah, seemed a little indifferent as to the matter; which made him send to Zadok and Abiathar the chief priests, not only to remind them of their own duty, but to authorize them likewise to treat with Amasa, who though he had commanded Absalom's army was still a man of great authority, in the tribe, to offer him his pardon, and in case he would come fully into his interest, to promise him the generalship in the room of Joab.

Thus all things conspiring to his happy restoration, the king left Mahanaim, and set forward on his journey to Jerusalem, when the chiefs of the tribe of Judah came to meet, and conduct him over the Jordan. Old Barzillai, who had been very kind to the king in his exile, and supplied him with provisions while he continued at Mahanaim, hearing that he was upon his return, came to take his leave of him; and see him safe over the river, and when the king in gratitude for his kindness gave him an invitation to go with him to Jerusalem, the good old man modestly excused himself, upon the account of his age, as having now lost the relish of the pleasures of a court, and desired rather to retire to his own estate, where he might spend the remainder of his days in quiet: but as he had a son, whose age was more proper to attend him, if his majesty would be pleased to confer any favour on him, the obligation would be the same; which David promised to do, and so with much mutual blessings and salutations, they parted.

Among the many others who came to meet David upon this occasion, Shimei the Benjamite, who not long before had loaded him with curses and imprecations, came, with a thousand men of his tribe to beg pardon for his fault; and when Abishai would have persuaded the king to have him killed, he resented the motion as an indignity put upon himself: and being unwilling to eclipse the public joy with the blood of any one, gave him his royal word and oath that he should live.

Another remarkable person that came to wait upon David at this time, was the perfidious Ziba, with his fifteen sons and twenty servants. He had again imposed upon his master, and, when he ordered him to make ready his ass that he, among others, might go and meet the king, slid away himself to make his court first; so that Mephibosheth, being lame, was forced to stay at Jerusalem, where he had all along mourned for the king's absence, until the king arrived: but when he was admitted into his presence, and the king seemed to be angry with him for not having accompanied him in his exile, he charged this seeming neglect upon the perfidy of his servant, and set his case in so fair a light, that the king revoked the hasty grant he had made in favour of Ziba, and put his estate upon the same foot of possession that it was before.

When David was passed the Jordan, he was willing to make all possible haste to Jerusalem; and, as the tribe of Judah was the first that came to conduct him home, he, very probably to gratify them, marched on without waiting for the great men of Israel, who, in all parts of the kingdom, were making ready to join him. This occasioned some hot disputes between the princes of Israel and those of Judah: and, as the king was loth to displease either party, and therefore did not care to intermeddle in the controversy, several of the tribes of Israel took an outward unbrage at this, which occasioned a fresh insurrection. Sheba, a Benjamite, and not unlikely one of Saul's family, made public proclamation by the sound of trumpet, that "since the tribe of Judah had engrossed David to themselves, they might even take him; and, since all the other tribes he had visibly deserted, their wisest way would be to stand to their arms, and in like manner desert him." Whereupon a great many of the other tribes followed Sheba; but the men of Judah persisted in their loyalty, and conducted the king to Jerusalem. As soon as he arrived in the city, the first thing he did was to declare Amasa his general, and since no one, who neglected himself to this degree, could be supposed ambitious of a crown. Not dressing his feet, may signify, either not cutting his toe nails, or his not washing his feet, which the Jews were accustomed very frequently to do, because of the bad smell which was natural to them, as well as the Arabians, and some other nations; and therefore his omission of this could not but make him offensive to himself. Not trimming his beard was letting his hair grow negligently, and without any order. For the manner of the Jews was, to cut the hair from the lip upwards, and what grew likewise on the cheek; but what was on the chin, and so backwards to the ear, that they suffered to grow; and not washing his clothes must denote his putting on no clean linen, but wearing the same shirt all the while.—Calmel's and Patrick's Commentaries.

Josephus brings in Mephibosheth pleading his excuse to David for not attending him, and expressing a grateful sense of his favours, in such like words as these:—"Nor has he only disappointed me in the exercise of my duty, but has been doing me spiteful offices to your majesty likewise: but you, Sir, are so just and so great a lover of God and truth, that I am sure your generosity and wisdom will never entertain a calumny to my prejudice. Our family has had the experience of your piety, modesty, and goodness, to a degree never to be forgotten, in passing over and pardoning the innumerable hazards and persecutions that you were exposed to, in the days, and by the contrivance of my grandfather, when all our lives were forfeited, in your power, and at your mercy. But then, after all this gracious tenderness, your superadding the honour of taking me to your table, a person so obnoxious in regard of my relations, as a friend, and as a guest, nothing could be either greater, or more obliging than this."—Jewish Antiquities, b. 7. c. 7.

In the text, Sheba is called 'a man of Belial.' The expressions 'sons of Belial,' 'men of Belial,' and 'children of Belial,' occur frequently in Scripture, and seem to imply wicked, worthless men; those who refuse to submit to any restraint; rebels, licentious and disobedient persons. (See Deut. xiii. 13. Judg. xix. 22. 1 Sam. ii. 12, x. 27.) The primary meaning of the word Belial is, uselessness, worthlessness, according to Gesenius; and the Septuagint renders the phrase ανδρες παρρησιας, lawless men. In the New Testament, Belial is applied to Satan, as the patron and epitome of licentiousness, (2 Cor. v. 15.)—ED.

^a What David did for Chimham is uncertain: but as he had a patrimony in Bethlehem, which was the place of his nativity, it is not improbable, that he gave a great part of it to Chimham, and his heirs for ever; and that this was afterwards called 'the habitation of Chimham' in the days of Jeremiah, (Jer. xli. 17.)—Bedford's Scripture Chronology, b. 5. c. 4.

^b The reason why Shimei came with so large a retinue, was to let David see that he was a man of some considerable rank, and capable of doing him great service among the people, which might be some inducement to the king to grant him his pardon: or, very likely, he was one of the captains of a thousand in his own tribe, and might carry them along with him, to make the stronger intercession for his pardon.—Pool's Annotations.

^c The words in the text are, that 'he had neither dressed his feet, nor trimmed his beard, nor washed his clothes, from the day that the king departed.' (2 Sam. xix. 24.) These were some of the instances wherein the Jews were wont to express their mourning; and they are here mentioned by the historian, as evidences of the falsehood of Ziba's information against his master.

to order him to get together a sufficient body of forces, as fast as he could, to pursue after Sheba. ^a Amasa, however, found more difficulty in executing this order than was expected; which when David understood, he sent Abishai with his guards, for he was resolved not to employ his brother Joab any more, in quest of Sheba, until Amasa, with the rest of the army, could join him. Exasperated at this, Joab, without any order went along with his brother: and when Amasa came up with them, which was at Gibeon, and was going to take upon him the command of the whole army, he advanced, with all seeming friendliness to salute him; but when he came within reach, he ^b took him by the beard, and stabbed him to the heart; and so, leaving him to wallow in his blood, proclaimed himself general in chief, and taking the army with him, pursued after Sheba, ^c leaving orders for the forces that were coming up, to follow after.

Sheba had gone about all the tribes of Israel to see if he could prevail with them to take up arms against David; but finding very few, that, upon second thoughts, were willing to engage in his measures, he was forced at last, with the few forces he had got together, to shut himself up in Abel, a fortified town in the tribe of Naphtali, in the northern part of Judea. But Joab was soon at his heels, and having besieged the town, and battered the walls, was making preparations for an assault, when a ^d woman of great prudence called to the

^a The people having been harassed in the late civil war, were not perhaps so forward as to engage in another. Some of them might not like to serve under a man who had lately headed a rebellious army against the king, and others might have conceived so high an opinion of Joab, as not easily to be brought to serve under any other general. Any of these things might very well retard Amasa's recruits, and yet he might be loath to make such a report to the king, for fear that it might diminish his authority, and make him appear not so well qualified for the office wherein he had placed him.—Patrick's Commentary.

^b It was an ancient custom among the Grecians, to take the person, to whom they had any address to make, by the chin, or beard: it was the custom of the ancient Greeks, in their prayers, to touch the chin, says Pliny, (b. 11. c. 45.) and even to this day, the Turks, in their salutations, do very frequently take one another by the beard, (See Thevenot's Travels, c. 22.) The Arabians have a great regard to the beard: the wives kiss their husbands, and the children their father's beard, when they come to salute them; and, when two friends meet together, their custom is, in the course of their compliments, to interchange kisses in this manner, (See Darvieux on the Customs of the Arabs, c. 7.) as the like custom is still preserved among the eastern people, the Indians, who take one another by the chin, when they would give an hearty salute, and say, bobba, that is, father, or brother, as the author of the voyage to the East Indies relates.—See Peter de Valles's Travels.

^c So insolent was Joab become, upon the presumption that David durst not punish him, that as he ventured upon this bloody fact, so he imagined, that though the sight of Amasa's dead body might stop the march of those that came by it, yet upon its being given out that he was again become their general, their love for him was such, that they would not scruple to follow him.—Patrick's Commentary.

^d It seems not unlikely, that this woman was a governess in this city; for though that office was most commonly occupied by men, yet there want not instances of women, as in the case of Deborah, (Judg. iv. 4.) and queen Athaliah, (2 Kings xi.) who have been employed in the administration of civil affairs. If she was invested with any such authority, she was the properest person to desire a parley with the general; and reason good she had to desire it, because she knew the present temper and fear of the citizens and soldiers, namely, that considering the imminent danger they were in, they were generally desirous of peace, and restrained from it only by Sheba's power and authority.—Poole's Annotations.

besiegers from off the walls, and desired to speak with their general. When Joab was come within hearing, the woman addressed herself to him in a very handsome manner, and told him, "that ^e by a long prescription of time, it had always been a custom, founded ¹ on the law of God, whenever the Hebrews came before any city, to offer peace in the first place, even though the inhabitants were of another nation; much more then ought this to have been done to a people, that were all of the same blood, and the greatest part of them loyal subjects to the king." To which Joab replied, "that he had no ill design against the people of the city, only as they harboured a rebel and a traitor, whom he demanded of them:" whereupon the woman persuaded the inhabitants to cut off Sheba's head, and throw it over the wall, which when they had done, Joab raised the siege, and withdrew with his army to Jerusalem; where his services, upon this occasion, were thought to be such that the king found himself obliged to restore him to his post of captain-general.
